CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR DAY.

Christian Endeavor Day is the first Sunday in February. The Foreign Christian Missionary Society is making a campaign to enlist 1,500 societies among the Disciples to observe this day and contribute to the cause of world-wide missions. It would seem to be an easy matter to enlist this number of societies, which after all would be less than half of the total number of societies in our churches. This is our Centennial Year, and aside from reaching the goal set by the Foreign Society, we Endeavorers have our own Centennial aim to attain, which is absolutely necessary that these special days be widely observed and made much of. Justin M. Green, for the Foreign Society, has prepared a most attractive program for Christian Endeavor Day called "Our Damoh Boys." This program is entertaining, inspiring, and instructive. It will make the meeting on that day one of the biggest and best of the year, if properly carried out. These programs can be had, as many as each society may desire, by simply dropping a postal card to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Box 884, Cincinnati, O., making the request. As National Superintendent of Christian Endeavor, the undersigned is deeply interested in the observance of Christian Endeavor Day among our societies, and earnestly urge that these programs be ordered at once and preparation begin as early as possible that this day may be a high day in each society.

Who Best Represents Our Plea?

Having settled, as we now dare to hope, the special case of the right of a certain brother to represent our plea on the Centennial program the Disciples of Christ still have on their hands the general question, Who is our most fitting representative? Who is the typical Disciple?

By this we do not mean, of course, what person is most representative, but what type of mind best stands for the essential plea that we make to the divided church of Christ. This we can discuss without reference to any man's personality. We do not wish to continue "the late Christian unpleasantness," as a correspondent characterizes it, a day longer than we are compelled. But the value of such a controversy lies not in the mere decision of the specific case but in the illumination of certain principles which may not have been discerned before. The clear perception of these principles will save us from a repetition of the disgraceful embroglio of the past four months.

In the specific case, just closing, opposition to Professor Willett has been based on the alleged fact that he held certain opinions contrary to those generally accepted among us. He was therefore not competent to represent our brotherhood at its Centennial. As the controversy developed it became clear that the alleged views of Professor Willett were not his at all, that a false representation of his teaching had gained currency. The original question as to his representativeness was changed into the question of his being honestly represented by the newspaper that attacked him.

We have before expressed our disappointment in this shifting of the issue. A question of this sort has no edification in it for the brotherhood in general. But the question of liberty, the original question of the desirability of a man of Professor Willett's views representing our plea, was pregnant with important issues for our Christian Union movement.

The establishment of Professor Willett's relative orthodoxy has perhaps obscured the deeper question. Many are saying now, "Certainly if those are Professor Willett's beliefs no objection should be made to his speaking at our convention. He holds the views commonly accepted among us, and while he may diverge at certain points from the common view this divergence in no sense endangers that body of doctrine to which our people are committed."

The Christian Century has not insisted upon Professor Willett's retaining his place on the Centennial program because he was orthodox. We have insisted upon the truth being told about him as a matter of personal justice to him and as a means of allaying immediately an ugly controversy that threatened for a time the holiest interests of our Zion. But we wish it to be kept clearly before our readers that we do not regard the elaborate statement of his faith which Professor Willett made in our columns as the reason why he should be invited to represent us at our convention. This "confession" of his faith is a noble utterance. It discloses a soul moving on the high uplands of thought and feeling. It has served the purposes for which it was composed.

But a danger lurks in it.

Shall every man be compelled to write out his creed, too, to have it tallied up with "that body of doctrine" commonly believed among us, before he is allowed to speak at our conventions or to be regarded as representative?

The value of this controversy to the brotherhood will be lost if it is generally understood that Professor Willett has been allowed to represent us because he is nearly orthodox. That is why we would much prefer to have fought through the question of liberty rather than the question of orthodoxy.

Our own position is that the best, the most typical, representative of the Disciples of Christ is the heretic, not the orthodox. We believe that in so far as Professor Willett diverges from conventional thought he is in a better position to represent us than if he agreed with the crowd in all his views. It betrays a false conception of our plea to assume that our typical representatives are the men who accept our typical thinking.

Our typical representatives are the men who reject our typical thinking while maintaining a deep and loyal faith in our Master, Christ.

Let us ask again, What is the purpose of our movement? What is it that we go to celebrate in Pittsburgh? Is it our denominational successes? Our stubborn contention has ever been that we are not a denomination, and in this contention the Christian Century agrees. Is it to exploit a body of doctrine that we have organized in our hundred years of history? We have disavowed the possession of any such doctrinal formulations in every sermon preached since Thomas Campbell's day.

The purpose of our movement is to gather Christ's divided people into one body of which Christ himself shall be the head. We are going to Pittsburgh to celebrate the promulgation by the fathers of the principle that personal loyalty to Christ Jesus the Lord, and faith in him as the divine revelation is in itself a sufficient bond of union and co-operation without the aid of creedal agreements. We are offering to the world a platform which we declare is already a common denominator for all Christian people—broad enough to embrace all, and strong enough to support all in co-operative service.

Naturally in the growth and fellowship of a movement like this there will come to be a type of belief commonly accepted. But does he who accepts the common belief best represent the essential principle of the movement or he who dissents from the common belief?

Our answer is that, he best represents our essential plea who differs from us for he is a living embodiment of the plea as well as a spokesman for it. He is a live illustration of it in the relationship of confidence in which he, though a heretic, is held by his brethren.

Can Christ unite us? That is the question we are called upon to answer today in our practice. We have been answering it in our preaching for a hundred years. We have declared that He alone was a sufficient bond. He has held us together through certain differences of opinion. On certain points of the old creeds we have frankly agreed to disagree. But new creeds are springing up. Matters of which the old creeds did not treat are becoming live issues in the thinking of today. Can Christ hold us together despite our differences on social questions, and critical questions, and psychological questions, and historical questions, and the pragmatic philosophy? If we have agreed to leave to each man's intelligence the matter of the predetermination of God, and the punishment of the wicked, and the trinity, and the millennium, shall we be able to unite and cooperate with a brother or a body of brethren who find it possible to explain certain records of the Old Testament without regarding them as precise historical fact, or who in making confession of the divinity of Christ, have something much more significant in mind than that he was born of a virgin?

For our part, we believe that when once the full breadth and grandeur of our position becomes conscious to ourselves we will be proud of the man who thinks independently. Placing his hand in Christ's we will say to each scholar, Go forth, with open mind, and fear not, but search for truth and what thou discoverest bring to us that we may test it and possess it, if it be indeed true. But if thou art deceived and bringest back error, fear not for thyself. So long as thou holdest the hand of Christ thou art our own.

Such an one would be our typical representative because he would be the natural product of the soil of faith and the atmosphere of liberty. Known by the world to be in our hearty fellowship, his very divergences from our conventional thinking would commend our platform as a practicable basis for the union of God's people.

EVENTS CURRENT AND SOME UNDERCURRENTS

By Alva W. Taylor

THE EBB OF THE IMMIGRATION TIDE

Secretary Straus gives the figures on immigration and emigration for the year ending September 30th. They show that 724,112 aliens came to our shores during the twelve-month and that 717,814 left us for the homelands. This leaves a net increase for the year of but 6,298. It is claimed the cause was the scarcity of work, and that was doubtless the chief of causes, for most of these people come to toil with their hands in the great industrial armies of construction in the cities and on the railroads, or in other of the industries that feel the fluctuations of a panic quickly. But there may be other reasons less on the surface. The great cities are so crowded now with them, the common laborer's name has become legion, wages are so distressingly low for such work and the emigrant's dream is so reduced to sordid reality that the tide may be on the turn permanently.

LETTERS BY WIRE

While we are waiting for the cheap wireless telegraph or the wireless telephone with a receiver in our vest pocket, an invention has been perfected by Patrick Delany that will automatically send one thousand words over an ordinary telephone wire per minute and, so claims the inventor, not interfere with conversation over the wire at the same time. A line is in daily use between Boston and Portland which is doing something like this and offers service at the rate of one hundred words on the editor's desk in Morse characters for twenty-five cents; fifty words delivered to any post-office address; or twenty-five words specially delivered for the same sum. This makes letters, or at least post-cards, sans the picture, by wire possible if you are in a hurry. The messages are sent and reeeived automatically and thus insures accuracy and speed and reduces both expense of establishment and operating. It is well known that the big telegraph monopolies not only make millions but shelve inventions for improvement of the service often because of the waste it would require to replace the old equipment. Once you have sent a message in England for a six-pence and had it delivered within half an hour you wonder what is the matter at home. England uses the telegraph about three times as much and New Zealand more than five times as much per caput as does this most enterprising of nations.

THE LAIRD OF SKIBO'S DREAM

Andrew Carnegie, next to W. J. Bryan, is the most quoted man of the day, outside of those whose official position brings their words into notice. Scarcely a day passes without Mr. Carnegie doing or saying something interesting. He makes a notable, not to say sensational, speech, in which he advocates some reform that is startling, or he writes a magazine article that does the same thing, or he appears before a congressional committee and advocates tariff reduction, or he issues a new book that is decidedly original, or he makes some great new gift, or does some other thing that shows he is young though over seventy and evidently is enjoying life, in the full possession of mental powers, fortune, and a great reputation. His tariff creed as quoted from Mill is to the effect that a tariff is admissable in a new country or in the case of a new industry until once it is established, but not after it has been placed on a substantial footing with the same industry in the world. He thus frankly reveals to us the great cause for the making of his own immense fortune, but avers that they could have done quite as well these many years without the duty on steel. But his great dream is revealed in his new book entitled "Problems of Today." It is a vision of the time when Capital and Labor will be one, and the first strands of the bond he sees in the profit-sharing schemes of today. The fishing fleet is a picture to him of the ideal industrial relation, every man on it from chief skipper to last cabin boy sharing in the profit of the season upon a percentage division. He would have each co-operator paid a salary that would constitute a minimum wage and insure a living, the capital of the concern standing behind the assurance, and all share of the profits or losses on a pro-rata basis to be agreed upon, with a fair division according to the skill and ability contributed. That day he believes is coming and "thus is labor soon to attain its deserved place and recompense, and workman and capitalist become one—the wage system, except a minimum, being displaced by a division of profits."

THE COLLEGE PRESIDENT: SCHOLAR OR ENDOWMENT PROMOTER?

The college president is very often chosen because of his ability to get money. If a man can be found who possesses also the scholarly qualifications that the position is supposed to demand, very well and good, he will be given the preference; but if not he must be a money getter. President Taylor, of Vassar, testifies that it is a most disagreeable job for the man of academic tastes. He says, "I have been insulted more than once. A college president ought to say to his board of trustees, 'I am through, I will have no more of it.' * * * I would like to rub it into this generation that money is not everything." He adds that money must be found but that education must be kept free from the dollar ideal, that the best money getter is the business man who takes an interest and goes to his fellows with a proposition to invest in a good cause. It requires more versatility than the ordinary or even the extraordinary teacher and scholar possesses to be a scholar, teacher, administrator, and money getter. There are such men, but they are the exception that proves the rule. Let Christian business men raise the money.

CRIMINALS OR MARTYRS?

Sam'l Gompers, for twenty-six years the leader of the greatest living host of organized labor, Frank Morrison, Secretary of the American Federation of Labor, and John Mitchell, the most loved labor leader of the land, are branded as common criminals in one of the most scathing and intemperate decisions ever read in an American court. The case involved a principle that required calm and deliberate opinion and the decision of a just and reasonable court. To have these men held in contempt ought not cause any dissent if it were done for the sake of settling finally a mooted point that involves a question at law or the rights and privileges of citizens under the constitution. An injunctlon was issued against the publishers of the American Federationists directing them to desist from the publication of an "Unfair List." This "Unfair List" was simply a list of firms that were not friendly to organized labor. It compelled no man to any deed, but did advise union labor not to patronize those who were "Unfair" to the cause and the unions. This "Unfair List" was characterized by the injudicious judge as "false and malicious libels on the integrity of honorable men" and the men who published it denounced as "misguiding leaders, swollen by pigmy powers." These leaders of organized labor continued to publish the "Unfair List" after the injunction was issued, upon the advice of some of the greatest constitutional lawyers of the nation, in order to bring to a test the question it involved. They were advised that it was not a conspiracy as charged in the injunction issued, but that the injunction itself was unconstitutional in that it deprived citizens of the right of free speech. This the vehement judge answers by saying that the constitution nowhere guarantees the right to speak, print, or publish, but that it simply forbids congress to abridge it and remands the right to abridge it to the several states. This is certainly something new under the sun. The real issues involved seem to be whether or not the so-called "boycott by suasion" is construable as a conspiracy under the law, whether an injunction against it is a denial of constitutional rights, and as to the limits of the powers of injunction. It may well be hoped that the Court of Appeals will send it to the Supreme Court for final decision, for it cannot be settled elsewhere. Should that court hold these men in contempt it will equal the famous Taff Vale ruling of the House of Lords in England a few years ago, which resulted in some of the most radical laws in favor of the rights of labor ever recorded. If these great leaders of labor can suffer humiliation for a time for the winning of such rights they may well bear the stigma of criminals for a day. The world moves forward by putting its great-hearts among its malefactors. The decision of the court in this case is not so much to be deplored as the temper in which it was given. To make a wholesale denunciation of labor unions and labor leaders and the cause they represent as "unrefined insult, coarse affront, vulgar indignity" and to characterize a case presented by such lawyers as Judge Parker and representing such men as John Mitchell, as a contest "between the supremacy of law over the rabble or its prostration under the feet of a disordered throng" cannot help the case of the Manufacturer's Association much in the popular mind, and it is the popular mind that will rule and that right quickly if sufficiently aroused.

THE END OF WAR

While they are drawing up rules to govern active warfare in London the Wrights are attaining new wonders in France with their flying machine, and Octave Chanute, the first of recognized authorities on aerial navigation, says, "The end of war is in sight." Count Zepelin will soon be ready to demonstrate anew the power of the solid dirigible to make long flights and regular trips between designated places, while the Scientific American talks about the possibility of vacuum envelopes after the Zepelin model, a type that would do away with many of the weaknesses of a gas bag. Roy Knabenschue recently sailed about over the city of Los Angeles at a great height and threw confetti "bombs" enough to have effectually destroyed the city had they been actual high class explosives. At the same time he effectually answered the critics who claimed ineffectiveness for bombardment by an air ship of any kind because it would be impossible to drop bombs from it, thus lightening the load, and maintain a navigable position in the air. True, the last Hague Conference forbade the use of air vessels for dropping bombs, but that has not the authority of international law until legally enacted by the treaty making powers of the several nations, and there is no more reason for making such an enactment than there is for ruling out shimose or lyddite or decreeing that the Dreadnaught is the finality in battleships. It would be tantamount to a beginning of disarmament. Theoretically the Wright aerodrome should easily arise to a height of two thousand feet, sail eighty miles an hour, and remain aloft as long as the motor would run. They have actually attained a height of over tree hundred feet, sailed more than a mile a minute, and remained in the air nearly two hours, and they have never tempted fate by going to the apparent limit. No gun can be trained at sharp enough angle to reach even a comparatively low altitude, and if so could not be effectually aimed at a speck in the sky going a mile a minute. There only remains the battle above the clouds, a thing too horrible to be imagined and too expensive to be provided for. Meanwhile the moral sentiment against war increases mightily and is more powerful than deadly invention.

"Remember"

It is the testimony of history that the Romans worshiped, among their many deities, a goddess whose face was turned back over her shoulder, and whose name was "Memoria." If any of the powers of the soul has the right to such apotheosis, it is surely this one of memory. For practically all we have is the past. The future is not yet in our possession. The present is a mere vanishing point. The past alone abides.

At the close of the year it is natural to look backward. Our almost habitual attitude is one of interest in the future. The fascination of change is upon us. Like children, we want to see the next thing. If we are moving, when are we going to stop? If we are quiet, when shall we start again? Even the oldest finds this spell of expectancy upon him. We say that youth looks forward, and age backward, but it is only partially true. Old people are often as eager and expectant as children, and when the long ranges of life are considered, the vast years to come, why should they not be, for one is scarcely older than the other.

But at the end of the year the pull of events is backward, even though but for a moment. The very fact that accounts must be cast up and inventories taken gives point to retrospection, and in that backward glance it is easy to see that we share with the community a great fund of common experiences, good and evil. During the year some notable public men and women have fallen out of the ranks, some large public enterprises have come to birth, some valuable books have taken form, some great catastrophes have befallen the world. But what concerns us as individuals far more than these notable events is the series of personal experiences through which we have passed. Few of them had to do with matters that ever reached the public, but to us they have been of profound significance for good or evil. A new friendship was formed which promises to be the most inspiring we have enjoyed. A new door of love was opened, which has already revealed depths and mysteries in life undreamed of before. A book was read which has changed the front of the world to us. A valued acquaintance betrayed a confidence and in one moment fell from our sky like Lucifer, son of the morning. A temptation successfully resisted brought new joys of mastery over self and circumstances. And these events all unknown to the world of common report, made for us a year of intense interest, whose silent events have meant more to us than naval world tours, presidential elections or the passing of princes.

The use which one makes of his own past is the measure of the man. It is strange what control we have over our own previous experiences if we wish it. On the other hand, we may be mastered by them. Zola tells in his story, "Lourdes," of a girl who suffered a fall, the nervous shock of which, together with the slight injury sustained, left her a helpless paralytic. There was no reason for the loss of power save in the centering of morbid attention on that scene in the past to which the mind reverted whenever the impulse came to move the helpless limbs. For years she remained a cripple, controlled by a single insignificant episode in the past, yet powerless to divert her mind from the hallucination that she was really paralysed. No doubt thousands suffer, physically, mentally, or morally, from just such experiences. A harmless accident has given rise to imaginary disease; a sudden fright has left them needlessly, but quite really cowards; a moment's embarrassment or shame has left its impress in an apparently hopeless awkwardness. Such people are letting their past reach out its dead hand to control them. Relief can only come by a resolute and courageous facing of that unpleasant incident, a quiet fixing of attention upon it till its trivial character is seen, the ghost is laid, and freedom is won. A horse, which has been terrified by a passing train, can never be cured of his disease of fright until he is gently but firmly made to fix his attention upon the cause of alarm, and then the cause of the fright is forever removed. Thousands are finding emancipation from some paralysing moment of the past in skillful and kindly treatment. It is a new application of the apostolic word, "Remember."

But in more frequent instances is the past discovered to be a source of power. A moment of crucial testing furnishes the theme for lifelong satisfaction. A great danger overcome is the topic of a thousand recitals, and "the peril of an hour makes the epic of a life." We learn how to manipulate and transform our past, so that it loses its gloom and becomes an inspiration. No veteran would willingly forget the hardships which he recalls at the campfire of his post. No explorer would wish to omit from his life the terrible struggle with savages from which he barely escaped alive. No business man wants to forget the hardships of his first years as a clerk, or how early in his married life it was a question how the little household could be sustained. These experiences were trying in their day, but now memory uses them as the interpreters of the success which has been achieved. The past is one's best possession, even though he knows with Browning that "the best is yet to be." "Remember" is still the open sesame to the treasures of life.

And then, best of all, the past can be made after whatever pattern we choose. For the present is plastic, and the present will become the past in another instant. To make our own past a monitor by which to shape the day we have, to see the long line of the ages behind us in their vast perspective of heroisms, sacrifices, martyrdoms, struggles, with the Cross of Christ at the far end, and all this wealth of effort poured out that we, "the heirs of all the ages, in the foremost files of time" may be worthy of our heritage, this is to "Remember," and in remembrance to find hope.

The New Civic Idealism

Mr. Nicholas Vachel Lindsay, of Springfield, Ill., has been delivering a series of ten addresses before the Y. M. C. A. of his home city on "Composite Citizenship." He has treated the immigration problem from the standpoint adopted by Israel Zangwill in "The Melting Pot," though his theme was announced and his discussion begun before Mr. Zangwill's play came out. The course has awakened not a little interest in the city. Mr. Lindsay is an idealist of uncompromising character. On the occasion of his last lecture the program contained a poem by the lecturer in which he expressed the ideal possibilities not of Lincoln's city alone, but of every city. The civic idealism that is fast growing up amongst our people makes these stanzas significant beyond their local setting.

ON THE BUILDING OF SPRINGFIELD.

Let not our town be large—remembering
  That little Athens was the Muses' home,
That Oxford rules the heart of London still,
  That Florence gave the renaissance to Rome.

Record it for the grandson of your son—
  A city is not builded in a day:
Our little town cannot complete her soul
  Till countless generations pass away.

Now let each child be joined as to a church
  To her perpetual hopes, each man ordained;
Let every street be made a reverent aisle
  Where music grows and beauty is unchained.

Let Science and Machinery and Trade
  Be slaves of her, and make her all in all—
Building against our blatant restless time
  An unseen, skillful, medieval wall.

Like Nuremburg against the robber knights
  Let her keep out the wealth bereft of sense—
Putting her ban upon the stupid toys
  Of private greed and greasy arrogance.

Let every citizen be rich toward God,
  Let Christ, the beggar, teach divinity—
Let no man rule who holds his money dear,
  Let this, our city, be our luxury.

We should build parks that students from afar
  Would choose to starve in, rather than go home—
Fair little squares, with Phidian ornament—
  Food for the spirit, milk and honeycomb.

Songs shall be sung by us in that good day—
  Songs we have written—blood within the rhyme
Beating, as when Old England still was glad,
The purple, rich Elizabethan time.

Say, is my prophecy too fair and far?
  I only know, unless her faith be high,
The soul of this our Nineveh is doomed,
Our little Babylon will surely die.

Some city on the breast of Illinois
  No wiser and no better at the start,
By faith shall rise redeemed—by faith shall rise
  Bearing the western glory in her heart—

The genius of the Maple, Elm and Oak,
  The secret hidden in each grain of corn—
The glory that the prairie angels sing
  At night when sons of Life and Love are born—

Born but to struggle, squalid and alone,
  Broken and wandering in their early years.
When will they make our dusty streets their goal,
  Within our attics shed their sacred tears?

When will they start our vulgar blood athrill
  With living language—words that set us free?
When will they make a path of beauty clear
  Between our riches and our liberty;

We must have many Lincoln-hearted men—
  A city is not builded in a day—
And they must do their work, and come and go
  While countless generations pass away.

On The Religious Significance of Poetry

By Marietta Neff

The fundamental objection to didacticism in literature is not, one may venture to suggest, any subjective criterion of taste, but the simplest of logical principles—that life is larger than anything one can say about it, experience more complex than any formula, the test of the ways of the spirit of man more subtly wonderful than the power of any gloss to define. Things that are generally accepted are generally wrong; truths that can be reduced to a proposition have lost their vitality. It is the failure to remember just these truisms,—themselves only half truths, to be sure, by virtue of their formulation, that is in large measure responsible for the inability of the world to understand the religious significance of poetry. Men and women content themselves with the dry bones of moralizing and didacticism such as they read in hymns and other types of second grade poetry, finding religious values in what is often neither true nor artistic, when the whole body of that great literature which has in it the breath of life awaits their acceptance.

Because hymns do not often, except by grace, come under the head of poetry, and because a discussion of them, even if they were looked upon as literature, would confine one to a very narrow field; one may find more profit in contemplating the results of indulging in didacticism or refraining from it, in the case of a very little of the best known English secular poetry,—bearing always in mind that the contention of the anti-didactic point of view is that the large serenities, the sharp stimuli of poetry, all the good and gracious appeals that contribute toward the religious acceptance of life are to be found in non-didactic poetry in a fashion that makes significant the popular desire to abolish the hoary distinction between sacred and secular.

William Wordsworth was one of the greatest of those poets to whom the moral tag was forever a curse,—possibly because to him the moralizing tendency of youth was potently divine; because to him the "six-years darling of a pigmy size" was a > "Mighty Prophet! Seer blest!

> On whom those truths do rest
> Which we are toiling all our lives to find."

It had been better had the poet who concluded the noble ode on immortality with the words,

> "To me the meanest flower that blows can give > Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears," remembered that there are thoughts which do often lie too deep for words; for Maeterlinck has said truly that we speak only when life is sluggish in us.

The really great Wordsworth was not he who wished to be "considered as a teacher or as nothing," not the poet who, as Keats said has a "palpable design upon us"—even so noble a design as that in "Tintern Abbey," but he who in "Composed upon Westminster Bridge" or "The Solitary Reaper" displayed unacknowledged affinities with the faith that

> "———they shall be accounted poet kings
> Who simply tell the most heart-easing things,—" the faith that > the silver flow

> Of Hero's tears, the swoon of Imogen,
> Fair Pastorella in the bandit's den,
> Are things to brood on with more ardency
> Than the death-day of empires."

This Wordsworth who might have had fellowship with Keats was he who found "pre-eminently dear,"

> "The gentle Lady married to the Moor;
> And heavenly Una with her milk-white Lamb."

If it be objected that Keats' consciousness was so "embroidered with dim dreams" as to be incapable of a healthy attitude toward life, one may recall Browning, the most robust of poets, who believed heartily that

> "If you get simple beauty and nought else,
> You get about the best thing God invents."

It is characteristic of Robert Browning that in spite of his tremendous moral earnestness and his consequent inclination toward didacticism, his love of beauty kept him in most cases from the offensive moral tag at the close of a poem. He loves to end a poem with the intensely human, concrete appeal. What could be more splendidly effective than the conclusion of "My Last Duchess?"

> "notice Neptune, though,
> Taming a sea-horse thought a rarity,
> Which Claus of Innsbruck cast in bronze for me."

or the exalted abandon of the closing verses of "In a Gondola"?

> "Still kiss me. Care not for the cowards. Care
> Only to put aside thy beauteous hair,
> My blood will hurt. The Three, I do not scorn
> To death, because they never lived; but I
> Have lived indeed, and so—(yet one more kiss)—can die."

Indeed even when Browning's conclusions are abstract, they are so in an intensely romantic fashion. Who can read "Time's Revenges" without being haunted by the lines—

> "There may be heaven; there must be hell;
> Meantime there is our earth here—well?"

Browning's closing a poem with some ecstatic concord or some tantalizing dissonance suggests by contrast the conclusion of the "Ancient Mariner" which is a most flagrant instance of discontent with anything but C Major of this life as a note upon which to rest.

It is not unusual to speak of the poets' spiritualization of the love of a man and a woman, because it is so obvious a thing that the poets alone among men are best able to say how great and satisfying a religious love may be, enabling all lovers to become reconciled to life through numberless variations of the simple words forever on the lips of each one of them.—"Who has found thee knows wherefore he is in the world." If one were to search for some less hackneyed standard whereby the poet's greatness is severely tested, one might perhaps best choose his manner of treating death; for in touching upon such a subject, if a poet be conventional, he must needs give himself up to futile moralizing, or to a strained attempt to ignore the facts. What stimulus to brain or heart, is to be found in Gray's assurance that "The paths of glory lead but to the grave," or Whitter's sigh for him who cannot see "the stars shine through his cypress trees," or Bryant's solemn reminder that "all that breathe will share thy destiny," or Longfellow's foolish insistence that "there is no death"?

Let him who would take our mortal destiny with some daring, with some gracious nonchalance, with some truly religious acceptance, read the "Stirrup-Cup."

> "Death, thou'rt a cordial old and rare:
> Look how compounded, with what care.
> Time got his wrinkles reaping thee
> Sweet herbs from all antiquity.

David to thy distillage went,
Keats, and Gotama excellent,
Omar Khayyam, and Chaucer bright,
And Shakespeare for a king-delight.
Then, Time, let not a drop be spilt:
Hand me the cup whene'er thou wilt;
'Tis thy rich stirrup-cup to me;
I'll drink it down right smilingly."

Let him read "Whispers of Heavenly Death" or let him read that wonderful "Last Invocation."

"At the last, tenderly,
From the walls of the powerful, fortress'd house,
From the clasp of the knitted locks—from the keep of the well-closed doors,
Let me be wafted.
Let me glide noiselessly forth;
With the key of softness unlock the locks—with a whisper,
Set open the doors, O Soul.
Tenderly! be not impatient!
(Strong is your hold, O mortal flesh, Strong is your hold, O love.)

And thus it is that if one were to give some attention not only to the poets who have been briefly mentioned here, but to all the good company of singers, one would find that the greatest poetry has the didactic element either much subordinated, or included in so external a fashion as to be easily separable from what is genuine, or, best of all, entirely absent.

In the introduction to that wise and witty poem, "Fifine at the Fair," the poet tells us that "Emancipate through passion

And thought.
For heaven—poetry"—

We give our minds to the "spirit-sort," who "move in a finer element."

"Whatever they are, we seem:
Imagine the thing they know,
All deeds they do we dream;
Can heaven be else but so?"

No poetry, it is true, can give us life, as it actually is, even the comedy of the street and of the drawing-room; no poetry can give us the chivalrous grace of young romance or the strength and quietness and breathless certitude of a maturer love; no poetry can give us the bugle blast of battle, the horror of carnage, the tramp of victorious armies. But if the function of poetry be after all the religious function of stirring high passion, of making the heart sensitive to the finer issues of life, of speaking to the listening soul with voices that are not heard on earth forever save in dreams,—if these appeals constitute the function of poetry then indeed, its essence must be, not a ponderous didacticism, but even so frail and fleeting a thing as beauty like the poignant fairness of moonlight waters, or of silvery pools under the sun of early winter, or of blue lakes at peace with the blue sky; even, moreover, beauty as vast and terrible as the surge and thunder of multitudinous seas.

It is at rare intervals happily true that this beauty may be closely associated with what is conventionally looked upon as a religious idea. Any one who has learned to love "The Ballad of Trees and the Master," knows that there are moods in which it makes a subtler appeal than the New Testament

"Into the woods my Master went,
Clean forspent, forspent.
Into the woods my Master came,
Forspent with love and shame.
But the olives they were not blind to Him,
The little gray leaves were kind to Him:
The thorn-tree had a mind to Him
When into the woods He came,
Into the woods my Master went,
And He was well content.
Out of the woods my Master came,
Content with death and shame.
When Death and Shame would woo Him, last,
From under the trees they drew Him last:
'Twas on a tree they slew Him—last
When out of the woods He came."

But this religious value is not the exclusive possession of poetry that is rich in the connotations of historical Christianity. Any rare and perfect work of art may have it. One may well believe that of all poetry tragedy exhibits the most exquisite spiritual quality. And of all tragedies Hamlet, it may be, is most noble,—too noble for speech; for it leaves one, when the ultimate sweet dignity of death rests at last upon the white cold face of the Prince, able only to repeat after him his own words, "The rest is silence." And one closes the book with one's heart great with the flood of unshed tears that will never be transformed into the foolish rain of the eyes.

The function of tragedy must ever be what Aristotle called it,—the purification of the emotional nature. None of the mean and petty seven devils of little passions can make his habitation in the soul that has been swept and garnished by the power of great tragic poetry. If the religious influence of this poetry consisted only in exorcism, however, it would make such sentimentalists of men, as almost purely negative morality has a tendency to do. It must, too, enlarge one's life as well as purify it. Hamlet must give one some divine insight, whereby he can attribute

"Wholeness to th' almost-folk that hurt our hope—
Those heart-break Hamlets who so barely fail
In life or art that but a hair's more scope
Had set them fair on heights they ne'er may scale."

The mission of tragedy is thus to give one such vicarious participation in the imperfect nobilities of humanity, in its sublime capacity for enduring the wrath of the gods, that his individual consciousness shall be linked by stronger and sweeter affinities with the larger social consciousness.

As for all great poetry, then, one may repeat in slightly different terms the truth about the religious value of tragedy,—that poetry is to preserve one from a "facile orthodoxy," from any tendency to compress life into neat formulae, from any danger of too great respect for the wisdom of schools. Poetry is to be a cordial to one's heart, a light to one's eyes, music to one's ears,—even a thorn in one's flesh, or a bitter wind to dispel one's drowsiness,—any influence, in truth, which will produce that spiritual hyperaesthesia without which one can maintain no ecstasy in life.

Spiritual Dangers of the Minister

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

I. DESPONDENCY.

Every calling has its peculiar spiritual dangers and, contrary to popular opinion, the ministry of the gospel is not exempt. If by the nature of his calling the minister is removed from many of the temptations that beset other people, there are others just as real and terrible against which he has to be on his guard. Perhaps they are more terrible, because directed against the very foundation of his spiritual life. Down in the valley there are the ague and the fever, but up in the mountain top there are the sudden avalanche and crevasse and the awful plunge over the precipice.

One of the chinks in the minister's armor is his peculiar liability to fits of depression. Temperament apart, the man who labors with and for souls is sure sooner or later, more or less often, to pass through this furnace. It is part of the entail of his calling. The more in earnest he is in his work, the more terrible is the experience, and happy is he who emerges without the smell of the fire on his garments.

Here is a cry from the depths, taken at random from one of our religious journals: "I am discouraged with preaching. I do not seem to be accomplishing anything. Many times have I wished that I was at something else. I guess that the only reason I am preaching is that nothing else seems to offer. Am I a hireling? What am I to do?"

Now, if that were a description of the man's real attitude towards the ministry, he would doubtless be a hireling. It is almost certain however, that it is not a true description. He is a spiritually sick man. He is honest enough; but he is losing his spiritual nerve. He is undergoing the temptation that came to Elijah in the mount, and that quelled for a moment even the strong spirit of Moses, the temptation of "Is it worth while?" and of "What's the use?"

This temptation has a double basis. To begin with, it is a puestion of nerves. From the days of Moses the prophet has always been overworked. That cannot be helped: it belongs to the calling. A minister's work is never done. Even when it seems to be, there are always fresh tears to be dried, new burdens to be lifted, other sheep to be tended; so that each new day for the true minister of the gospel of succour always carries with it the arrears of that which has gone before. Moreover his calling brings him in contact day in and day out with the seamy side of life. Sin, sorrow, death—and worse—are the things above all others he must know intimately. He comes home day after day from his pastoral rounds, sick with his people's sicknesses, both temporal and spiritual, and crucified with their sins. No wonder that his brain is sometimes fagged! No wonder that, watch as he may, the seeds of discouragement sometimes bear their bitter fruit in his soul!

But the spiritual ground of this temptation is even more important. It is lack of faith. Above all others the minister must walk by faith. He seldom sees the real results of his labors, for the things of the spirit have no reliable statistics. The deepest and most lasting fruits of a ministry are always the least visible. The minister can count "accessions," but he cannot always trace the finger of God as it writes itself on human hearts; he can hear words of praise or blame about his sermons, but the people he has really helped are those who are likely to leave the church with thoughts that cannot be uttered. What is the result? Too often the failure of his faith. Because he does not see, like Thomas, he will not believe. He will not even recognize the nailprints, but mistakes them for marks of failure instead of victory. Thus he sinks under a burden of his own creating, and complains that he is a failure when Omnipotence itself has assumed the responsibility for every honest, prayerful hour of his ministry.

We have high authority for calling this morbid state of mind a "spiritual danger." It was a well recognized and defined sin in the church as early as the fifth century and went by the name of "acedia." It finds its place in the books of penance. There was much discussion as to whether it was a deadly sin, which Thomas Aquinas settles in the affirmative on true scholastic grounds. Dante speaks of it in his "Inferno," and Chaucer in the "Persones Tale" calls it "that roten sin." Here is one discription of it which has a peculiarly modern ring: "When the poor fellow is beset with it, it makes him detest the place where he is, and loathe his cell; and he has a poor and scornful opinion of his brethren, near and far, and thinks that they are neglectful and unspiritual. It makes him sluggish and inert for every task; he cannot sit still nor give his mind to reading; he thinks despondently how little progress he has made where he is, how little good he gains or does.....

He dwells much on the excellence of other and distant monasteries; he thinks how profitable and healthy life is there; how delightful the brethren are and how spiritually they talk" and much else of the same nature.

The experience of Mazzini, the Italian patriot, who for a while fell a victim to this enemy of the soul, is instructive and shows us in what direction we should turn for the renewal of our faith in God and man. Reviewing his experience when he at the time realized that his devotion to the cause of his country was costing him all that he valued most in life, and sending him out into the wilderness alone, he writes: "When I felt that I was indeed alone, I drew back in terror at the void before me. There in that moral desert doubt came upon me. Perhaps I was wrong and the world right?..... One morning I awoke to find my mind tranquil and my spirit calmed, as one who passed through a great danger. The first thought that passed through my spirit was, 'Your sufferings are the temptation of egotism and arise from a misconception of life'..... Life is a mission, duty therefore its highest law. From the idea of God I descended to faith in a mission and its logical consequence—duty the supreme rule of life; and having reached that faith, I swore to myself that nothing in this world should again make me doubt or forsake it. It was, as Dante says, passing through martyrdom to peace—'a forced and desperate peace.' I do not deny, for I fraternized with sorrow and wrapped myself in it as in a mantle; but yet it was peace for I learned to suffer without rebellion and to live calmly and in harmony with my own spirit..... Whether the sun shine with the serene splendor of an Italian moon, or the leaden corpselike hue of the northern mists be above us, I cannot see that it changes our duty. God dwells above the earthly heaven and the holy stars of faith and the future still shine within our souls, even though their light consume itself unreflected as the sepulchral lamp."

The Gospel of the Helping Hand

By Charles Reign Scoville

THE LAST HALF OF DR. SCOVILLE'S ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE NEW ORLEANS CONVENTION.

I came to this platform directly from a city where last year the Masonic Lodge took a class of 500 men into the Scottish Rights degree at one time, and each of these men paid $135.00 for the privilege of taking this step, or a grand total of $67,500. By what means did the Lodge induce these men to lay down this amount of money? What argument did they use to induce them to take this step? There is but one answer. The lodge sees to it that while a man is going through the pearly gates his wife is not going to the poor house, nor his children to the county home. It is this and not the compass and the square, the plumb line, or the hour glass, that wins the hearts of men. Conducting the stately ceremonies and holding social gatherings thus binding the ties of brotherhood—these the Lodge "have done," but they have not "left the other undone."

The Salvation Army has gone right down through the misery, wretchedness and poverty of this old sin-cursed earth, and have made a bright path across our globe like the Milky Way across the sky. They have undoubtedly won as many stars for their crowns, and how? Not by pleading for a shivering girl to come to prayer meeting or to preaching, but by putting an old shawl around her shivering shoulders—thus by opening up a home here they have opened up the way of hope of the Eternal Habitation. Though the poorest and most illiterate of all religious peoples, they have through this door, gained an entrance into the heart of humanity, and into the good graces of the whole religious world.

As a people, we have stood by and watched the Catholics and Adventists and Lodges, with their hospitals and orphanages, gather the purest and most helpless, the aged and the little ones in, and all the time our Master has been saying, "Suffer the little children to come unto me." By an unexplainable indifference, or by a sinful, criminal carelessness, like the disciples of old, we have "withstood Him." Let the Bride of the Lamb come before the world with the motherly care of the children of God and all the ends of the earth, with lifted hats and bowed heads, will pray in concert, "Thy Kingdom come, Thy will be done in 'us,' as it is in Heaven." It is the callous in the hand and not the crown on the head that will make the world stop, look and listen.

A blessed mother was rocking a baby girl to sleep one night when the little one said, "I love your eyes, mamma, I love your cheeks, I love your chin, and I love your lips, for they are beautiful. But I do not love your hands, for they have such big, ugly scars." Silent tears came into the mother's eyes, and she quietly told the little one a story of how a bride of two summers once came into a room and discovered a cradle all in flames. Tucked away in the folds of that blazing cradle was an infant baby girl, and the mother vividly described how the mother nearly lost her hands and arms in rescuing the child. The little girl was silent but a moment; then she said, "I love your eyes, mamma, I love your cheeks, I love your chin, and I love your lips, but I love your hands the best of all," and the little one kissed the scarred hands again and again. The world is looking for the nail prints. Let us prove by our hands that we have been with Jesus and learned of Him. This sort of Christian evidence must not be left "undone."

Too much cannot be said of Church Extension. A chirping brood of chicks at sundown, when the coop has been removed, is not to be compared to a homeless congregation, a flock without a fold. He who revealed in such minute detail the construction of the Tabernacle, and the building of the Temple, and who, himself, is the architect of the "House not made with hands," would certainly not have his children, or his church, without a home. The advantages of the best possible location and the right kind of a building at the opportune time for our plea and people are beyond all that figures can describe, or ideas conceive of. But our very victories along every line will only the more humiliate us if we fail to care for our helpless and weak. It would certainly please Him who said, "In my Father's house are many mansions. I go to prepare a place for you." If our Benevolent Association could go from this New Orleans Convention with sufficient funds to say to our aged and infants everywhere, our Orphanages and Homes are "many mansions" and we go to prepare a room for you. Let such goodness and mercy follow the dear old people and the children all the days of our lives, and the whole world will want to dwell in the house of the Lord forever. Our brotherhood without our Benevolent Association would be like an army without a Red Cross hospital system. The very memories of victories like those of Admiral Dewey or Admiral Togo, or any other officer on land or sea, would cause a blush of shame to come to our faces if there had been no provision made for the sick and afflicted, and no pension provided to care for the orphans and widows of the soldiers. "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." Fighting the battles in the name of the Lord of Hosts and winning the victories for Him—"These ought ye to have done," but caring for the orphans and widows of the soldiers of the cross "ye ought not to have left undone."

When Field Marshall Oyama learned that many hundred pounds were to be expended in a jollification in commemoration of the great victories won by himself and his troops, he cabled the Japanese government not to waste these funds in such fireworks but to save them for the orphans and the widows of his soldiers. Some of the government's officials seriously objected to this, saying that Oyama got these ideas from his Christian wife. And they said that the Jesus Religion was to blame. Our missionary, Miss Bertha Clawson, who wrote this to me, closed her letter by saying, "if Oyama holds firmly and his desires are carried out, it will be a great compliment to the Jesus religion."

"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is 'indeed' this, to visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction," as well as to "keep oneself unspotted from the world." Hence I repeat, building churches, these things ought ye to have done, but not to have left the care of the orphan and the aged undone.

I am not unmindful of the place and power of the college. Endow Bethany? To be sure, and also endow Drake, Cotner, Hiram, Kentucky University, etc. For without these great schools short indeed would be our race from the cradle to the grave. But the world by wisdom knows not God. The college for the brain, the government for the will, but the church is for the heart. The Saviour of the world is saying, "Son, daughter, give me thy heart." The college needs the purifying, sanctifying influence of the Benevolent Association. Though her students speak with the tongues of men and angels and have not love, they will become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. Though they have all knowledge, and all faith, without this sacrificial love they will become as nothing. The great Teacher Himself bade the Fishers of men to become Shepherds of sheep—"Feed my lambs." And when his disciples were clamoring as to which should be greatest in His Kingdom, he put a child in their midst. While I believe the magnificient, may I say magnanimous, marvelous work of our C. W. B. M. is second to nothing in our great brotherhood, yet I wish to give the rest of my address to this one thing—let us, too, "put a child in the midst."

We hear much of what the child owes to the aged, but the world can never pay its debt to the child. Indeed, "of such is the Kingdom." They are the dew drops of glory. They are the fairest, rarest, only relics of paradise.

They are angels of God in disguise;
They are angels of God indisguise;
His sunlight still sleeps in their tresses,
His glory still gleams in their eyes.
These truants from home and from heaven,
They have made me more manly and mild;
And I know now how Jesus could liken
The kingdom of God to a child."

The world revolves around the child. He who clothes the lilies and marks the sparrow's fall, who protected Moses, and the infant Savious in Egypt, will surely not have us neglect one of these little ones.

The fire of a Reformation may be slumbering in that "tow headed" boy. There may be a Knox, a Wesley, a Whitefield, a Campbell, a Spurgeon, or a Garfield there in embryo. You have no doubt read the "Challenge of the City," but the challenge of the church is the challenge of the children. My lecture and my book shall be written on that subject. If Emerson was right in saying that "Men are what their mother make them," and if mother stamps the coin of character and holds the key of the soul, then the greatest responsibility on earth is our responsibility to the child. An orphanage is as much better than a rescue mission as the light-house guarding crews off the rocks is better than a life line rescuing those already wrestling with the breakers, wrecked on the shoals. If in working for the future of humanity I had my choice of serving near the cradle or near the grave, I would turn to the cradle. For, as John Wanamaker says, "when you save a man you save a unit, and when you save a boy, you save a multiplication table." We all know that when we save an adult we only save a soul, but when we save a child we save a soul plus a life.

No one can measure a child's influence. None but the great teacher sent from God would have "put a child in the midst." A Pullman car was pulling out of a Western city; the berth had been prepared and many passengers had retired. A company of men were making their way from the smoking car to their berths when the foremost man found the narrow aisle blocked by a pair of tiny legs. A little child was kneeling at its mother's knee. Exchanging significant glances, all the party removed their hats and reverently bowed their heads, while a sweet, childish voice repeated with the soul of faith,

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep,
If I should die before I wake,
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

Thus "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength." How often in the homes of this world has the same prayer been sweetly repeated, and how often have careless men and reckless women been drawn from the danger line by the recollection of a little one, whose future depended upon them? What a marvelous contrast between the childless mother who has adopted from the orphanage one of these jewels of Jesus, and one of the French-heeled, kangaroo-shaped, fresco-faced, frizzy-headed society sissys, who lavishes all her time and affection on a brindle pup.

While visiting the High School at Anderson, Ind., a bright faced young lady was pointed out to me by Supt. Pearcy. He afterward told me the story of a blessed old couple who took her from a Chicago orphanage and how she had brightened and purified their hearts and home. One day, however, the old gentleman said, "Mother, if anything should happen to you, I could not bring up this sweet little child and I believe you had better take her back." After many prayers and many tears, both decided it was best to take her back to the Orphanage. Many little clothes were made and everything prepared for the journey back to the city on the morrow. As the old people were retiring near the midnight hour that night they noticed the door leading to the little child's chamber slightly ajar. The old lady said, "Let us go in and look at the little angel once more, as she is sleeping in our home." As they did so the door squeaked and wakened the child. Lifting up her little arms she said, "Sing to me, mamma, sing to me." And the old lady said, "What shall I sing, dearie?" And the baby voice answered, as she lifted up her little arms, "Sing, 'I Need Thee Every Hour'." The journey back to the orphanage was called off right there. Strong arms lifted the baby from the cradle, and warm tears fell upon the little night dress. They kept the child, and the Lord has made their days long in the land.

"There are little ones glancing about in my path,
In want of a friend and a guide;
There are dear little eyes looking up into mine,
Whose tears might be easily dried.
But Jesus may beckon the children away,
In the midst of the grief and their glee,
Will any of them, at the beautiful gate,
Be waiting and watching for me?"

Edward Kimball never dreamed of the everlasting influence his efforts would have for the King and the Kingdom, when he hunted up a fat, uneducated Sunday-school boy, and thus gave Dwight L. Moody to the Christian world. That unknown woman who picked up a little boy on the banks of the Tyne, and took Robert Morrison to Sunday-school, never dreamed that he would translate the Bible for one hundred millions of the Chinese people. A little girl in the great northwest took her father with her to Sunday-school and that father to date has been the means of establishing eleven hundred and eighty Sunday-schools. I am very thankful that our Benevolent Association is not only teaching us the care of the aged, which thing we ought to have done, but is also leading us in that other great work, the care of the children, which work must under no circumstances be left undone.

He whose first pillow was a pillow of straw, and whose last pillow was a pillow of thorns, whose first companions were the oxen of the stall and whose last companions were the thieves on the cross, who was born in another man's manger, and buried in another man's grave, who made his triumphant entry into this world through a barn door, whose only pulpit was the hillside, the back end of Simon's boat, or a well curb, who said "foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man has not a place to lay his head, who came unto his own and his own received him not"—this Savior, this Jesus, this King, this Son of Man, this Son of God, taught us that if we would go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, that if we would win the hearts of America, that if we would endow the colleges, and win all men to the cross, that we must remember that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this—to visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction, and keep ourselves unspotted from the world. And all will be transferred to his own account, both here and hereafter. "For whatsoever ye have done for one of the least of these, my little ones, ye have done it unto me."

My Venture in Psycho-Therapy

By Allen Chesterfield

We have acquired the habit in our family of discussing at the table timely topics. It is not always easy to bring certain subjects down to the level of childish comprehension; but my theory is that if parents occasionally think about the things that interest children, and children think about the things that interest parents, the "organic life of the home," as Dr. Dike would call it, is thereby the gainer. So within a few months, with Mrs. Chesterfield's help, I have sought to explain to Daughter, aged nine, and Son-of-my-love, aged seven, the difference between a Baptist and a Congregationalist, a Republican and a Democrat, a Socialist and an Individualist. The explanations might not pass muster at Harvard University, but they do fairly well for home consumption.

In the course of our pursuit of current themes, we happened upon the Emmanuel Movement. It seemed to me to afford many points of contact with childish minds, and so it proved. Both Daughter and Son-of-my-love were especially delighted about what I told them of Dr. Worcester curing his own boy of a desire to attend moving picture shows and about Dr. McElveen's curing an Evanston baby of the naughty, but by no means uncommon, habit of sucking his thumb. Both children vociferated unanimously, "Tell some more, Papa." But instead of recounting the further triumphs of psycho-therapy I intimated that it might be a good plan for me to talk to them just as they were going to sleep, in the hope of overcoming certain little traits that had not yet yielded to solemn daylight admonitions. But this phase of the subject touched no responsive chord. Indeed, it threw such a chill over the group around the table that I immediately began to discuss the government's prosecution of the Standard Oil monopoly.

A week or two later, on returning home one evening, I found Daughter obsessed with the idea that a little friend next door had ceased to care for her. "Oh, you know that's all nonsense," I said, as I kissed her good night. "Dorothy likes you just as well as she ever did, and you mustn't let any other thought stay in your mind an instant. Go right to sleep, now, like a good girl." Going downstairs it occurred to me that now was the time of all times to work the Emmanuel methods; and, because Daughter is somewhat more plastic in disposition than Son-of-my-love, I considered her a comparatively easy subject. So, without confiding my intention to Mrs. Chesterfield, who, I regret to say, has been all along skeptical of my powers in this line, I slipped upstairs into the darkened room and took my seat quietly by Daughter's bedside.

Apparently she was in the first blissful experience of healthy sleep. So, nerving myself by thinking of Worcester, McElveen, Powell, Sir Oliver Lodge and a few other famous psychists, I settled down to my task. Assuming my most funereal tone, I said: "I do like Dorothy. Dorothy likes me." It sounded so good that I immediately repeated it: "I do like Dorothy. Dorothy likes me." I had just started in on a third trip when Daughter turned over, opened her large eyes and surveyed me somewhat inquisitively, but without breaking silence. I stayed not on the order of my going, but fled at once and resumed my seat in the study, without so much as incurring the slightest suspicion on the part of Mrs. Chesterfield as to where I had been and what I had been doing. She was, I think, absorbed in the columns of the Missionary Herald, or some other popular monthly. Somehow I did not feel like discussing the matter with her, for I felt I had plunged into the game just a little too early, when it would have been wise to have waited for Morpheus to have got in more work.

The next morning I expected Daughter to inquire what I was doing in her room about 8:30 the previous evening; but she held her peace and I thought the entire matter had blown over until a few days later, at my office, I received this letter:

Dear Papa:

Midnight dream! I like Dorothy She likes me! I like Dorothy She likes me! What I woke up one night and heard. turned over and saw a man.

good bye from Elizabeth Chesterfield.

Your night talking just works on boys, know use on girls, be shure, dont try it agin on girls, because it dos'nt work.

The letter inclosed three slips of paper, on two of which were written these words, "I like Dorothy, she likes me"; while on the third appears this, "I like Dorothy little bit, she doesn't like me."

I am now meditating upon adding another to the number of books dealing with psycho-therapy in its various phases. I shall entitle it "Night Talking, Its Possibilities and Its Necessary Limitations." But I meet with no further encouragement from members of my family toward the practice of the art. Indeed, Dorothy has already made me promise that I will never talk to her again after she goes to sleep, unless I notify her in advance, and when I try to change her mind, all she says is, "Papa, you go and talk to Dorothy; she's the one you ought to talk to."—The Congregationalist.

NOW IS THE NICK O' TIME

Now is the time for the friends of the Christian Century and the cause which it represents to aid in building up our subscription list.

The controversy concerning the Centennial Program and the attack on our Missionary Societies having come to an end, as we now hope, our purpose will be to produce a paper that will be an assistant pastor to every preacher into whose congregation it goes.

We mean to make our pages constructive and inspirational. We shall not fear to lead our readers into new truth as God gives ns to see the truth, but our treatment will be irenic, not controversial.

We aspire to be a layman's paper—as well as a preacher's paper. Our pages will discuss life's big problems in which all earnest men and women are interested. We shall have constantly before us the purpose of building up the spiritual life of our readers—in intelligence, in breadth of vision, in zeal. Every member of the Christian Century family should be a better worker in the church and a better citizen of his community as a result of his habitual reading of our pages.

Therefore we are making this direct request of our friends to enlist other readers. We wish to more than double our circulation in this Centennial year. This could easily be done if the enthusiasm conveyed to us in recent letters were directed toward practical effort. Some have already begun this good work. One prominent pastor writes that he has been waiting only until the controversy should be over to make a personal canvass himself in our behalf. Another pastor asks for sample copies to be sent at once to the address of a bright young man whom he has appointed to solicit every family of his church. Yet another assures us that it is his purpose to present the matter from the pulpit next Sunday morning and take subscriptions, then and there.

Without any systematic effort our circulation has increased nearly fifteen per cent in less than two months. With the active support of our loyal friends, the next three months should set us a long way toward our Centennial aim.

We will pay a cash commission to agents who will send us ten or more subscriptions. Write us for terms.

A BALLADE OF CHRISTMAS TIME.

Arthur William Amass.

When summer is sultry with dust and the heat
  And breezes are blowing without the cool rain,
When brooklets are dry as the parching old street
  There's place for our children to think of the pain;
  But when on the meadows the snow-drifts have lain
And squirrels are seen up the saplings to climb
  And nibble the kernels and there to remain,
Then hey!—for the merry glad Christmas time!

When maidens are saucy and never are sweet,
  And lads let the problems defy their dull brain,
And teachers are strict and inclining to beat,
  There's place for our children to think of the pain;
  But when in the morning the girls are so vain,
And laddies are laughing and singing a rhyme,
  And teachers are sunny as sunny old Spain,
Then hey!—for the merry glad Christmas time!

When father is striving against his defeat
  And mother is working and helping the twain,
When grandma is weary and can't even eat
  There's place for our children to think of the pain;
  But when in the winter we count it a gain
To sit by the fire at the evening's prime
  With mistletoe hanging adjacent the crane,
Then hey!—for the merry glad Christmas time!

Read carefully our great premium offer in the advertising pages. Now is certainly the time to subscribe to the Christian Century. The books offered are in some cases worth the price paid for both paper and book. Besides, you can depend on it the Christian Century will be the most interesting paper published in our brotherhood during this our Centennial year.

Moral vs. Legal Evidence

His "New Analogy," that of God as our Father and we as his children is one that I have used much and have heard used much by other ministers. But, as I understand it, the sense in which this analogy is usually applied, is that of adoption. Christ is God's Son by nature, we by adoption. It therefore requires a process of adoption. Men have sinned against God and lost their inheritance. They must come home as did the wayward son and find forgiveness before they can be reinstated as heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ. Certainly the sinner is lost, and more certainly there is some process by which he is saved, and some legal evidence by which he may be assured of his salvation.

Yours Resp'y,

Davenport, Ia. S. M. Perkins.

The above quotation is the last paragraph of a letter the first part of which was commented on in last week's Century.

There is not room here to discuss the metaphysical question involved in the sentence: "Christ is God's son by nature, we by adoption." I simply call attention to the basis of common nature which underlies even legal adoption. No man ever adopted one of the lower animals as a son. Adoption always presupposes the possession of human nature on the part of the one adopted. There is a kinship of nature between God and man which is the ground of all spiritual relationship between them. The divine possibilities of the human are affirmed by Jesus when he said: "Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect." It must be that there is something of the divine in the human which makes possible an adoption of man by God. It is not the thought of Jesus that the difference between him and men, and their relation to God lies in the doctrine that "Christ is a son by nature, we by adoption." If the parable of the "Prodigal Son" represents the relation between God and men, that relationship is certainly not of legal adoption.

The whole issue between legalism and spiritual religion is involved in the last sentence: "Most certainly there is some process by which he is saved and some legal evidence by which he may be assured of his salvation."

Jesus' Teaching.

Why assume that the "process by which he is saved" is a legal process? Could it not be a moral process? In fact that is just what Jesus teaches that it is. Salvation is an inner process, and its consummation is a new spiritual condition. In a single word, according to the teaching of Jesus, salvation is righteousness. I called attention in last week's issue to the pure inwardness of Jesus' righteousness. But we are not so much interested in this discussion in the process of salvation, as the evidences of it. This is the point of issue in this whole matter of legalism. It is the evidence, the signs of sonship to God.

It would ordinarily be the most conclusive proof of sonship if the child looked like the father. But just here is where the human analogy cannot be followed in divine things. Man is not the child of God in the same way that he is the child of his human father. In spiritual things likeness to God is sonship. A boy may look like one man and really be the child of another. He may look or be less like his father than like any other man, but still he is a son, regardless of what he is or how he looks. His father may be good, he may be bad; his father may be handsome, he may be ugly; his father may be learned, he may be ignorant: yet he is a legal son and bears his father's name, lives under his roof, and will inherit his property.

Likeness is Sonship.

Likeness has nothing to do with legal human sonship; it has everything to do with spiritual sonship. A child cannot help being a child of its father; man makes himself a child of God or the devil by his own conduct. He can change fathers. From being a child of God, he can become a child of the devil; from being a child of the devil, he can become a child of God. It all depends upon what a man is, or what he makes himself. Not law or ceremony, but nature, what a man is in his inner moral being, makes him a child of one or the other. It depends upon which one he is more like—God or the devil.

In the Gospel of John, chap. 8:31-59, is the record of a discussion Jesus had with the Jews upon this very subject, the nature and proofs of fatherhood and sonship. The Jews said: "We are the children of Abraham, and that physical relation to him insures us spiritual privileges and blessings." Jesus replied: "You are not the children of Abraham (in the spiritual sense). If ye were Abraham's children ye would do the works of Abraham. But now ye seek to kill me, a man that hath told you the truth, which I heard from God; this did not Abraham. Ye do the works of your father. Ye are of your father the devil."

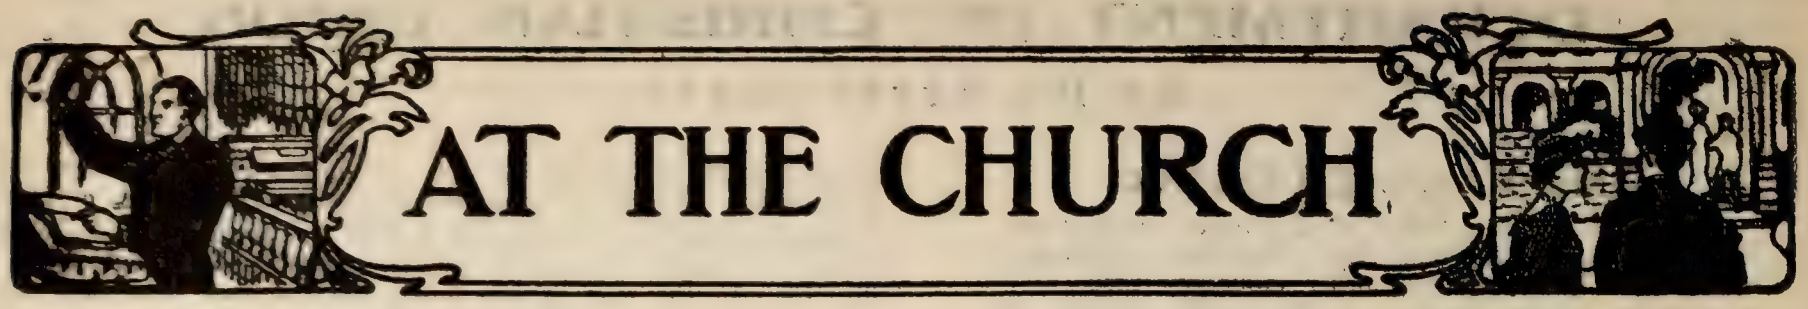
Jesus' principle of sonship is: A man is the child of the one he is like. A man's likeness is shown by the conduct and spirit of his life. In the case of the Jews, they showed who they were like by their attitude toward Jesus and his teaching. "If I say truth, why do ye not believe me? He that is of God heareth the words of God: for this cause ye hear them not because ye are not of God." In other words, there must be truth within, before there can be recognition of the truth without; there must be God within before there can be response to the God without; there must be the likeness of sons of God in the nature of man before there can be evidences of sonship in the life without. Like seeks like: like responds to like.

Whose Child?

Just inner response to the teaching of Jesus—that was Jesus' test of sonship to God. What more could he ask? Legal evidence? But here is the evidence of nature, conduct, attitude toward righteousness. Just inner opposition to the teaching of Jesus—that was proof of sonship to the devil. What more was needed? Legal proof? If a man hates the good, and there is no legal evidence of his sonship, to whom must he belong? If there must be legal evidence, in addition to the moral evidence that a man is the child of God, there must also be legal evidence in addition to the moral evidence that he is the child of the devil. To whom does he belong until that legal evidence is submitted? If not to God, then not to the devil. Is there no way by which we can tell whose child he is? Let John tell us: "My little children let no man lead you astray; he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous: he that doeth sin is of the devil." "In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother."

Natural vs. Legal Evidence.

But the objection will be made that since the inner, spiritual nature is unseen, it can never become outward, demonstrable evidence that one is a Christian; hence some external, "legal evidence" is necessary.



Jesus met this very difficulty when he gave his disciples that principle of discrimination by which to test false prophets: "By their fruits ye shall know them." He foresaw that his disciples would be likely to be imposed upon by "wolves in sheep's clothing," men who had "the form of godliness, but denied the power thereof." They would not be able to examine the heart, the inner nature of every man who presented himself for acceptance as a prophet. What could be more convincing proofs of what a man really was in his heart than the kind of life he lived. The words, deeds, and spirit of a man's life are the outer evidences of the nature of his spirit. These are the visible "fruits" which reveal the kind of life within. They are the only evidences Jesus ever looked for.

But how appropriate such evidences are—the fruits as proofs of the kind of tree or vine. They are natural evidences, and guide the judgment unerringly. "Do men gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles?" Such a phenomenon as potatoes growing on walnut trees, or strawberries on pumpkin vines, is contrary to nature and all experience. "Every good tree bringeth forth good fruit"; that is, fruit corresponding to its nature, by which its species is known. Suppose some one should demand, in addition to nature's own evidence in the fruit, some legal evidence, that a tree was a peach tree instead of an apple tree. Let such "legal evidence" be that a famous fruit grower should pass judgment upon it, or that a ceremony of "peachification" had been pronounced upon it when it was planted. Then no one could be sure what kind of a tree it was from the fruits, though they were unmistakably peaches to any little child that passed it, until the fruit grower had been heard from or the ceremony performed.

If one who believed that a ceremony was necessary to make a tree a peach tree, should be asked concerning a tree he had never seen, whether it were a peach tree, he would not ask to see the fruits, but would ask if it had been peachified by the ceremony of peachification. If so it would then be in the kingdom of peach and enjoy the status of such a tree, if not the character and fruit.

Such is the miserable juggling with reality to which the ceremonial legalist has been reduced. He cannot use his own eyes and taste for himself, as Jesus commanded him to do, to determine the species of life by the kind of fruit; but he must inquire of the history of the tree, whether it was planted legally, and according to the exact form or process the books on the cultivation of trees lay down for such trees. The fruit hanging before his eyes is not enough for him, though it was for Jesus of Nazareth. A tree is what it is, and not the process by which it was planted.

Sunday School Lesson

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

THE DISCIPLES AND THE CHRIST.

The Day of Pentecost was the birthday of the Church of Christ. It was the time when the group of believers in Jesus became for the first time conscious of itself as a living organism, with the power of permanence. It was not the beginning of the kingdom of God, except as that term is limited to the visible church. The kingdom of God is as old as man's need and God's love. The Church of Christ is the embodiment of redemptive effort in a company of those who have obtained the mind of Christ. The Kingdom of God is the reign of divine love and service in the hearts of men; it is the realization of the prayer, Thy will be done; it is the complex of redeemed souls and redemptive forces in the universe. The church is the outward expression of the Kingdom and the leadership of Christ, and is the proof and manifestation of the grace of God revealed in him; it is the living body that carries the purposes of the Kingdom to their successful issue.

Gathering of the Pilgrims.

The Day of Pentecost was a propitious time for the inauguration of the new enterprise. It was only fifty days after the Passover when Jesus suffered. All the facts of his life and death were fresh in the minds of the people. There were few of those Jews, Hellenists and Proselytes who came up to Jerusalem to attend the feast who had not heard since their arrival of the strange events which had so mightily disturbed the city seven weeks before. At that time, as today, the Jews were scattered throughout the world. From their ancient home in Palestine they had been carried forth by exile, scattered by war and persecution, or lured by the trading privileges granted to new cities by the empire. They were in all the lands, yet, as today, a separate people; a race without a nationality, a people without a land. Yet to the country once made sacred by national memories it was their custom to return as frequently as time and means permitted. As the Mohammedan of today hopes to make at least one pilgrimage to Mecca, or the Catholic to Rome, so the Jews of that age coveted the opportunity of setting foot upon the holy soil, and celebrating one of the feasts at the temples. For those who lived near more frequent journeys were possible. To all, in the measure of their ability, such journeys were a duty and a prized enjoyment. At such times great caravans of pilgrims wended their way to the newly completed fane of Herod. Increasing in numbers as they neared the city, "they went from strength to strength, every one of them appearing at last before God in Zion."

The Lands of the Dispersion.

The regions represented in such a gathering of the faithful can be learned from the summary given in the text. Some were from the far east, Parthia, Media, Elam and the Mesopotamian valley, the lands between the Euphrates and the Caspian Sea. Others came from the northern stretches of Asia Minor, from Cappadocia north of the Taurus mountains; from Pontus, lying, as its name indicated, along the Black Sea; from the province of Asia which with Phrygia occupied the northwest district of the Trojan levant; and from Pamphylia, midway the northern Mediterranean coast. Then the scene changes to the south, and there are the pilgrims from Egypt, from the Cyranean coast just north of the Lybian desert, and from the southeast region of Arabia east of the Red Sea. From far to the west came some of these worshipers, as far as from Rome; from the islands of the sea, like Crete, and from farther corners of the home-land of Judea. Such was the company of native Jews, foreign-born Jews and Jewish sympathizers, Proselytes of the gate or Proselytes of righteousness, that was gathered in Jerusalem after its custom at one of the great feasts.

The Group of Disciples.

In comparison with this great host, numbering many thousands, and swelling the usual population of the city to enormous size, how small was the company who held the faith of the Teacher from Nazareth. Their numbers seem insignificant. There were the Twelve and the Seventy, of whom we read. There was the group gathered in Jerusalem after the departure of the Lord; this circle, including the apostles, the women and various other followers of Jesus were about a hundred and twenty in all (Acts 1:15). Yet to the ardent faith of the first believers this seemed "a multitude of names." Then one must not forget that interview of the risen Lord with "above five hundred brethren" of which Paul speaks (1 Cor. 15:6). Yet with all these combined, the total results of Jesus' strenuous years must have seemed small. Where were the multitudes to whom he had preached and many of whom he had healed? Where were the crowds of Palm Sunday, who had hailed his entrance to Jerusalem with rapturous delight? Almost might it be said of his friends that "They all forsook him and fled." Yet there were enough for the enterprise. Gideon had twice sifted his host to find the trustworthy three hundred. Jesus narrowed his chances from the many disciples to the Seventy and then the Twelve, and even here one proved faithless. The company was sufficient if the Spirit was with them.

The Time of Waiting.

It was for this that they waited, even as the Lord had told them. They were not yet ready to go out, for their message was not matured. The events of their life with Jesus, especially the last troubled weeks, needed to be studied in the light of Old Testament hopes and of the words of the Master himself. In this meditation upon the great truths now first of all made evident, in these days of brooding and nights of prayer, they awaited the fuller version of the Kingdom and the signal that the time for action had arrived. Once only had the quiet of these days been interrupted, and that was when they felt the necessity of choosing one to fill the place of Judas. With that exception they gave their minds to the solemn duty of preparation, and "continued steadfastly in prayer." Meeting daily in that "upper chamber," perhaps one of the rooms in the temple, or a chamber in the house of Mary of Jerusalem, they awaited the moment when they should be called to witness for Jesus and the resurrection.

The Coming of the Signal.

That moment came on the Day of Pentecost. The city was in festal array. The shops and bazaars were decorated with the emblems of the feast. Great throngs surged along the streets, ready to be attracted by any brilliant display or unusual event. The disciples had gathered, as was their custom, in the room whose windows or balcony opened on the street. It was still early in the morning. They had come early to their trysting place, or perhaps had tarried all night in the deep abandon of prayer. All hearts were expectant. Through all their minds there ran the echo of Jesus' promise that they should be his witnesses, and his added words, "not many days hence." The hour for which they had waited must be near. The "all nations" of the commission were at that very moment in the city where they stayed, moving past the windows of the very room in which they met. Higher and higher rose the tide of eagerness and enthusiasm. All things were ready. The hour of which the Master had spoken must be near. And suddenly, while they waited, the signal came.

The Disciples and the Spirit.

The narrative of the Day of Pentecost is charged with an intensity of emotion which is almost electric. Luke's record of the events in the early church is usually restrained and calm. But here one feels the rush of a divine passion. There is an overwhelming emotion not only in the events but in the account. Only a few touches are given to the vivid picture. Rapidly the writer hurries from the setting of the scene to the chief figure, Peter, and to the great utterance, the First Gospel Sermon. Yet in three verses the impressive facts are set forth—the sound like the rising of a breath, which swelled till it seemed like a rushing tempest—the appearance of showers of flame dividing and falling upon them all—the sense of completion, of ecstasy, of power which filled and inspired all the company. That group—only a hundred and twenty to be sure, but enough to be the first of a mighty host—felt that the hour of destiny had struck. In the sounds and sights of that moment, in the mighty rush of conviction like an engulfing wave, in the exaltation of faculties which gave them clearer vision and nobler courage, they recognized the coming of the Spirit, which the Savior had promised.

The Holy Spirit.

It was the Spirit of God, the quickening and urgent power by which prophets had been impelled and guided and steadied. It was the breath of God upon their souls, cleansing their hearts as by flames, and fanning into sustained warmth their passion of love for the Lord. It was the Spirit of Christ, the mind and soul of the Master, caught like a tongue of fire from off an altar. In that moment the purpose of Christ, the meaning of his earthly ministry, his days of labor and nights of prayer, his works of love and words of hope, became their own in a sense never before perceived. They saw that without them, the examples and witnesses of this redemptive life and death, there could come no message of grace to the world. Christ was dependent upon them to complete his sacrificial service. It was the Holy Spirit, the Spirit of Holiness, the comforting, impelling, inspiring, empowering Presence which henceforth was their possession and their reward. No "third person of the Trinity" this, of whom the theologies have talked learnedly but meaninglessly, but the life of God in the prepared soul, leading gradually into all the truth, recalling the words of Christ, interpreting them and marking out the pathway of holiness.

The Tongues.

In the rush of these events and emotions the company manifested its deep and holy fervor in such outbursts of happy utterance as quickly caught the ears of the passing multitude. The strange phenomenon of the "glossa" or "tongue" fell upon them, and in this single instance in all the New Testament cases of its manifestation, left the witness of the use of unfamiliar dialects. In the rapidity of the narrative no explanation of the incident is given. Did the various disciples speak each in a different language? Or were they all alike gifted for the moment with this marvelous endowment? Or did one speak, and the multitude all hear in their different languages? Or was the use of the Greek language the speech of the educated world by common and apparently unlearned men, the occasion for such wonder on the part of the people? Or was the wonder in that penetrating, convincing, exalted message of the apostles, that eloquence independent of mere vocabulary, that "speech beyond speech" which the flaming torches of Gospel truth have borne like a fire around the world.

Peter's Message.

Whatever value the apostolic language had in making its impression upon the hearers, it was the sermon of Peter, clear, incisive, bold, conclusive, which brought them to confession and obedience. Their wonder at the spectacle rapidly changed to alarm as the apostle charged them not only with sin against their own history in the rejection of the Messiah, but even of sedition against Roman law in the taking of an innocent life. Then the climax, with its proofs of that glorious Life, based on prophecy, miracle and the resurrection, brought the people in terror and conviction to ask what they must do, and conviction and confession ripened into obedience as the three thousands took their stand with the disciples.

Thus the Day of Pentecost takes its place along with the other great days in the history of the Kingdom of God, and from it evermore the church dates the moment of its birth.

THE PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

A NEW YEAR RESOLUTION CONSECRATION.

Topic January 6: Ex. 35:25; Acts 27:21-26; Rom 12:1-3.

A Comprehensive Resolution.

Of the Macedonians Paul wrote, "First they gave their own selves to the Lord, and to us through the will of God." Those who follow this order will not have reason to complain so often of broken resolutions. The making of resolutions excites ridicule because men fix their attention upon details and not upon the great fundamentals of life. By first giving themselves to God, they will be able to judge concerning particular resolutions and they will have a motive strong enough to keep them steady when pleasures allure and pains would repel. Precepts get their value from the general plan of life into which they enter. Benjamin Franklin wrote maxims and proverbs that have been highly prized by the American people, and the reason is simple; he had a gift of putting in concise, compendious sentences the convictions of the common man. The errors of Franklin are the errors of the people whom he represents. The truth his writing contain is the truth which the people cherish. His general plan of life is theirs. If we must have a resolution for the new year, let it be one that will include all particular duties. Or we may think a little further into the meaning of our determination to give ourselves to God if we feel that we have in any measure been yielding to the divine leading.

A Consecration of Possessions.

The dictionary says that consecration is "the act or ceremony of setting apart from a common to a sacred use." The definition is a good one provided the right meaning is put into its terms. If "common" is the equivalent of "sinful" or "selfish," and if "sacred" means "righteous," "unselfish," we may allow the dictionary to speak for us. All ministries in the name of Christ are sacred. All wealth that is devoted to the service of man is consecrated. Lincoln said of the field of Gettysburg: "We cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far beyond our power to add or detract." That is hallowed ground where men do their full measure of duty. The church of God is a holy institution because it serves men. Now the church has a special work to do in inspiring its members to make a proper use of their wealth. We have come to a new era in history. The age of deficit has passed and the age of surplus has come. But many men are governed by feelings acquired in the age when all the efforts of a man brought him but a meagre subsistence. They cling to their great possessions with the tenacity of men who must fight to retain food sufficient to maintain life. We are still offering pioneer gifts to the church for its missionary activities, notwithstanding the fact that we have long ago ceased to live the pioneer life. We have the comforts of new day. The enterprises of the church should have the support that befits the present.

Consecration of Self.

We are not slow to remind a man who undertakes to use the state or the church for private ends that he is misusing a public institution. Can we not go further and say to the man that he is not a private person? Officially most men are private persons but socially they are not. Every man either helps or hinders social progress. It is true that society cannot decide some things for him. He has rights which may not be ignored. But he has obligations also. Any imperfection in the motive of the individual shows itself in institutions. Good service is rendered by good men. The better the man the better the service. The best thing a man can give is himself. In truth, the only thing a man can give is himself. His money is a part of himself. If it is not, he is not giving when he puts it into the hand of another. Men who acquire their money by unrighteousness can hardly be called generous if they dispose of it freely. The notion that the gambler is generous is false. He has rendered no service for the money he bestows and therefore it is not a part of him. The first act of consecration is to choose some occupation by which we can reward society for what we demand from it. Then if society deals generously with us, we can use some of her gifts for the benefits of others. If we consecrate ourselves to the Kingdom of God, we shall choose for ourselves that occupation in which we can render the largest service. Let us not mistake the emotionalism of the prayer-meeting which issues no deed of helpfulness for the consecration God demands of us. Emotion is good if it leads to good conduct. Otherwise it is an abomination to the Lord.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

LESSON VII. THE GRADED SCHOOL.

I. WHAT IS IT? A Graded School is one in which the pupils are classified according to age and mental equipment, and teaching is adapted to the requirements of each stage of their development. It includes four things: Graded Classes, Graded Methods, Graded Lesson Material and Graded Teachers.

II. ITS NECESSITY. The desirability of grading is no longer in dispute. It has exactly the same justification as the grading of the day school. Here as there children of approximately the same age are grouped together because their needs, interests and mental equipments are of a like order, and because they need to be taught the same thing in the same way. Grading is simply the recognition on the part of the Sunday-school, of the fact, long known to the educational world, that the human mind changes from year to year both in its capacity for, and in its way of assimilating knowledge.

III. CLASSIFICATION. The ideal basis of classification is the general mental equipment of the scholar; but as this test cannot always be rigidly applied, the best working substitute is the day school standing modified when necessary by the consideration of age. The school should first be divided into several large departments, corresponding to the different periods of intellectual and spiritual development of the scholars. Authorities differ somewhat as to the precise limits of these periods, but the following is suggested as a good working classification:

(1) EARLY CHILDHOOD—from one to six years,
(2) CHILDHOOD—from six to twelve,
(3) EARLY ADOLESCENCE—from twelve to sixteen,
(4) LATER ADOLESCENSE—from sixteen to twenty-one,
(5) ADULT—from twenty-one up.

IV. DEPARTMENTS. On the basis of the above primary nature-divisions, the school may be divided into the following departments, presided over by its own officers and having its own methods of work:

(1) ELEMENTARY (corresponding to the period of early childhood.)

(a) Cradle-Roll—from one to three years,

(b) Kindergarten or Beginners—from three to six years,

(c) Primary—from six to nine.

(2) JUNIOR (corresponding to childhood.)

(3) INTERMEDIATE (corresponding to early adolescence.)

(4) SENIOR (corresponding to later childhood.)

(5) ADULT.

The formation of these departments is the first step to be taken towards grading a school.

V. OTHER DEPARTMENTS. In addition to these Departments of the Main School a fully organized school should have the following:

(1) ORGANIZED CLASSES for men and women, such as "Baraca," "Philathea," "Berea," etc., or those organized under the Adult Department of the International Sunday-school Association.

(2) HOME DEPARTMENT, for the benefit of those who cannot attend the regular sessions of the school. As to lesson material, the members of this department will be graded according to age.

(3) NORMAL DEPARTMENT, for the purpose of training the teachers of the school, and others who will become teachers, in the essentials of bible knowledge and modern religious pedagogy.

(4) SPECIALIZATION—classes for work on special subjects, exist in many schools, and suggest a line of work that has not as yet been sufficiently developed in Sunday-school work.

(5) Very large schools may also have a TRAVELING DEPARTMENT for the sake of those who are away from home.

VII. CLASS DIVISIONS. Where a School is large enough to permit, each of the Departments, from the Primary to the Senior, inclusive, should be subdivided according to the principles mentioned in paragraphs I and II of this lesson. In the Primary, Junior and Intermediate Grades, the classes should number from eight to twelve, but in the Senior and Adult Departments, larger classes are desirable. The sexes should be separated, in all the departments above the primary.

VIII. GRADED METHODS, ETC. The other requirements of a graded school will be dealt with more fully in later lessons. Here it is sufficient merely to indicate their meaning. GRADED METHODS, have to do with the actual teaching of the lesson, and signify the adaptation of the manner of teaching to the requirements of each age. Thus drills and motion songs are good for the Beginners and Primary Departments, but would be absurd in any other. The lecture method of the adult class, would be disastrous for the Juniors; and on the other hand, the story method of the Juniors would drive away the "grown-ups". GRADED LESSON MATERIAL means the suiting of the thing taught to the mind of the scholars. Thus, the 14th chapter of John, while eminently fitted for an adult class, contains no truth that the child mind can grasp. The boys and girls delight in the hero stories of the Old Testament, while their elders are more interested in Paul's doctrine of justification. The strong meat of the Christian dogma should not be fed to babes. The GRADING OF THE TEACHERS implies the assigning to each class of those teachers, who by experience or natural gifts are best able to use the proper methods for that grade. Care should especially be taken that properly equipped teachers are provided for the younger classes, where technical knowledge of teaching is of greater importance than anywhere else.

The Books of Acts

Next to the Gospels, the Book of Acts is the most significant portion of the Bible. It is the narrative of what Jesus continued to do and teach after the close of his personal ministry among men. It is the Gospel of the Holy Spirit and the first chapter in the history of the Christian church.

The Book of Acts is one of the two documents of the New Testament written by the hands of a non-Jew. Criticism has rendered us practically certain that Luke is the author of this book and the Third Gospel. For a time, the interest of New Testament scholars was so strongly centered in the Gospels and the Epistles that the Book of Acts received comparatively little attention or was largely discredited as a historical source because of the many points in which it seemed to disagree with the writings of Paul. But attention has of late been fastened afresh upon this book, with the perception that it is of great importance as a source for our knowledge of the origins of Christianity. It is true that even so eminent an authority as Harnack, while assuming in the strongest manner the Lukan authorship, at the same time holds that the book itself is only of second value as a historical document because of its special pleading and ignorance of many phases of New Testament life and teaching. But in spite of this sad event, which is shared by other scholars, the book is being vindicated as our most notable authority for the period of which it treats. While we recognize the fact that Luke did not always have first-hand information concerning the things of which he wrote, and that this removal from the facts sometimes lessens the value of his evidence, yet a document of this character, produced so soon after the events is of very great importance, and we are fortunate in being able to compare it with the absolutely authentic utterances of Paul, both to confirm and correct its story.

Luke, the author of the book, was the companion of the apostle Paul during some portions of the latter part of his ministry, ending with his imprisonment and death in Rome. We have no knowledge of the first meeting of the two men. But it is possible that this occurred during Paul's second missionary journey, in the city of Troas, the ancient Troy, where Paul became aware through the vision of the man of Macedonia, of a world living still further west, waiting for the advent of the Gospel. From this time on, as the use of the first person plural indicates, Luke was Paul's fellow traveler for a portion of the time, and the record of these journeys forms the basis and most authentic portion of the Book of Acts. The book naturally divides itself into two sections, the first of which deals with the Jerusalem Church and the life and work of the apostle Peter. This section, which closes with Chapter XII., is followed by the Pauline part of the book; and the difference in treatment of the two sections, the signs of awareness and interest in connection with the work of Paul, are clear evidences of the fact that the author was far more deeply concerned with the activities of the apostle to the Gentiles than with the church in Jerusalem and the work of Peter.

Perhaps, then, the material of the book would fall into the following groups: (1) the "we" sections of the book, or the "travel document," as some scholars called it, of which there are four sections: XVI: 10-17; XX: 5-16; XXI:1-18; XXVII: 1-XXVIII, 16.

(2) The narrative of Paul's life and ministry in which these fragments of the "travel document" are imbedded. The material for this frame-work was doubtless supplied to Luke by the apostle Paul himself.

(3) The remainder of the book forms the introduction to the story of the life of Paul. This includes all of Chapters I to XII, except Chapter IX. which relates to Paul's conversion, and really belongs with the second section.

It is probable that Luke's knowledge of this introductory portion of the book was derived from written documents, from personal acquaintance with members of the Jerusalem Church during the period of his residence in that city, and with Paul at Caesarea, and from other Palestinian sources.

CHRISTIAN UNION.

If it were conceivable, as it is not, that a peach tree depended upon something besides its fruits to prove what it was, then one could imagine that the month in which it was planted, or the name by which it was planted, or the kind of fence that surrounded the orchard, determined whether it was a peach or an apple tree. This would be legal evidence produced by some authority, or book, or ceremony, or relation, but not by the tree itself, as to what it was. But fruit belongs by nature to the tree itself and is nature's own sure evidence of the species she is producing.

Now there are natural evidences which grow as naturally out of the Christian heart, as the apples that grow on an apple tree, to show whether one is a Christian or not. What are some of these "natural evidences," the "fruits" that indicate the Christian tree? Jesus has left us in no doubt: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another." Paul said: "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are the sons of God. What is the evidence that one is led of the Spirit? We know by the fruits of the Spirit in his Spirit and conduct, which are love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, etc. These evidences have a natural and necessary relation to the Christian life. They are real, not formal evidences; natural, not legal proofs. John said: "We know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren."

Bro. Perkins is right: "Certainly the sinner is lost and most certainly there is some process by which he may be assured of his salvation." If you will change the expression from "legal evidence" to "legitimate evidence," I will make that statement my own. The legitimate evidence that one is saved is the evidence which a saved life naturally gives of its changed condition. What evidence more satisfying, or more certain, than the fact that one "loves his neighbor as himself." No matter what the legal evidence may be one way or the other, the man who does not love his neighbor as himself is not a Christian. The tree that does not bear apples is not an apple tree. Such a tree may have been legally pronounced to be an apple tree when it was planted; one may have legally purchased it for an apple tree; and it may have legally grown in an orchard of apple trees; but if it bears peaches, it is not an apple tree—all laws, statutes, ceremonies and decrees notwithstanding to the contrary. We can be mistaken legally, but not morally or naturally. Nothing is ever made so legally; law merely recognizes what is so by custom and nature.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

We have in our church here many beliefs on faith and prayer. Some have had their faith in prayer somewhat shaken by recent circumstances. What do you understand to be the relationship between a Christian's faith and prayer? To follow Christ's idea of prayer, what should we expect in earthly and physical results? I am after a working basis for prayer. Of course, we recognize the subjective value of prayer, but what about the objective?

Elyria, Ohio. J. P. S.

The subject of prayer lies very close to the heart of Christianity. The most casual reading of the Scriptures shows that prayer was born of the sense of man's need of God; that it developed with the history of spiritual religion to a more commanding place in the program of devotion, that it reached a most impressive position in the experience and teaching of the apostles, and that its need was felt to be supreme in the life of our Lord. It would be very easy to gather such an anthology of biblical passages on the subject as would show its commanding place in the soul's relation to God.

Yet, like all spiritual experiences, it has its mysteries which to many are actual perplexities. Our age is confronting them as no other ever has. If we tried to make a list of them, the following, while not complete, would include the most common. The list of questions below given is the more interesting as it is a part of a letter which comes at almost the same time as the one quoted above.

(1) Is prayer really heard? (2) If prayer is the effort to change the purpose of God, is it not both futile and immoral? (3) If it is not so intended, of what avail is it? (4) Has it any other significance than as a pious exercise? (5) How can we believe in prayer when our prayers are for the most part unanswered, while the men who prayed in the Bible times were always heard? (6) Is it worth while to pray for worldly good like health, success or domestic happiness? Are not these things either within our own power or beyond the reach of any aid? (7) What would be the value of prayer in a time of emergency or peril? (8) What would be the value of prayer for another e. g. for the conversion of a friend? (9) Is the answer to prayer dependent on faith in its efficacy?

It is easy to see that these questions cover a vast range of Christian interest and experience. No more vital theme could be given attention. It is to be feared that in the presence of doubts such as some of these questions suggest, or of failures such as others imply, the practice of prayer is left off, and both doubt and failure become habitual. To begin with, What is prayer? Certainly no mere form of words, though such may no doubt be used in prayer. It is not necessarily speech of any kind, though it will no doubt most frequently find expression in speech. Prayer is such communion with God, through conscious effort to apprehend and fulfill his will, as gives a sense of calm, happiness and power, and aids in the attainment of likeness to God, and hence of mastery over the dangers and difficulties of life. Prayer is by no means limited to this definition. It may be much more than this, and doubtless is in the experience of many Christians. But this at least it may become in the lives of all.

(1) Prayer is heard and answered. This is the testimony of the saints in all the ages. Such men as Paul, Augustine, Dante, Luther, and Tauler are the witnesses of this truth. And such men are as worthy of belief as experts in any other sphere of knowledge. More than this, the men and women who are in conscious daily communion with God are a great host whose testimony is not to be denied. But the chief witness to the validity of prayer is Jesus himself. No doubt can be cast on his constant use of it and the results that he obtained from its employment. If he had need of it, how much more have we. If he found in it strength and comfort, as truly may we.

(2) Prayer of the right sort is not the effort to change the will of God, but to co-operate with that will. God does not change his nature or his laws at the behest of any. To do so would be to throw the universe into chaos. Doubtless such prayers have been offered, without the knowledge of the true nature of prayer on the part of the petitioner. But like foolish children we are often most blest when our requests are not granted.

(3) It is the attempt so to avail oneself of the resources God puts at his disposal as makes possible the divine blessing. Prayer is petition, but it is also the effort which renders the granting of the petition possible. It is both the will and the endeavor to connect with the divine battery of power and blessing. God can do for us nothing which we do not wish to have done. Prayer is the manner in which we both register our desires and utilize the means for their accomplishment.

(4) Prayer undoubtedly has a value as a subjective experience. The influence of prayer on the praying soul would still be worth while if it merely reacted helpfully. But prayer is no mere pious gymnastic. It reaches the Father who hears and answers. God is the "Inspirer and Hearer of prayer."

(5) Many of our prayers are unanswered because they are only forms of speech, or are in no wise related to the divine program for us, or because we make no effort to render their answer possible. No moving of levers can start an electric car that has no trolley connection with the line of power. Moreover, the merest reading of the Bible would show that prayers, even of the best men, were not always answered. Paul prayed for the removal of his affliction. His prayer was not answered but grace was given him to bear it. Jesus prayed for the removal of the cup, but was compelled to drink it notwithstanding. Yet the larger blessing came in strength to endure.

(6) Yes, it is always worth while to ask the divine blessing on everything we think worthy of our earnest desire and effort. But in the act of praying the pledge is given that all proper effort is to be made to bring the answer. The prayer for daily bread means the attempt to secure it with the blessing of God. The prayer for health means the avoidance of unwholesome things, and in sickness the employment of approved remedies, with the request for divine guidance and blessing. Some of these things may be within our reach, and some may be beyond even the divine power to grant us, considering the lives we live or the circumstances in which we are placed. But those who abide in the life of prayer know the secret of strength, confidence and happiness which it imparts.

(7) It is impossible to say how the divine power aids the man of faith and prayer. Yet often it is perfectly certain that such is the case. We may not claim that the prayer of the most consecrated man in peril of shipwreck at sea changes the forces of nature and saves the ship, though such claims are often made. But it is not difficult to understand how the realization of God's presence through prayer at such a moment may bring calmness and confidence, and one such member in a ship's company might save the whole. Many foolish claims may have been made for prayer in emergencies, and many foolish tests applied to it. But the depts of its power have not yet been sounded, and one may well venture to give it a larger place in his life than most Christians attempt.

(8) A whole region of intensely interesting suggestion is opened by recent studies in the influence of one mind over another. These indicate that prayer may have new and vital uses. Certainly there will be little value in a prayer for the conversion of another if no effort is put forth by the one who prays. But if he regards himself as the agent of God in the conversion or the blessing of his friend, all things are possible. To use once more the figure of the electric current, there may be no vital connection between God and the man for whom the prayer is offered. But the man who makes the prayer is in vital touch with both, and through him they meet. All prayer for others avails where genuine interest and effort go into the petition.

(9) Yes, for no one is likely to throw himself whole-heartedly and potently into prayer and self-devotion to its fulfilment who does not believe it to be worth while. Faith is the saving quality, because in the confidence it gives you make the effort and achieve the result. But faith itself grows with experiment and experience. "Come and see," is still the word to the questioner. Men do not become mighty in prayer in a single day. Like all other habits, it grows with the use, and with it grows faith as the results are seen. It is well to have a philosophy of prayer, no doubt. But it is better to know the joy of fellowship with God, and the power that comes from His presence.

LOVE FAILETH NOT.

Knowledge, prophecies, gifts of all kinds, pass away, but the love of God and the love of man never fail. They continue into the unseen world beyond the grave; the remembrance of these things as we have known them here enables us to think of them there; the unselfish purpose, the generous sympathies, the deep affections, the transparent sincerity, the long self-control, the simple humanity of those to whom the commandment of God has been precious—these are the arches of that bridge on which our thoughts and hopes cross and recross the widest and most mysterious of all the chasms that divide us—the gulf which divides the dead and the living, the gulf which divides God and man.—Dean Stanley.

CHICAGO

O. F. JORDAN WRITES OF THE CHURCH WORK OF THE DISCIPLES OF CHRIST IN CHICAGO. HE SETS FORTH THE PROBLEMS OF THIS GREAT CITY AND GIVES A PICTURE OF THE EFFORTS OF OUR PEOPLE TO BUILD UP CHURCHES.

As we have gone about the city visiting the churches of the Disciples, we have been impressed with the character of the people, which is so diverse, and with the similarity of the problems of our church. Had Ian Maclaren visited our churches he might have added another chapter in his excellent book, "Church Folks," which deals with the folk of the Scottish churches.

The people that move to Chicago are for the most part the restless people of the larger towns who are ambitious to get ahead in the world and who come to the city for the sake of its larger opportunities. As there is but a remnant of native Chicagoans in our churches here, the churches are made up for the most part of this ambitious, restless and roving class we have just mentioned. They are an excellent folk in their way. They believe in progress, even in things religious. Conservatives in the rural districts complain that there is something in the Chicago air that leads a man from traditional moorings. That impression is a correct one. The "Chicago spirit" soon lays hold on all but the most intractible, and all unconsciously they are moulded by the social environment, which is a much larger thing than the liberal movement among ministers of the Disciples. Thus it comes to pass that in our churches there are few of the wealthy, but many of those who will some day become wealthy through their own genius and initiative. There are few great social leaders, but much raw material out of which these may be made.

Ian Maclaren's "Mutineer."

This class of folk make our church life in Chicago stormy at times. The elder and dictator of some country church who has enjoyed ten or twenty years of undisputed rule, does not readily acquiesce in a regime where he is but a deacon, and is not consulted by the preacher as to what hymns shall be sung. He must make a strike for a larger place, at times. If he be lacking in the spirit of true religion, and unfortunately our sister churches of the rural districts send us such elders at times, he will rend a church asunder rather than fail to make his point. The description of the Scottish "mutineer" by Ian Maclaren fits our own experience entirely. He says, "The mutineer is of another breed and is an able-bodied miscreant, who will strike a hard blow whenever he can get an opportunity, and at any person whom he can reach. His sole desire is to do mischief, and the more pain he gives, the better he is pleased. He will write insulting letters to the minister, charging him with every sin from heresy to lying. He will get up a public controversy about the affairs of the congregation in any newspaper which is foolish enough to insert his letters. He will attack the most reasonable proposals of the office-bearers, and impute to them the worst motives. He will move through the congregation as an incendiary, and set fire to every inflammable person. When he is in his glory, he will threaten proceedings in the church courts or the civil courts; and although he will never carry them out, being a coward as well as a bully, he will take the preliminary steps, which cause talk and alarm. It will also be part of his role to pose as a straightforward and honest man of unflinching rectitude and spiritual aims. What he does will always be under the constraint of conscience, and he will summon himself and his opponents with much rhetorical effect before the bar of eternal justice. He is so big and blatant, and good people are so charitable and easily cowed, that they often take the man at his own value and come to terms with him." Such mutineers have appeared in almost every church in Chicago at different times. They have wrought havoc with the progress of the gospel in the very name of the gospel and have prostituted every legitimate religious interest to selfish ambition.

Splendid Examples of Christlikeness.

In Chicago, however, there are some of the most splendid examples of self-sacrifice in the interest of religion that is to be found anywhere. Many housemaids and office girls give to exceed farmers, with homes paid for, in the rural districts. People who are shut up in dingy stores and offices with never a sight of God's great out-of-doors, give the only day when they might see the parks, to the teaching of Sunday-school classes and mission bands. They go to their weekly task on Monday morning tired instead of rested, that the work of the kingdom may go forward. Chicago Christians will hope against hope for the better day, worshipping meanwhile in a structure much like a woodhouse or in a dirty old grocery store. These saints have the religious imagination to glorify these inglorious places of worship and say "This is my Bethel, the very house of God."

The problems of the churches have a startling similarity. Everywhere there is the complaint of the continual shifting of the population. Most churches have twenty per cent of their membership move out of the district each May day. The newly-arrived preacher fondly imagines that he has done a great work in his few months and eats his heart out when he sees it disappear in a single day, and the church become smaller than when he arrived. Thus it happens that some preachers who have glowing newspaper reports for a time have short sojourns here. The Monroe Street Church lost enough of the men who were its leading financial supporters on a single May day a few years ago to threaten the very existence of the church. The Evanston church lost business men this past year to the extent of taking away one-third of the pledged support of the church. The roving Disciples have not yet settled in business or purchased real estate to an extent that will make them permanent.

Strenuous Financial Enterprise.

Again, every church in Chicago is under the lash to provide funds for its work. Little churches, without a single man who owns ten thousand dollars worth of property, are averaging twenty dollars per member, man, woman and child. Such an income in Bloomington, Springfield or Danville, Illinois, would make the coffers of the Lord to overflow with money and tax the ingenuity of official boards to spend it. But in Chicago little groups of thirty people try to run churches and finance them. Many Disciples who do not identify themselves with Chicago churches drop out because they do not wish to measure up with such strenuous giving and sacrifice.

The third universal problem of our churches is that of adequate building facilities. There is not a building in Chicago used by the Disciples that cost fifty thousand dollars. The great Englewood church is housed in a little stone building that would not be regarded as pretentious save in a vilage of a thousand people. The Jackson Boulevard Church, our largest church does not have a corner lot and crowded into a flat district is a building that looks beautiful to a people that have poured out their highest effort to secure it, but which would not be an object of pride to any visiting Disciple. The Metropolitan Church fathered by Charles Reign Scoville meets in a one story store building long since grown old and dilapidated. The Monroe Street Church is probably the finest in the city built by Disciples but it is burdened with a debt that may take years to pay. The Evanston Church is located three blocks from the cabbage patches on the west, one mile from the street car lines and nearly two miles from the great Northwestern University. It is surrounded by the foreign population of the city which grows while the American population decreases. It has a plaster cement building with large chunks of plaster off. A Sunday-school scholar when asked recently where he went to Sunday-school, replied, "To the little church that is falling down." The Douglas Park Church meets in a little brick building the size and shape of the wood house behind a country school-house. Near it, the church extension societies of the different denominations have erected magnificent edifices, not with money loaned, but with money donated for all time. The Hyde Park Church building is useful, but strange and wonderful to behold. When the orthodox hunted it up at a recent Congress, they exclaimed with much satisfaction, "Well, if heresy in Chicago is no larger than this, it is not very dangerous."

City Problems Unique.

The churches of Chicago have the continual strain of meeting the demands of a diverse population. A man recently moved to Hyde Park and has not yet identified himself with the church because he wants to be sure the church and pastor are not too conservative for him. All of our preachers are conservatives in their own communities, if they are radicals abroad. Dr. Ames contends earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints. Dr. Willett does the best he can to hold a congregation in touch with the principles of our religious reformation which is anxious to hear some new thing. Mr. Morrison has accepted the peculiarities of his neighborhood in some things that he may save the larger things of the Christian faith.

The preachers of Chicago are a hearty group to meet. If it has taken time for them to learn to do team work, they are now doing it. No city in this country has a heartier, more brotherly fellowship among its ministers than does Chicago. This ministry has education and ability equal if not superior to that of the great communions who have contended for a century for an educated ministry. Men have come here from great churches to preach to a handful, in order that the most strategic point upon the continent should have adequate ministerial supply. These men have sacrificed in salary, and know they cannot make the glowing newspaper reports the brethren love to read. They leave here from time to time broken in health and spirit, bowed down with a sense of the sin of a great city, never again to regain the youthfulness and buoyancy with which they came. They do more work here in a week than they used to do in two, for they are intoxicated with the whirl of city life. Like a man drunk with wine, they do not know when to stop, until a complete break-down sends them away that a new man may pour his life into the enterprise. After they have sacrificed all these things, after they have borne the heat and burden of the day, their reward has often been to be written up as arrogant

WITH THE WORKERS

H. M. Gilmore goes from Marion to Council Grove, Kansas.

A. I. Martin and the church at Astoria will begin a series of meetings January 1.

W. A. Morrison, Windsor, Mo., has accepted a call to the church at Higginsville, Mo.

The Roanoke Mission, Kansas City, Mo., has secured James F. Quisenberry as pastor.

The church at Peru, Neb., has just closed a meeting which was led by Knowles and Ridenour.

B. V. Black has resigned the pastorate of the church at Mankato, Minn., and accepted a call to Duluth.

The Brooks Brothers are in a successful meeting with the church at Warren, Ohio. J. E. Lynn is the minister.

W. E. Reavis, Stanberry, Mo., reports an average attendance at the prayer-meeting service of from fifty to sixty.

Evangelists Hamilton and Thomas announce seventy additions in the first two weeks of their meeting at Chanute, Kans.

J. N. Chloe has closed a three years' successful work at Donovan, Ill., and is ready to acept a call to another church.

The church at Steubenville, Ohio, has called A. F. Stahl, of the Wabash Avenue Church, Akron, to become their pastor, and he has accepted.

W. A. Green has just closed a three years' pastorate at Kewanee, Ill., during which time three hundred members have been added to the church.

The church at Warrensburg, Mo., where G. B. Stewart ministers, has just closed a successful meeting in which they were assisted by Geo. L. Snively.

L. P. Schooling, of Pullman, Washington, has a Bible class of 115 members. It is composed of men from the various churches of the city. They are using the books of Prof. Kent of Yale as their guide in the study.

The church at Wellsville, W. Va., was the second church organized among the Disciples. It is the oldest existing church of the body. The present membership is 357, and the Sunday-school attendance 143. F. M. Biddle is the pastor.

President Bates and the friends of Hiram College are making a heroic struggle to complete the task of raising an endowment of $100,000 for the institution. They have gone beyond the $80,000 mark. Let all friends of the college come to her aid at once.

V. W. Blair, who came to Greenfield, Ind., immediately after his graduation from Yale University two years ago, has resigned. Mr. Blair's work has been characterized by earnestness and aggressiveness, and his resignation is a matter of regret to the church and the community. We do not know his future plans.

The following toasts, given at a recent banquet of the Men's Club of the church at Memphis, Mo., may be helpful by way of suggestion: "The Church and its Minister." "The Boy Problem;" "What Would the Prayer-meeting be Without the Women?" "The Sunny Side of a Preacher's Life; "The Church's Obligation to the Community;" "The Churches' Brother-in-law;" and "The Sunday-school." N. J. Nicolson is the pastor.

TELEGRAMS.

Washington, Penn., Dec. 27, 1908: Evangelist Geo. L. Snively and Althiede in great meeting. Great crowds through the holidays. Twenty-three added today, 102 to date. Church happy. Continue.

Ellsworth A. Cole,
Minister.

Beaver City, Neb., Dec. 28, 1908: James Small is here with us. Great crowds. Church voted for publication of his sermons on plea and prayer of John 17. Ernest Boyd of Chicago, leading song service.

F. D. Hobson.

Chapin, Ill., December 26, 1908.—The people here are rejoicing over the greatest meeting Chapin has ever had. We closed the 20th, having run six weeks. Number of accessions 107. Of this number 66 were men and 41 women and children, about five or six of the latter. There were twenty men and their wives. Men came and listened and made the good confession who had not attended church for twenty years. Of the total reached, 83 were baptisms, 49 men, 34 women. Eight came as the result of the Sunday meeting at Jacksonville, Ill. T. L. Read, who did the preaching and who is the new pastor, has won the hearts of the people, who crowded the house to listen to the splendid sermons each night. He is an earnest, fearless speaker, and has marked ability for reaching the men, and should be in the evangelistic field. The chorus of almost 70 voices did as nice work as any I have ever had.

J. Wade Seniff,
Pittsfield, Ill. Song Evangelist.

—"I am not greatly disturbed over the present situation. God lives and rules. This is his cause. I have done what I believed to be right. I have prayed over the matter. I have taken counsel with some of the wisest men among us. I am not losing sleep about that, but I am losing sleep about the work."—A McLean.

The First Church of Springfield, Ill., organized a Men's Brotherhood recently with about fifty charter members.

J. R. Golden has accepted the call to the West Side Church of Springfield, Ill., succeeding F. M. Rogers.

The excellent choir of the Centerville, Iowa, Church, sang the Cantata "Promise and Fulfillment," on the Sunday night before Christmas.

The church at Hill City, Kansas, Chas. S. Early, pastor, dedicated a six thousand dollar house of worship, December 27. L. L. Carpenter led in the raising of nearly $6000. The pastor will hold a meeting in January.

Our readers will note the advertisement of the Hackleman Music Company on another page. When in need of song-books of any kind or church hymnals, please write them and mention the Christian Century.

By an oversight in our office we have allowed the great demand for our recent issues of the Christian Century to exhaust the edition of October 31. If any of our good friends can furnish us with copies we will be glad to reciprocate the favor.

PRESIDENT McLEAN'S NEW BOOK FREE.

To any new subscriber to the Christian Century we will send a copy of A. McLean's "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," free upon receipt of $1.50. To ministers upon receipt of $1.20.

Ray O. Miller has resigned at the Jefferson Street Church, Fort Wayne, Ind.

V. W. Blair has resigned at Greenfield, Ind. He will close his work about March 1.

E. F. Daugherty, Wabash, Ind., has been the leader in the county local option fight and his efforts have been successful.

M. B. Ainsworth of Danville, Ill., has accepted a call to Franklin, Ind., and will begin his work in about two months.

W. D. Willoughby who is doing post-graduate work in Butler College, will preach at Fortville and Pittsboro, Ind., this coming year.

Charles Arthur Coakwell, pastor at Leon, Iowa, will hold a meeting in his home church in January. He will be assisted by Will G. Laye of Lock Haven, Pa.

The leaflet for the Christmas services of the Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, is one of the most appropriate and tasteful we have seen. Perry J. Rice is the pastor.

The Central Indiana Christian Ministerial Institute will convene with the Downey Avenue Congregation, Indianapolis, March 8 and 9, 1909. The program is almost complete.

C. H. Devoe closed a meeting at Jasonville, Ind., Sunday night, Dec. 20, with 113 added in three weeks and four days. He begins a meeting in Peru, Ind., early in January with home forces.

J. O. Ross has just closed a good meeting at Williamsport, Ind., which results in reviving, reopening and reorganizing the work there and enabling it with Attica to secure the services of a capable minister at good salary.

J. T. Alsup has returned to Illinois and taken the work at Metropolis City. Mr. Alsup has been in Missouri for several years. He held successful pastorates in Pekin and Washington, Ill., before going to Missouri. He is a graduate of Eureka College and is interested in the movement for her enlargement. He has been spending a few days in Eureka visiting old acquaintances.

C. G. Kindred, pastor of the Englewood Christian Church, Chicago, Ill., spent two or three weeks in Eureka. He is recovering from a serious illness and he was in Eureka to rest. He was educated in Eureka and thinks there is no spot quite so dear as Eureka College. He has been a warm friend of the college since going forth from her halls and is more interested than ever.

After spending six weeks in the selection of a minister to fill the pulpit of the First Christian Church, Omaha, Neb., made vacant by the resignation of S. D. Dutcher, who goes to Terre Haute, Ind.; the pulpit committee has finally decided to issue a call to J. M. Kersey of Parsons, Kan. Mr. Kersey has been pastor of one of the biggest churches in Kansas for five years. He is an ex-president of Bethany College. His Bible class, which numbers 822, with a regular Monday evening attendance of 725, is the largest in the world.

Little 5-year-old Mabel during a visit to the country decided to help her grandfather milk the cows.

"Grandpa," she said after several fruitless efforts, "I wish you would come here and show me how you turn the milk on."

WITH THE WORKERS

O. P. Spiegel and Princess Long are holding a meeting in the Broadway Church, Los Angeles, Cal. B. F. Coulter is the pastor.

J. V. Coombs is announced to hold a meeting for the church at Princeton, Ind. The meeting is to begin about the first of February.

G. J. Chapman has resigned at Cherokee, Okla., to accept the work in St. Thomas, Ontario, Can., where he begins the first Sunday in the new year.

Prof. E. E. Boyer of Eureka College has supplied the pulpit of the Central Christian Church, Peoria, for the past three months. The church speaks in the highest terms of Mr. Boyer's work.

J. J. Bare of Findley, Ill., has been called to the pastorate of the Bicknell church. Mr. Bare did a good work for the church at Findley. We shall look for fine results at Bicknell under his pastorate.

Walter B. Zimmerman of Des Moines, Ia., recently took the pastorate at Effingham, Ill. The work is moving nicely, the Bible-school having grown from about seventy to almost 300 in six weeks. Thirty-four have been added to the church in this brief period and the church is looking forward to a great harvest during the new year. The plain old gospel is preached with fervor and many that have never been in the church before are being constrained to hear.

I have closed my work here and will be open for work after Jan. 1, 1909. Can hold a few meetings if desired. Will take settled pastorate with some church paying $1,200. Terms for meetings to suit.

Would like to correspond with a cultured, competent and energetic singing evangelist, concerning work for 1909.

Evangelist W. O. Stephens.
Austin, Tex.

Dean W. J. Lhamon, after seven years service at the head of the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., has resigned. He will conduct evangelistic meetings, beginning about next September. No doubt his long residence among students will have prepared him for a type of evangelism that is much needed in certain communities. The following resolutions were passed by the executive committee:

Whereas, Dean W. J. Lhamon of the Bible College of Missouri, feeling called to another field of work, has placed his resignation in the hands of the Secretary of the Board of Trustees to take effect at the pleasure of the Board not later than June, 1909,

Therefore, Resolved that the Executive Committee of the Board hereby expresses the earnest hope that his plans for the future may permit him to continue with the college till the close of the present collegiate year, and—

Resolved, that the Executive Committee further desires to express its appreciation of the earnest, faithful and efficient services he has rendered the Bible College during the seven years he has served it as dean, and to assure him that he will carry with him into his new field of labor the sincere respect and good wishes of every member of the Board.

Signed,
D. A. Robnett Vice Pres.
J. T. Mitchell, Treas.
J. W. Putnam, Sec'y.
B. F. Lowry.

Melnotte Miller, the district evangelist of the Twelfth Indiana Missionary District, is in a good meeting at Linton. The church at Linton has had a hard time in coming to the front. Linton is a great coal mining town. Mr. Miller is doing good work in the district.

C. P. Pledger of the W. A. Sunday evangelistic party and his corps of workers will hold three union revivals in the Fifth district during the summer of 1909. First Petersburg, second Barry and third Havana. He will leave Mr. Sunday after the February meeting in Springfield.

H. L. Veach of Pittsfield, evangelist of the Fifth Illinois District is doing some splendid work. After spending nearly two months visiting the churches he held a meeting at Pleasant Hill (Pike county), which resulted in nineteen additions. At present he is with the church at Raymond and the outlook is encouraging.

H. H. Peters, the wide-awake field secretary of the Eureka College spent last Sunday, Dec. 22., at Chandlerville, Ill. In the morning he delivered a splendid address on the Educational Problem. At night he preached on "Light and its Lessons." Mr. Peters is undertaking great things for the college and is going at it in a strictly business way. Success must follow. I. A. Engle is minister at Chandlerville.

O. C. Bolman, pastor at Havana, Ill., writes as follows:

"The church here is prospering along all lines. The membership of the Bible-school is double the membership of the church. Attendance averaged over 200 for nearly two months. 228 last Sunday. Three confessions from the Bible-school at morning service. Thirty-three added in past nine months. Our revival meeting begins Jan. 10. J. Wade Seniff of Pittsfield, will assist me. He is a good chorus director and soloist. The annual meeting of the church will be held on New Years Day. Our state field secretary, J. Fred Jones, will preach for us afternoon and evening. We will have supper at the church.

Our union meeting at Palmyra, Ill., closed with 233 accessions, nearly all conversions. The converts will be distributed among the four churches of the town, a large number going to the Christian Church. The evangelist gave the invitation just as our own evangelists do and took their confessions in the same manner. He preached faith, repentance, confession, but left out baptism. He said he would leave that for the local preachers to discuss. My experience in this union meeting has impressed me more than ever that the Church of Christ is right in its doctrinal teaching and that it is the one body of Christians who will bring about Christian union if we ever have it. I had a fine chorus of 100 voices and an orchestra of ten players. I sing in a meeting at Atlantic, Iowa, beginning Jan. 3. V. M. Elston, the minister, will do the preaching.

Charles E. McVay,
Song Evangelist.

Read carefully our great premium offer in the advertising pages. Now is certainly the time to subscribe to the Christian Century. The books offered are in some cases worth the price paid for both paper and book. Besides, you can depend on it the Christian Century will be the most interesting paper published in our brotherhood during this our Centennial year.

W. B. Morris preached for J. E. Slimp at Bruceville, Ind., on Sunday evening, Dec. 27.

J. E. Slimp who has served the Bruceville church as pastor for three years has resigned. He gives up also his work for the Mariah Creek church at the same time. Mr. Slimp has done a good work for these churches. He has been especially active in creating a missionary spirit.

Frank Powers, who is a senior in Butler College and who preaches for one of the Indianapolis churches, was called to Wheatland, Ind., last week because of the death of his mother. His father lost his life in a railroad accident six weeks ago. The Century extends sympathy.

The following appeared in one of the Vincennes daily papers last week:

"Rev. William Oeschger has issued the following unique invitation to his congregation for the Sunday morning service at the First Christian church:

"The service of the First Christian Church Sunday morning is to be a "Love Affair." The songs are to be "love songs," the scripture lesson is to be "a love chapter," "a love feast" will be celebrated and "a love sermon" preached. The people will be asked to "love each other" and the Holy Spirit petitioned to shed the love of God abroad in the hearts of the people present.'

You are most lovingly invited to share in this "love affair."'

Our fund to send the Century to all the ministers of the Brotherhood for six weeks has grown by the following additions:

Albert Schwartz, Clinton, Ill.	$ 1.00
T. J. Clark, Albion, Ill.	1.00
A. W. Fortune, Cincinnati	5.00
Mrs. Carrie F. Luck, Cleburne, Tex.	.50
A. Friend, Des Moines	20.00

Although the amount is only about half enough to send a fourth time, we will gladly give "another round" next week, skipping this week to let our amanuenses catch up This wide scattering of the seed is bringing forth fruit in letters of commendation and in not a few new subscriptions. It is our wish to complete the six issues if our friends make it possible.

THE FARMER FEEDS THEM ALL.

The politician talks and talks,
The actor plays his part,
The soldier glitters on parade,
The goldsmith plies his art,
The scientist pursues his germs
O'er this terrestial ball,
The sailor navigates his ship,
But the farmer feeds them all.

The preacher pounds the pulpit desk
The broker reads the tape,
The tailor cuts and sews his cloth
To fit the human shape,
The dame of fashion dressed in silk
Goes forth to dine or call,
Or drive, or dance, or promenade,
But the farmer feeds them all.

The workman wields his shining tools,
The merchant shows his wares,
The aernaut above the clouds
A dizzy journey dares,
But art and science soon would fade,
And commerce dead would fall,
If the farmer ceased to reap and sow,
For the farmer feeds them all.

RECENT DEATHS.

Alonzo B. Chamberlain.

Another of our older ministers has passed to the realm of fadeless light. After giving all his life to his Lord he has gone to be with Him. Alonzo B. Chamberlain was born in Livingston county, N. Y., May 28, 1831. He was baptized at Howard's creek, Ky., in 1858, and began preaching very soon thereafter. His first pastorate was begun in January of 1864 at Pittstown, N. Y. His last, closing four weeks ago, was at Troopsville, N. Y. Between these he was pastor at Auburn, N. Y., five years, Cato, five years, corresponding secretary of New York, four years, pastor at Third Church, Philadelphia, eight years, Central Church, Worcester, Mass. five years; he also ministered at Erie, Pa., and other places, always to the edification of the pepole.

He passed from this life at the home of his son, O. P. Chamberlain, and his daughter, Mrs. A. R. Wazenknight, La Grange, Ill., Dec. 19, 1908. He was seriously ill only two weeks. The cause of his death was cardiac asthma. He leaves, besides the two children above mentioned, a son Albert M., of Logmont, Ky., and E. Lulu, Mrs. E. W. Goodwell, Worcester, Mass. His widow survives him. Since Jan. 1, 1863, the day of the emancipation proclamation, she has been his helpful and true companion. Her maiden name was Laura Munson. She was of Monroe county, N. Y. The writer offered prayer at the La Grange house just before the body was taken from the home. The burial and funeral will be at Troopsville, N. Y.

Thus has passed a faithful servant of God. He died with some great texts of scripture on his lips; as "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil," and "Peace on earth, good will to men," "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." George A. Campbell.

Dean Frederick Howard.

Drake University of Des Moines, Iowa, is in mourning over the death of the dean of its music school, Frederick Howard. For eight years he has been at the head of this conservatory, building it to be the largest in the state of Iowa.

During the first year of his work, three teachers were sufficient to take care of all the students that applied for lessons. When he died, sixteen teachers were engaged in addition to those who were on leave of absence in Europe. These facts speak most eloquently of his great executive ability.

President Hill M. Bell of the university, writes as follows of Mr. Howard's work:

Dean Howard was one of the most important factors in the life of Drake University. He was not only a splendid musician and a most gifted instructor in music, but he was, as already suggested, a splendid executive. It is due chiefly to this latter quality that he was able to build up the splendid school that stands a monument to his genius. In 1904, as a small recognition of his splendid success in building up the School of Music, the Board of Trustees, upon recommendation of the President, named the building, which had been erected for the School by General Drake as a personal expression of his confidence in the Dean, "Howard Hall."

Dean Howard's influence over the students and faculty of the Music School was most remarkable. There was little friction among the large number of artists that composed his faculty, as each had confidence in his judgment and fairness. Among the students, he was idealized. He was an especial lover of boys. Many young men have been helped over some difficult places by Dean Howard. But his influence was not confined to the school nor to the boys he loved. He was known and respected by the community and city. His reputation as a musician was state wide,—it might be also said, nation wide, for he had an intimate acquaintance with all of the foremost musicians of this country, as well as with many in foreign lands. He is universally mourned, as much, perhaps, on account of his engaging personality, his spirit of self sacrifice, his devotion to duty as on account of his superior musical qualities. Dean Howard was generous to a fault. His income was large, but he kept little of it for himself. He gave with a free hand to every good cause. He used much of his income in promoting the school of which he was the head. He helped the needy generously and lovingly.

Leach.

Mrs. Elizabeth A. Leach was born in Dover, Ohio, Sept. 22, 1839; died Dec. 8, 1908, at Ortonville, Minn. In 1873 she was married to Dwight Leach. Two children survive her, Mrs. A. B. McKinley of Louisville, Ky., and Claude Percy Leach, of Clinton, Minn. Her funeral was held in the Christian Church at Aberdeen, S. D., in the presence of sympathyzing friends, Sister Leach having been a charter member of this congregation.

Sister Leach was known in her life as an active church worker and as such will be missed by those who knew her and appreciated her for her true worth to the church and community wherever she lived. She has gone, but has left her life to be reproduced by her children. Rest in peace.

J. Windbigler.

STARTING RIGHT.

The year 1909 must eclipse all the ninety-nine that have gone before it in our efforts to restore the Christianity of Christ. We must commemorate the work of faith and labor of love and patience of hope of the fathers by emulating their sublime example. The most tangible and universal index of our success will be found in the money which we consecrate to God's service. Every live Christian expects to have a share in this. At the beginning of the year the most pertinent inquiry is, how shall I give this year and how much shall I give? Vast as is the work that is to be done by the money more tremendous still will be the influence of the giving upon the lives of the givers. How shall we give most and be most blessed in the giving?

First, Shall we give the least that is respectable in response to the persistent begging? Second, Shall we give only as we are hypnotized by the eloquence of the special pleader? Third, Shall we give just what we have been accustomed to giving? Fourth, Shall we give only what we feel we can spare occasionally out of what is left after other demands have been met? Fifth, Shall we give only in disguise at suppers and socials? Sixth, Shall we give regularly and faithfully a definite proportion of that with which God blesses us?

What a joy it is to have a perennial question settled! "No question is settled until it is settled right." Fifteen minutes of earnest consideration of the above questions is bound to bring any Christian to the conclusion that the last is the only right solution of the problem.

The first of January is the time to begin. The Centennial year makes imperative the demand that we shall get right with God. How vainly shall we plead with sinners to repent when we ourselves are robbing God? With what futile affrontery shall we plead with denominationalists for complete obedience when we ourselves are Ananiases and Saphiras withholding part of the price! May the lash of conscience sting and scourge you until you find the peace of loyal loving partnership with God!

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

INTERNATIONAL GRADED LESSONS FOR THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

The Twelfth Convention of the International Sunday-school Association at Louisville, Ky., on June 20, 1908, authorized the International Sunday-school Lesson Committee "to continue the preparation of a thoroughly graded course of lessons, which may be used by any Sunday-school which desires it, whether in whole or in part." In accordance with this authorization, a subcommittee on graded lessons was appointed. This subcommittee has been at work ever since the Louisville Convention, and it hopes to be able to issue to the publishers immediately after the holidays, the first year's lessons of the beginners, the primary, and the junior courses. These lessons will be issued for the use of the lesson writers and editors, who prepare the lesson helps and quarterlies. It is hoped that the work may be ready for the use of Sunday-schools by October 1, 1909.

Ira M. Price, Secretary International Sunday-school Lesson Committee.

December 5, 1908.

In that wider world of being, of which this little world of ours forms so infinitesimal a part, we may be sure that all our spirits and their missions here will continue in some way to be represented, and that ancient human loves will never lose their own.—William James.

FROM THE HUB OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

When the "Hub" comes to consider the condition of the churches eastward the lack of spokes is then painfully apparent. Except in and about Troy we have no work until the metropolis of the nation is reached. Large, thriving cities, growing every year, like Albany, Utica, Schenectady or Binghampton have no church of Disciples. Yet in each place there is a nucleus about which an organization might be built up.

The story of Troy is like that of Syracuse. When in 1863 Dr. W. A. Belding finished establishing the work in this city and housing the newly gathered church in a comfortable building, he moved to Troy to repeat his work. As a result one of the very best churches in all the east bears eloquent testimony to his consecration. Today it numbers nearly five hundred members, is a living link in Foreign Missions, besides leading in many other good deeds. It has had a noble line of ministers, but none who have stood nearer the people than Cecil J. Armstrong, the present pastor.

F. J. M. Appleman is the new pastor of the Upper Troy Church. He came from Maine and has gotten things well in hand and is doing a splendid work,

Two country churches just outside of Troy, Eagle Mills and Poestenkill, have Bros. Neslagge and L. B. Withee as their respective pastors. Reports from each field are that both of these men are doing fine work for their churches.

At Gloversville, a thriving manufactory city near Troy, H. H. Cushing is leading the church to greater things. This field is a mission of the Empire State and is supported by the combined offerings of our Bible schools of the State.

The men in and around Troy have formed a Ministers' Union, which meets on the second Tuesday of each month. The meetings are delightful in fellowship and stimulating to all.

One would need to travel 160 miles through populous cities before another large group of Disciples are reached, and when found they are as tiny grains of sand in a great dune, for amid the millions of greater New York we are a very weak people. Yet for three quarters of a century, against great odds, our people have stood bravely by the work. On Manhattan island we have two churches, the one on West 56th, weakened by scandal and scism, the other on 119th St., overwhelmed by a strong Jewish environment. It would be a fitting thing for our Centennial year if our united people would see to it that a handsome building on an excellent site somewhere on the line of the subway were built. The proceeds from the sale of the other two pieces of property might purchase the lot, but the offerings of our best churches would be needed to provide a suitable edifice. If for no reason than for the thousands of Disciples who annually Sunday in New York, this thing should be done. We need a Fifth Avenue church where all may find it, and that easily.

If anybody thinks that the younger preachers of our Brotherhood are fearing the tirade against higher education now being waged by certain brethren on "La Belle Revere," let him look into one of the several eastern universities or theological seminaries. Union in New York is always attractive to our men. The spirit there is fine and the men of the Faculty are of the first order. This year several of our men are taking work there, among whom are Irving S. Chenowith, late of St. Louis, Nero C. Sims of Carthage, Mo., Walter S. Rounds of Brooklyn, J. R. Jolly, associate of Dr. Herbert Martin in Sterling Place, Brooklyn, L. N. D. Wells of East Orange. W. C. Bower of North Tonawanda, is spending the half-year in Columbia doing special work.

Bro. S. T. Willis of 169th Street Church is recovering from his recent illness and is able once more to attend to his pulpit duties. Bro. Harpe, the new pastor of Lenox Avenue Church, is pleasing his members very much by his fine work. Bro. J. L. Darsie continues to supply the West 56th Street Church.

In Brooklyn Bros. Martin, Keevil and Rounds are able to report progress in their respective fields.

All eyes have been turned on East Orange lately. The history of this young church reads like a chapter from the book of Acts. After house to house meetings, a vacant store-room was possible, then a small chapel, now a commodious church. Bro. Bower attended the dedication services and writes, "We have had a wonderful day. The like of it was never seen in the East. Great audiences taxing the splendid building, more than $19,000 was raised, and to crown all, when the invitation was given, twenty-seven responded, nineteen by confession." We New Yorkers count East Orange as ours because so much of the population of Jerseyites are mere sleepers there. We rejoice in that Bro. Wells has so thoroughly awakened them to the importance of their field.

The past month has witnessed a great change in my work here. We have had Miss Lemert with us and she has done great things for our Bible School. Instead of 110 to 130 present, we have now 300, enrolling 102 new pupils in less than three weeks. Last Sunday there were 302 present and the offering was $146.06. She not only builds up a school in numbers, but her Teachers' Institutes are among the many good things she brings. New methods, an appreciation of the work on the part of teachers, and a call to older church members to enroll, these are some of the movements she starts in motion. As a result of the campaign, this church has voted to call a Pastoral Helper and already Miss Annie Neldrum has entered upon her duties. Look out for better things yet from Syracuse.

Syracuse, N. Y. Joseph A. Serena.

DEDICATION AT ROCKFORD.

I spent Sunday, Dec. 20, at Rockford, Ill., assisting W. D. Ward, the pastor of the church, in the opening and dedicatory exercises of their new place of meeting.

The church has been meeting for several years in an incommodious building, located in a very undesirable neighborhood. Yet with all of the disadvantages of their equipment, the Rockford church has increased in numbers and in influence in the city under the capable leadership of Mr. Ward.

Just as they were about to make a change of location, the First Baptist Church approached them with a proposal to consider the union of the two churches; these negotiations began early last spring and continued until June, when the action of the Baptist Church (though voting in favor of union by a majority of one) practically defeated the movement. The Disciples then turned to the task of providing for themselves a better equipment. By a fortunate sale of the old property and the purchase of a new location, they have placed themselves in a stragetic position to carry on their work. They now have a corner lot, in one of the best residence districts in Rockford, and a meeting house, reconstructed out of a large residence, with main auditorium on the first floor, seating 300, and class rooms above for tne accommodation of the Sunday-school, prayer-meeting and social gatherings of the church.

I found a live, busy and enthusiastic church, united in their work, and responsive to the leadership of their pastor. Sunday, Dec. 20, was a high day with them. The first service of the day was a prayer meeting at 8:00 a. m.; then a preaching service at 10:10; Sunday-school at 12:00; dedicatory service at 1:00 p. m., closing with a Christmas musical service at 5:00 p. m. Many of the members brought their dinner and remained all day. The auditorium was filled to its fullest capacity at every service.

At the afternoon service at 3:00 o'clock, short addresses were delivered by five or six of the pastors of neighboring churches, who came in to show their sympathy and goodwill. The relations of the church with the other churches are most cordial, due in very large measure to the unfailing friendliness and catholic spirit of its scholarly pastor. Mr. Ward not only preaches Christian union but practices it with admirable consistency, as the presence and words of his brother pastors testified. Such a pastor backed by such a church is bound to make its presence felt in Rockford, in an increasing degree.

The church now feels that it can go on unhampered by the disadvantages of a forbidding location. It has made the exchange of properties without loading itself with debt. They received about $8,000 for the old property, and paid about $13,000 for the new property, and fitted it up for use at a cost of about $1,500. But they have sold off part of the new property and have another part to sell, which will reduce the actual cost to about $7,500, and with the outlay for repairs, leaves them a lot, 100x100 feet, and building, worth $10,000, with an indebtedness of about $2,000.

Errett Gates.

A DEDICATION IN BUFFALO.

The dedicatory exercises of the beautiful and commodious new basement of the Forest Avenue Church were held on Sunday afternoon, Dec. 20. Many were in attendance from Richmond Avenue and Jefferson Street Churches of this city, and some from the Tonawandas and Niagara Falls. R. H. Miller, W. C. Hull and E. F. Randall made brief and very felicitous addresses, after which B. S. Ferrall was "let loose" on the audience, greatly to the delight of all, but especially to the delight of the Forest Avenue Church in so quickly securing good pledges more than the amount called for to put at ease as to payment of all outstanding bills.

The Jefferson Street Church may well be tremulous lest this newly discovered talent in their versatile pastor may cause him too often to be drawn away at church dedications, when Carpenter, Monroe or the wizard Sweeney may not be had. A fine young man made the good confession on Sunday night.

THE KANSAS REVIVAL.

Kansas is having more revivals this year than any other state in the Union, and more than she ever had before in any year of her history. A deep revival spirit has spread through all the churches, and is reaching every town and city within the borders of the state, and thousands have been converted as a result.

The reason for this is easy to see—the Kansas Forward Movement for Evangelistic Work, with Dr. Biederwolf at its head, has by persistent effort and exhortation brought to the consciences of the Christian people of the state the conviction that they are responsible for the spiritual welfare of their communities, and by unflagging encouragement and aid, has brought about united evangelistic efforts in a large proportion of the towns. Besides Dr. Biederwolf and his personal assistants, there are two field secretaries constantly at work in the field. The fact that over ten thousand letters have been sent out within the last year by the officials of the movements shows something of the efforts that have been put forth to make this movement a success.

And it has succeeded, almost beyond the expectations of its organizers. Although this is only the fourth month of the ten months' campaign, already over one hundred towns and cities have held revivals, and hundreds more are making active preparations. Nearly all the meetings are union, and are usually carried on in specially constructed tabernacles or in huge tents. Some of the best evangelists in the country will spend nearly the entire season in Kansas. Evangelist Biederwolf and his party have their state engagements made up to June. They have just closed a meeting at Independence, where a great tabernacle seating three thousand was crowded nearly every night, and over eight hundred people accepted Christ. Some of the other leading places where revivals have been held or are being arranged are Topeka, Newton, Wichita, Pittsburg, Manhattan and Kansas City. Indications are that nearly every town in the state will have had a revival before June 30, 1909, when the campaign will close.

JASPER AND DADE.

On Tuesday, Dec. 15, was held at Webb City, the annual county convention of the churches of Jasper county. The writer attended and made an address on the State Bible-school work. Nearly all of the churches of the county were reported. Reports were encouraging and plans for the future earnest and liberal. On Wednesday the writer was at Dade county convention, at Lockwood, and made an address on the State Bible-school work. Dade has not so many churches as Jasper, but those it has are mostly alive to the Lord's cause. W. B. Cochran, who lives in that county, and preaches for several of the churches, is just now removing to Jefferson City, where he will be a member of the legislature soon to convene. The Dade county brethren received our message with apparent gladness and interest, as did also those of Jasper. No region of the state of Missouri is making more rapid progress than southwest Missouri, the district in which these two counties are located.

traitors, for the delectation of those who love that kind of journalism. There must be a future life, otherwise God were unjust, and these men have suffered in vain. No adequate reward has come for their labors and sacrifices in this present life.

It is clear, then, that Chicago Christians are humans, and of a very fine variety, with some of the other kind put in to give the background to the picture. There is the making of a great city movement in the group. When re-inforcements of men and money come, the Disciples shall be much in the public eye, not through their own seeking, but through honest contributions to the greatest moral, social and religious problem in our entire country.

CHURCH NOTES.

The Monroe Street choir sang Dudley Buck's "Coming of the King" the Sunday before Christmas to a large audience.

There were eight additions at the Memorial Church one Sunday recently. Dr. Willett is in his pulpit every Sunday now.

There were five additions the past two Sundays at the Hyde Park church. Among these were Rev. and Mrs. Roscoe Hill recently arrived from Havana, Cuba.

Rev. G. W. Thomas, of Lynville, Ill., will hold a meeting for the West End Church where Rev. C. M. Kreidler ministers. Mr. Thomas is loaned by his church to the West End Church. The meeting begins Jan. 3.

Rev. Roscoe Hill supplied the pulpit at Chicago Heights last Sunday.

The choir of the Evanston Church gave a cantata the Sunday before Christmas and the Sunday-school gave a cantata the following Wednesday evening.

After an absence of more than two months —most of the time in an Englewood hospital, where he underwent a serious surgical operation—C. G. Kindred Sunday morning resumed his pulpit ministrations. As he stepped upon the platform, the audience greeted him with the Chautauqua salute, commingled with the singing of "Praise God from Whom all Blessings Flow," and immediately folowed by "Blest be the Tie." At the close of the sermon seven responded to the invitation, five to take membership by letter and two to make the good confession. In the evening, returned missionary H. P. Shaw gave a stirring address on "China and its need of the Gospel." Mr. Kindred, who is still in physical weakness, but gaining, will, for the time being, preach only one sermon on Lord's day, though planning to be present at the evening service, also.

A Man May Eat Any Meal

And Digest It Easily If He Will But Try.

FREE DIGESTIVE TABLETS.

Don't be afraid of your meals. The reason you have dyspepsia is that something is lacking in your digestive apparatus necessary to the stomach's work.

A perfect stomach loves to work. Perfect digestion is not afraid of any meal and benefits by its consumption of food the whole machine of man.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets make easy the work of digestion, because they combine active fruit and vegetable essences which are needed by the stomach.

These essences are so powerful they digest food without aid from the stomach. They have done this with a meal encased in a glass tube.

We will send a trial package to any one free for his name and address.

Eat what you will or when you will, then take a Stuart Dyspepsia Tablet and see how you will digest that meal. In a short time your stomach will have a natural supply of gastric juices and your whole system will be able to take care of digestion easily.

Ask any druggist about Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets. His answer will tell more than we can say. Ask him how they sell. If you want to buy them give him 50c. But if you want to test them write us and you will receive a trial package by mail without cost. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

A JOYFUL GRADUATION AT CAMDEN POINT, MO.

On Sunday night, Dec. 13, in the presence of a great gathering of the people of Camden Point and surrounding country, it was my pleasure to make the graduation address to the Teacher-Training class of that church, and to hand them their diplomas. Though small in number, the class has done some of the best work of any class in the state under the efficient leadership of their teacher, Mrs. E. L. Barham. Another class will be organized at once, and those who graduated in the First Standard Course, will probably take up the Second Standard Course and pursue their studies.

President E. L. Barham, of the Missouri Christian College is superintendent of the Bible-school and an ardent friend of Teacher-Training. John P. Jesse will, at the close of this year, complete ten years of service in the pastorate, but prefers to devote his services elsewhere for the present. Missouri College is enjoying its usual success and adding each year to its reputation as a training school for splendid Christian womanhood. It is a burning and shining light for a great region of country. Teacher-Training will be introduced as a part of its regular program.

CHRISTMAS TREE CUSTOM UPHELD

The country's forests again have been called upon to supply about four million Christmas trees, and again many persons have asked themselves and have queried the United States Forest Service, "Is the custom a menace to the movement for forest preservation?"

In the millions of happy homes over the country where the younger generation has made the Christmas tree the center of play since early Friday morning, there are many mothers and fathers who have given the question more or less thought. From Sunday-schools and other organizations also, which hold an annual celebration around a gayly trimmed evergreen for the benefit of the little ones, has come the question whether it is consistent to urge conservation of forest resources and then to cut millions of young trees every year to afford a little joy in the passing holiday season.

"Yes, it is consistent and proper that the custom should be maintained," has been the answer of United States Forester Gifford Pinchot in every case. "Trees are for use, and there is no other use to which they could be put which would contribute so much to the joy of man as their use by the children on this one great holiday of the year.

"The number of trees cut for this use each year is utterly insignificant when compared to the consumption for other purposes for which timber is demanded. Not more than four million Christmas trees are used each year, one in every fourth family. If planted four feet apart they could be grown on less than 1,500 acres. This clearing of an area equal to a good-sized farm each Christmas should not be a subject of much worry, when it is remembered that for lumber alone it is necessary to take timber from an area of more than 100,000 acres every day of the year."

The object of Education Day is not primarily to secure money but to develop the acquaintance between the church and the college. But since the heart follows the treasure it is well to give every member of every church an opportunity on this day to make a practical expression of his interest in the cause of Christian education.

The aggregate value of property held by our colleges and schools is now $4,011,304, their total endowment amounts to $2,067,749. On Education Day, January 17, every church ought to consider earnestly the importance of having a bequest for education in every will made by one of its members. There is an increasing number of our noblest men and women of means who give annually hundreds of thousands to this sacred cause. They are making their offerings more generous this year than ever before. They have probably remembered the college in their wills but they wish also to see some of their money rendering service while they live. Disciples of less means should have the privilege of the same fellowship by each making an offering according to his ability on Education Day.

One thousand one hundred and four young men are in these schools preparing for the ministry. We are asking for a thousand recruits to this number this year and the colleges must be prepared to take care of them when they come. Let everybody help.

Centennial Secretary.

"Tristis Italia"

If Ramah wept over the departing children of Israel as they wended their way past the tomb of Rachel on the road to exile, much more is Rome called on to mourn the slaughter of her children in the earthquake-devastated regions of lower Italy and Sicily. No horror of recent years compares with this in magnitude and completeness of ruin. One of the fairest regions of the earth, the paradise of the winter tourist, and lover of nature, has been swept by a wave of destruction from which it cannot recover for half a century.

Not Rome alone, the mother of Italy, but the mother-heart of the world has been touched by this inexpressible tragedy. Already swift ships are speeding to the relief of the homeless and stricken people. The horrors of the event can never be known. Faint echoes of the awful ruin wrought came from survivors, but the hand of oblivion covers the larger number of those terrible scenes that must have been enacted. Perhaps it is a merciful hand, for the full recital of the facts would no doubt be too harrowing for recall.

At such a moment it is impossible to avoid putting to ourself and one's faith certain questions which demand, if not adequate answer, at least consideration. What is the cause of such a calamity? Is man in any degree responsible? What is God's part in it? Did it come about by the divine will? If so where is that mercy of God, that tenderness of which prophets, apostles and our Lord have told us? Does not such an event stagger our Christian confidence, and cause us to lift white faces to the heaven that seems not to hear?

Three attitudes may be held toward events of this sort, and God's relation to them. The first is one of denial that there is any such relation. God may be conceived as either non-existent or uninterested in human affairs. He is simply the convenient way in which we describe the reign of law, the aggregation of forces which make up the universe; or he is too transcendental, too far off and too unrelated to our problem of life to concern himself with us or to render us aid in such distress. This will be the explanation of the atheist or the agnostic according to the place one gives to deity in his scheme of the universe. To the men who hold this view it would be as useless to think of God's part in this tragedy as responsible and purposeful as to ascribe volition and emotion to the machine that crushes the rock for our streets.

A second view is quite the opposite of this. According to this theory God is the direct cause of all that transpires. No event is outside of his notice and his directing interest. He is immediately involved in every event. All the movements of nature are the results of his purpose and power, directly applied. Such a thing as law, save as a human enactment, or a mandate for human obedience, is not to be considered. At every moment God decides what we will do. His decision is right because he makes it. For purposes of his own he creates the world and man. For purposes no less his own he turns man to destruction and says, "Return, ye children of men." He carries them away as with a flood. In the morning they are like grass which grows up. In the evening it is cut down and withers. If evil befalls, it is God's good pleasure. "Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord have not done it?" "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away." This is the Hebrew view of God and of trouble. It is found throughout the Old Testament. It knows nothing of second causes. It looks with tear-dimmed face on the havoc about it, and suffers in silence because God has done it. It is conscious of no irreverence in charging God with evil, because it submits to what it deems his heavy hand, and only seeks to know why, if that be possible.

But a third answer to the problem is offered by the teaching of Jesus regarding the Father, and its harmony with the enlarging body of our knowledge of nature, that other great revelation of God. Both teach us that God is reality, and that his in the heart of a Father. In order to accomplish his purposes of good he makes out his great designs according to pinciples or methods which we call the laws of the universe. These he does not change, because they are the best. He is not the creature of these laws, but he uses them as his ways of working. In accordance with them all nature moves. To violate them would bring havoc, not merely local and partial, but essential and limitless. But these laws are the rules by which all things change from lesser to greater forms, from lower to higher. Change involves disturbance, suffering, tragedy. No improvement comes without the displacement, revolution, ruin which seems at first wholly destructive. Not an excavation is made for a building that a thousand forms of life are not called upon to perish before the foundation can be laid. Not a building rises to strength and beauty in the heart of a great city that from one to a score of human lives are not sacrificed. The disaster in Italy is only a more vivid and impressive illustration of the law of change and sacrifice. The internal fires of the earth die gradually down. The crust of the planet shrinks. The forces that once upheaved mountains now only shake down walls. It is terrible in its demonstration of colossal power. but it works out slowly and with the throes of pain the long history of the continents.

But this is not all. Man learns in the school of God the art of mastering even these hidden and deadly energies. Once the plague, the cholera and the pestilence walked abroad and reaped their horrible harvests of death. Why do they no longer scourge the world? Because God has been teaching man in the great school of nature and experience. Our famine was a recognized and expected visitant. Today in western lands it is unknown, and even in the east it gradually yields to better agriculture and more adequate transportation. Once ships went forth to take their chances of storm and wreck. Today the signal service along the coasts, the wireless telegraph and the marvels of ship construction render water travel far safer than journeying by land.

It is the task of science—and science is only man's ordered knowledge of God's work—to sweep away the remaining monsters that threaten man's life—the white plague, the aridness of the desert, and the devastations of volcanoes and earthquakes. These last will come by the location of danger-belts of the earth's surface, in which cities can only be built with due knowledge of the peril involved and such ability to forewarn the menaced localities that escape for all will be possible.

These are God's ways of educating men. No growth in power or in knowledge is without toil, peril, suffering, sacrifice. But in these experiences we come more fully to know our Father as no untroubled and unsympathetic being, above the storm. But the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the God of pity and of love. No human sufferings are beyond his notice. But they are a part of our growth, and how small a part they play in the long drama of any individual experience. The suffering, at the worst, is but for moments or years. But life is eternal if we are willing to pay the price of tuition in God's school.

Meanwhile the most precious lesson of this tragedy is the sense of brotherhood which it brings. The wires that flash the intelligence of gold and silver hurrying to the relief of the stricken are binding the world together in a fresh experience of brotherhood. The ships that carry supplies are the messengers of peace and good will. This is the interpretation which our blessed faith gives to an event so sombre as that which has brooded over the opening year. May its significance not be cast in the facing of our personal problems of suffering and service.

THE TREND OF EVENTS

By Alva W. Taylor

METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE

The great M. E. Church has a Federation for Social Service. The first national conference was recently held in St. Louis. The dominant notes were that the social crusade must be religious at bottom and that the church is a means to an end, not an end within itself, and that the present church agencies need to be more largely directed to doing of the social work that the times demand. The undenominational social settlement received hearty commendation which is another evidence of the growing fact of more Christianity and less churchianity.

THE GREAT HINDU NATIONAL CONGRESS

The great National Congress of India is now in session at Madras. There are 2,000 delegates in attendance. This congress is fast proving that India is preparing a body of men and developing a national patriotism and unity that would make self-government progressively possible. It represents all classes, religions and nationalities that can send educated representation. India is the most heterogeneous of lands but the education that Christian missions and the colonial government are giving is fast breaking down divisive lines, caste is beginning to disintegrate, the petty states are taking on metropolitan interest and patriotism is dawning in the land. The congress has already heartily approved John Morley's plan for a fuller native representation on the governmental boards and in the national council and will have a wide influence for peace in the present turmoil—peace so long as the trend is toward nationalism.

LABOR BECOMING CAPITALIST

The great shipbuilding firm of Furness, Withy & Co., of London, has recently proposed to its workmen a scheme that will do good to the prophetic heart of the Laird of Skibo whose dream of the end of all labor troubles in his latest book was noted in these columns recently. They offered their employees the choice of one of two proposals. One was that the workmen should take over the entire plant, paying for same on easy terms and at a price to be fixed by assessors agreed upon. The second was that they should buy shares of stock to any amount by having five per cent of their wages applied to the purchase, the company guaranteeing four per cent on such moneys and agreeing to divide all profits after due allowance for depreciation and five per cent on all other stock had been deducted. The union discussed the matter maturely and accepted the second proposition, further agreeing to arbitrate all labor difficulties, giving the plan one year's trial, after which it will be permanently voted upon. It is confidently believed the result will be a permanent partnership of employer and employee and an end of all disagreements through the community of interest. Seven of the London Gas companies are trying a like experiment.

WHO SHALL CARE FOR THEIR INJURED WORKMEN?

This is one of the vital problems clamoring for settlement. Many a poor man has been sent to poverty in the arts of peace by being injured in the performance of duty and his family left helpless while the wheels whirred on and the world was made the richer. Young men who enlisted in the Cuban campaign are pensioned for ills accruing which only a physician can find. What of the mighty army of workers? Congress will consider the question for federal and interstate commerce employees and the President urges that it must enact a model law for the district of Columbia which he would like to see made a sort of national experiment station or model for the nation in all social legislation. Thirty-one legislatures will meet this winter and bills are ready to be introduced in at least fourteen of them. Most of them will doubtless be called upon to consider the matter. In Illinois the Industrial Insurance Commission, of which Prof. Charles R. Henderson, of Chicago, is the most active member, will ask for a law along the lines laid down in the bill introduced two years ago. It will provide that an employer may be released from liability by signing an agreement with employees in which each agrees to pay half the expense of an insurance policy covering all accidents. This is strongly criticized on the ground that the employer's share will soon be assessed against the employee by a corresponding reduction in his wages which means he must bear his own losses by accident entirely while the employer is relieved of even his present liability. In most of the proposed bills accident through the carelessness of a fellow worker does not relieve the employer as heretofore.

A GATUN DAM ALLITERATION

No doubt many of the authorities are tempted to alliteration over the criticism of the Gatun dam. Sensational reports are constant about some part of the great Panama enterprise as there is bound to be in a free country and especially where a certain type of journalism is typified ethically by the remark of a New York editor who condemned "journalistic ethics" to a place that plays in this alliteration also. The latest is that the great dam, a mile and a half long, a third of a mile wide at the base and 135 feet high, was sinking. As a matter of fact it is sinking—right where the engineers designed that it should. An old French channel, filled with silt, runs under it and the rock is sinking down to bed-rock bottom just as it was planned. Next!

INDUSTRIAL CO-OPERATION

The report of the Fortieth Annual Congress of the Coöperative Union of Great Britain is out. The past year added more than 100,000 members to the Union which now numbers nearly 2,000,000 coöperators representing over 8,000,000 people or one-fifth of the entire population of the United Kingdom. They did more than half a billion of business the past year, an increase of $39,000,000 over last year and paid $60,000,000 profits, an increase of over $5,000,000. The various stores, factories, and agencies represent a paid-in capital of nearly a quarter of a billion, considerable proportion of which is the accumulation of bonuses on purchases. $19,000,000 is held in reserve for "days of depression." They have helped 50,000 members build homes and "Garden Cities" and "Garden Suburbs" are being founded. They also expect to remove their factories to the country and the whole movement is developing into a humanitarian rather than a mere financial project. Instead of the competition that leaves many unemployed, coöperation tends to provide bread for all who will labor for bread. Not until man has enough to eat will he realize that he does not live by bread alone, they proclaim. Last year they spent $460,000 for libraries, scholarships, publications etc. They say "our ideals are our most valuable assets," and "coöperation is a ship and all that board her must belong to the crew."

In the past decade the number of coöperative societies has increased in Denmark from 310 to 1,200; in Hungary from 20 to 2,453; in Switzerland, 2138 have been founded in the past seven years; in Roumania 2,000 in the past ten years; in Sweden 3162 in the past nine years; in Germany there were 25,714 at the close of 1906; in Finland 1016 were formed in the past seven years and in Holland more than 1,000 in the past eleven years. In the United States the farmers of Minnesota have 1,000 coöperative creameries and creameries, elevators and stores are being organized all through the Northern Middle states. In the four months of July-October, this year 138 such new organizations were reported in these states.

THE FIRST BONA-FIDE INTERNATIONAL COURT

The first international tribunal with full powers is that of the five Central American Republics. They have been in a constant melee for many years and, tiring of the thing, concluded to try to do one with another just what the states within a nation do and settle their troubles through a court of justice. The tribunal consists of one representative from each of the nations represented and each is pledged to abide by all decisions. The first real test has just been successfully passed. Honduras accused Guatamala and San Salvador of encouraging certain disaffected patriots of the Central American type in efforts to organize a revolution against her. The case was duly submitted to their tribunal and the claim found not justified, the two judges from the disinterested states agreeing with those of the two accused and the representative of Honduras alone failing to sign the findings. For a territory so easily blown into a gale of passion to so quietly accept the finding is significant of what might be done by a permanent mandatory tribunal at The Hague. Some of the South American countries have some unsettled disputes which will probably be referred to this new tribunal and there is a feeling that Venezuelan cases should also find settlement there. This neck of continents that has been as tempestuous as a channel between two seas may yet point the way and demonstrate the practicability of a mandatory court of justice between nations. It may be here added that Argentina and Chili some time ago signed a permanent arbitration treaty and sold their navies. Lately there has been some jingo scare in Argentina because Brazil is building a navy, but the last Bulletin of the International Bureau of American Republics outlines a treaty that is well under way between them in which they agree to arbitrate all but those questions "that affect the constitutional precepts of the two countries." They do not agree upon a permanent court but do agree to appoint a court for each case that arises and to abide by its decision.

CRIMINAL OR REVOLUTIONIST

Deep interest and no little excitement has been occasioned in Chicago by the efforts of the Russian government to secure the extradition of Christian Rudovitz, a Lettish workingman or peasant, on the charge of murder. The question is asked why a country that has its hands more than full with police matters should be so interested in running down common criminals and especially as most of the European nations are willing that we should have those classes and as the cost of this effort to get the humble peasant is very expensive. Now Russia is in the full tide of reaction from the recent wave of revolution which swept over the country before the close of the war with Japan. It can never recede to the old dead level but much that seemed gained is being lost. Cossacks and police are striking terror to the hearts of the revolutionary and the dreadful drum-head court is pronouncing doom upon hundreds in the customary medieval manner. It is believed that the effort to get such men as Rudovitz and Pouren, the peasant whose case has recently been agitating New York, is a piece of strategy. We do not extradite political offenders. Our nation was founded by such and we believe in the right of revolution and disbelieve in punishment for political nonconformity. We do not believe in treason as such, yet we know that treason in such a land as Russia is simple patriotism in a land like our own. To defeat this state of affairs the Russian police powers are trying to secure these revolutionaries on criminal charges, take them home and execute them as a warning that such as they need no longer expect to escape to either England or America, the only two lands where they are now assured of protection. It seems that Rudovitz had part in a revolutionary meeting where three spies of the government were condemned to death and either had part in the execution or at least had knowledge of it. The Commissioner ordered his extradition as a common criminal but appeal has been taken to the State Department and additional evidence in his favor is now found. He admits having taken part in the sentence but not in the execution of it.

A Centennial Event

We are to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of the publication of the "Declaration and Address" by Thomas Campbell, at Pittsburg, October 11-17, next. It is believed we will meet 50,000 strong. The opinion has been expressed that the attendance of the Jubilee Convention at Cincinnati, in 1899, will be quadrupled. Already preparations are being made in a number of churches for large delegations. And Australia, England, Japan, and possibly other nations will be represented.

"Where the Scriptures speak we speak" has been our emphatic slogan for the past century. Marvelous victories have been won in this and other lands. We number more than a million in this country alone. Our simple New Testament plea has girded the earth with mission stations. At Pittsburg we will recount these and other victories and rejoice together that the Lord has been able to use us in His gracious, world-wide purposes.

During all this Centennial year let us seek the clear and lofty faith, the evangelistic temper, and the consistent piety of the great and good men of one hundred years ago, who sought to restore the New Testament church in teaching and practice and spirit. Past achievements, present opportunities, and all the glorious promises of a reunited church and the evangelization of the whole world, summon us to a more complete consecration of our lives and to our best and most loyal efforts.

As our churches approach the annual offering for world-wide missions this great Centennial year, they will be cheered as they recount the things done last year. In spite of a widespread, financial depression and an unparalleled, exciting, political campaign, a real advance was made. But the situation is altogether different now. Business is awaking to new activities. The storm of political agitation is passed. Everywhere there is confidence and hope. We believe our people are ready as never before for a united, enthusiastic, effective step toward the evangelization of the pagan world.

Let us remind ourselves that the basis of our efforts to bring the world to Christ is the Word of the living God. This was the weapon of our pioneers. This is God's great instrument for the conversion of the world. We are custodians of the gospel which is the power of God unto salvation. Before Christ the prophets saw the world redeemed through the gospel. Christ was God's missionary. "As my Father hath sent me," said Jesus, "So I send you." The apostles were missionaries of Christ. Indeed, the very word "apostle" means "missionary." "Apostle," "missionary," "one sent," "messenger," all mean the same thing. The New Testament church went everywhere preaching the Word. Preaching was the one business of the apostles and of the primitive church. A preaching church is loyal, spiritual, united, aggressive and a growing church. As a Christian people we have nothing to teach but the gospel and nothing to do but to preach the gospel. With Barton W. Stone, who embraced this plea as early as 1804, we can say, "Let all Christians, therefore, unite in prayer, that God would send forth faithful laborers unto His harvest; that He would collect and unite into one His scattered flock, that the whole world may believe in Christ the Savior of sinners." This is the kernel of our plea, the union of the people of God to the end that the world may be evangelized.

March 7th will be indeed a Centennial event. It will be to us a great day, a day to be remembered in all our after lives. It will be to us God's day. Think not of it as an ordinary day. It will be a day full of possibilities, far-reaching. We must make it a real Centennial event. Prayer and pains and preparation and vision and a holy purpose will lead us to one of the crowning occasions of all our splendid history.

It will be well for all to keep in touch with the office of the Foreign Society for information, for suggestions and all necessary helps.

Remember March 7th!

What effect will the Emmanuel movement have on our attitude toward Christian Science? Does it not involve a practical recognition of the truth of Christian Science? We think not. On the contrary we predict that the frank recognition of the truth in this modern cult puts us in a position to expose the whole system of presumption and fraud by which thousands are being ensnared. The scientific-psychic movement in therapeutics and religion is the worst foe of the unscientific-psychic cult named Christian Science. The impossible conceptions upon which this preposterous religion is built cannot permanently support a structure which men take as seriously as they do their religion. Christian Science has pointed out an unperceived truth, has indeed called the attention of the thinking as well as the unthinking world to it. But that truth is now being shucked from its metaphysical wrapping and put into the guidance of sane and informed leaders. Meanwhile, unless Christian Science greatly modifies its claims it will surely be called suddenly to account for imposition which not infrequently becomes criminal.

At the Chicago Ministers' meeting last Monday one of the pastors who has been in the city a number of years expressed in the tenderest way his appreciation of O. F. Jordan's article in last week's Century on Chicago Disciples. This is but one of the many words of praise of Mr. Jordan's page that we receive. Chicago is pivotal for the nation. Considering its importance as a city it is the most susceptible field for the cultivation of the essential Christianity for which the Disciples stand. Church prejudices are not deep here as in older cities—indeed, in one of its aspects this is the fact most deplored: that people have so little interest in religion that they haven't any prejudices on the subject. Mr. Jordan's description of the difficulties of the work here was a revelation even to some Chicago people, and must have been the more so to those who live outside the city. The Chicago page of the Christian Century promises to grow increasingly interesting from week to week.

The distressing news comes to us in a heart-breaking letter written by himself that Mr. P. C. Macfarlane was suddenly bereaved of his wife just as he was about to leave Alameda, Cal., for his new work as leader of the Men's Brotherhood movement. Mrs. Macfarlane died a few hours after giving birth to a baby boy, the fourth child born to their home. The all but crushing blow fell as Mr. Macfarlane was leaving the church services on Sunday morning on his way to the hospital. This sorrowful news will strike grief to hundreds of hearts in our brotherhood who know Mrs. Macfarlane to love her. She was a tender and most intelligent companion of her husband in all his church work, furnishing inspiration and motives for his useful life. The entire brotherhood, to whom he now belongs, shares the grief of Mr. Macfarlane in the tenderest sympathy. The Editors of the Christian Century pray that the great Companion may be the stay of the stricken household in these lonely days.

In preparing the minds of our church people for the March offering to Foreign Missions much good use should be made of President Roosevelt's article on the "Awakening of China" printed in the Outlook of November 28. Certain minds unpersuaded by the message of preacher or missionary may perhaps yield to the masterly statement of our statesman president. Mr. Roosevelt concludes that the missionary is not simply saving souls in a theological sense but is quickening society and establishing ideals of such a sort as to make business and intellectual and social co-operation possible on a large scale between the orient and the occident. He concludes his article thus:

"The awakening of China is one of the great events of our age, and the remedy for the 'yellow peril', whatever that may be, is not the repression of life, but the cultivation and direction of life. Here at home we believe that the remedy for popular discontent is not repression but justice and education. Similarly the best way to avert possible peril, commercial or military, from the great Chinese people, is by behaving righteously toward them and by striving to inspire a righteous life among them. Our Christian missions have for their object not only the saving of souls, but the imparting of a life that makes possible the Kingdom of God on the earth. It seems to me that there is no place where there is better opportunity today to do this work than in China, and I earnestly hope that we can attract the attention of the great public outside the so-called missionary circles to the possibility and practicability, no less than to the importance, of the work. As Bishop Brent has said, now is the time for the West to implant its ideals in the Orient, in such fashion as to minimize the chance of a dreadful future clash between two radically different and hostile civilizations; if we wait until tomorrow, we may find that we have waited too long."

No minister can accomplish much in two years of residence in a parish. He can only scratch the surface of his community. He may add many to the church, but such results may have little spiritual significance. What tells in a ministry is not eloquence, or hustling or manipulating, but the minister's own spiritual character which expresses itself through these activities and talents. And it takes years for this personal character to establish itself in the hearts of the people of a community so as to be spiritually effective there. The custom of long pastorates among us would change the type of our churches in a radical fashion. The difference between typical Methodist and Presbyterian churches could be explained by the difference in the average lengths of their pastorates. We consider Mr. Oeschger's article in this issue a helpful suggestion making toward longer pastorates. But the cause of our short-lived ministeries lies deeper than the technical contract of engagement, as we are sure Mr. Oeschger will agree. Our ministers themselves, as well as the churches, hold too lightly the pastoral engagement.

A pastor was telling us the other day of his purpose to move to another field. "My church," he said, "is at flood-tide now. I think I should resign before any trouble appears or any ebb of our prosperity. That will leave them in a good condition to get a new pastor, and it puts me in a position to command a prominent parish for my new field." He had been with this church two years. Another pastor in a good sized town was regretting the fact that his work was completed in that community because there were no more people there to be converted. He had the strongest church in the place, and had received so many accessions in the four years of his pastorate that a religious canvass of the town showed only an insignificant group of unattached residents. This condition he urged as a reason why he should relinquish the parish and seek a new field for himself. These two instances were instructive to us of the insufficient conceptions which ministers do themselves have of their work. The first conversation betrayed the fact that the minister knew his success was more apparent than real, that he had been using high pressure, unspiritual methods, and that when the fire came to try his work—as it comes to every man—it would prove to be, for the most part, wood, hay and stubble. His desire for a "change" was perfectly natural. The other man simply lacked vision of his big opportunity or else was conscious of his spiritual and mental exhaustion.

When one thinks of it, it requires a soul richly equipped with knowledge and sympathy to minister to the same congregation year after year. The preacher must have foundations of culture and of spirituality laid good and deep in his soul if he hopes to be able to maintain a long pastorate. The "barrel" of sermons is soon used up, and even sooner the "barrel" of social amenities. If when the novelty of the new preacher with his new methods and his revivalistic vigor is worn off, the people discover below the surface a selfish or a lean soul, or an indolent intellect whose pigeon-holes are filled with scraps of ideas picked up years ago, the days of that pastorate will certainly be numbered. With all its chances for dissimulation we know of no calling in which the real man will so surely be discovered in the long run as in the ministry.

The long-pastorate minister must have opened within him the well of water springing up into enduring life. His touch with God must be vital and real, constantly renewing his soul with fresh enrichment of grace. His touch with truth must be vital and real, constantly renewing his mind with fresh enrichment of knowledge. His people soon become wearied of ideas drawn from a cistern. But truth drawn from a living well is ever fresh. New books, live literature, and leisure in which to read and meditate are indispensable to a preacher who would really feed the flock of God through a continuous ministry of years. And with the college rests the secret of giving the young minister a taste, not for the old cistern water of dogma and tradition, but for the fresh stream of knowledge flowing through the midst of our modern civilization.

The Sin of the Heretic

By Harry F. Burns

What is the sin of the "heretic"? What is his offense? It is in a word, non-conformity. The sentence of the unprejudiced judge is, "I find no fault in him." His brethren cry, "Crucify him." And his offense—it is that he differs from them in his thinking and perchance in some of his teaching. He fails to conform to the accepted standards of the group with which he is associated. He is out of fashion; if not because clinging to an outgrown fashion, he accepts standards not yet generally accepted. To be out of fashion is to be out of the world, in a very real sense; it is to be out of sympathetic association with others. The passport to societies, "sets," "clicks" or "clubs," is conformity; either natural and normal, or artificial and harmful. This demand for uniformity is so strong as to be able to prescribe with considerable definiteness, not only the style of dress, and rules of etiquette, but even standards of thinking and teaching.

Nowhere is this more evident than in question of politics and of religion. At the peril of his life, the subject of a king may refuse to conform to the royal decree. The first task of the victorious party in Greece or Rome was to put to death the leaders of the opposing party—that they might thus insure conformity to their demands. Jeremiah and Isaiah were victims of the demand for conformity to a mistaken and wicked political policy. To Daniel and his friends was given the alternative, "bow or burn." Count Tolstoi's sin against an oppressive Russian government was nonconformity. Every advance step in the history of the church has been won at the price of the blood of the nonconformists. The death of the martyrs was the penalty of nonconformity either to the political or ecclesiastical power of the time.

But conformity is a virtue only when for the purposes of the group it is needed to have men act together, unthinkingly rather than intelligently and independently. The effectiveness of an army depends upon the unquestioning obedience of every member of the body. The conditions of tribal life demanded that the will of the chief be supreme. Conformity is a virtue in a militant society, when it is of first importance to be able to move the whole body as one man. It was the virtue that gave power to the Roman army and that today gives power to the Roman church over the minds of immigrants to America. But a different ideal obtains in Protestantism and Democracy. There the progress of the whole depends upon the progress of each individual member of the group. To progress the individual man must think independently. It is by being free to think and to express the results of his thinking that he may contribute to the life of the whole. This is the secret of the rapid advance of scientific learning of the past century in Protestant countries. But strangely enough the churches that have protested against the demand for conformity to the teaching of the church of Rome, would now demand conformity to the teaching of a past century, and the people who have decried creeds, would now demand acceptance of a creedal statement as a test of one's right to the privileges of the body. We are, but for a day, setting up the golden calf modeled from our former bondage. We shall not long remain here but shall pass on to the land which we are to inherit where every man may be free to think and to speak, so long as he is loyal, not to dogma but to the great ideals of the Gospel of Christ. The "heretic" is a nonconformist, but have we not passed the time when nonconformity is a sin? He who would say otherwise—let him call a council of the church and elect a pope, and give him power to punish with death any who may not conform to his edicts.

The Church and the Christian College

By W. F. Rothenburger

No apology need be made for placing the interests of education in our calendar. Both our heritage and the spirit of the age demand it.

It is contended that to the Disciples of Christ belongs the honor of organizing the first college in whose curriculum the teaching of religion received first place. It belongs to us, therefore, to protect and advance this most serviceable and effective work. We have pleaded effectively for an educated ministry, and let there be no abating of interest here, but we must plead as well for an educated laity. While the efficiency of a layman's work in the kingdom does not depend wholly upon his mental training, it adds mightily to his influence as well as to his conception of men and money.

The best interests of our young men and women demand the perpetuity of the Christian College in our educational system. No university in the land can possibly mean as much to certain periods of young life as can the Christian College. Yet with the almost unlimited funds pouring into larger institutions, and their consequent superior equipment, it becomes increasingly difficult to perpetuate the Christian College, and will continue to be so until the Church awakens to its opportunity.

The manner in which the church has played its part in this great work is shown by the facts concerning an $80,000 endowment list for one of our oldest colleges, pledged within the last twelve months. Less than $20,000 of this amount, or twenty-five per cent, came from our own members. We have too long thrown the responsibility of endowing our institutions upon our college presidents. The president of Vassar has recently declared that this burden should be lifted from the shoulders of these men, while the head of another of America's greatest institutions of learning lamented upon his death bed that he should ever be remembered most of all by his career as a "getter of money."

Alas for us if the rank and file does not respond to this great need. If the churches contend that local interests consume their resources let them believe that adding the price of one tuition to their annual budget would soon greatly increase their power by the developing of an educated laity. If they contend that their outside interests must be limited to missions proper, let them remember that the larger missionary spirit of the majority of our most consecrated men and women on both the home and foreign fields was born during their college career. If the church believes that the Christian college can continue to depend upon students from disinterested homes, let it begin to realize that this will be true only in so far as the college can offer advantages somewhere nearly as good as the larger institutions. If we look longingly at the increasing fortunes of a few men within and without the church, let us be assured that business sagacity will cling to these more handsome sums until their confidence has been won by a reasonable liberality from the rank and file of the Brotherhood. Therefore in this great Centennial year, let us not be rebuked by lack of faith in the cause of the Christian college, but let us command the respect of men and the commendation of God by a gift from every church in the Brotherhood.

The Atonement in Modern Terms

By Burris A. Jenkins

The present attempt at a constructive statement upon the subject of the atonement—and it cannot be too often emphasized that it is only an attempt that has so far been made—must begin, it seems to me, somewhere near a point like the following, which has become so familiar in the scientific statements of the day:

All life and all progress in the world are at the expense of sacrifice and death on the part of some one or many. Mere physical existence can only be begun and maintained as the result of rapid, repeated, widespread death. Not only we, but all creatures rise on stepping-stones of others' dead selves to higher things. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now, in giving birth to the next day and the next generation and the next era. To put it ever on the lowest plane, it is not merely certain rudimentary forms of life that make their culminating act the act of reproduction, and with this climax of their careers pass off the stage of the living forever; but even the highest type of life—man—in giving life to his kind that are to follow him, in nurturing them, guarding them, rearing them, voluntarily embraces decay and death, if gradual, yet no less sure.

This sacrifice of life that other life may follow—higher, better life or else the universe is all out of gear—is partly involuntary and partly voluntary. The struggle for life has its fail in the struggle for the life of others. The pouring out of blood for the sustenance of the beasts that prey has its opposite motive in the pouring out of their hearts' rich tide by the mothers of the race that prays. The awful war of extermination that rages in the thick jungles of the tiniest grass-blades as well as in the greatest forests and mountain fastnesses claims not more victims than the altars of voluntary vicarious sacrifice upon which the parents of all men and many creatures willingly and gladly lay down their lives.

The same principle applies, does it not, in matters higher than mere physical existence. There is no advancement in human thought, no growth of any great telling movement among men except at the cost of life. Advance comes by friction, opposition, battle; and these waste life. The scholar burns out his life with his midnight oil. The preacher—if he be really a preacher—dies just so much upon the cross, every time he ascends his pulpit. The statesman—if he be one, and not a mere politician—gives his life for great ideas just as really through his toil as the soldier in his marches and his battles. The man of affairs, that deserts may be watered and conquered, roads built, the earth peopled and prospered, gives his life whatever the motive, either in midnight journeys, or meetings, or wastes it in the confinement of a cell-like office. The world of thought grows, develops, but at what tremendous cost of human life!

In the same fashion, may it be, is it not true that in the world of spirit, growth comes only in the train of death? That souls may be uplifted, cleansed, exalted, redeemed, someone or many must die. Indeed we have seen many die in the ages past for just this purpose. A moral vicarious sacrifice needs little illustration beside our own memories of a long and heroic history. So far we can understand. But is it not possible that just at this point enters the larger sacrifice which we cannot understand—a mysterious sacrifice, a death demanded in the very nature of things spiritual, that higher life, eternal life, sin-free life, might be the portion of the race? The necessity for such a sacrifice is no more mysterious, no more awful, than the necessity for the wholesale slaughter and the multitudinous self-immolation that is going on every hour in the world.

With this general hint, then, as to how the process of redemption is likely to appear to the modern mind, we may attempt to trace its course.

Here is the fact of sin in the world—the one universal problem that man had ever grappled with. Everywhere and in all times men had struggled with it. They had sacrificed lamb after lamb, bullock after bullock, hecatomb after hecatomb, till their temples had run red with blood, and yet, like Lady Macbeth, they had never been able to wash out the foul stain upon their hands. They had a consciousness of their God or their God's hatred of sin, and yet though they had erected priesthoods to intercede with him, they had never been able to arrive certainly at a sense of forgiveness which was, and perhaps still is, the end and aim of all religious service. For one thing, they were uncertain as to the character of their God, and his attitude toward rebellious children.

Such being the state of affairs, and God seeing it, felt the need of a solution for man, of this tragic question; and as a means to this end, of a full revelation to man of his own heart—its hatred toward and horror of sin, its love for and pity toward man. So, when the fulness of time had come, when man had reached such maturity as would comprehend, in some measure, his self-revelation, the Incarnation followed. God chose to reveal his qualities not in a book, not in the words of prophets and teachers, not in a system of theological statements, not in the works of nature. He had already shadowily revealed himself in all these ways, and to individual minds, here and there, these revelations had been intelligible. But to the great multitude of men there is but one book legible and comprehensible, and that is man. Everybody could read a man's life, everybody would read a man's life—so interesting, so fascinating is man to humanity. Hence, when God would send his final message to humanity he must write in this final and universal language of mankind—a man. He did so. He said to the world: "This man is myself. What he is I am. He does always the things that please me. He and I are one. He that hath seen him hath seen me."

Having thus revealed himself fully to men, he proceeded to show through this human medium, his attitude toward sin. Never in all the world has there been such a rebuke of sin as in the mere presence of Jesus Christ upon the earth. Not the broken tables of the law, not the fiery serpents in the wilderness, not the deluge, nor the ashes of Gomorrah have ever carried the conviction of God's unalterable and inappeasable hostility to guilt as has the quiet, gentle, calm dignity of Jesus' sinlessness. The word of God is here heard most convincingly not in the earthquake, not in the fire and tempest, but in the still small voice of the incarnate God. His presence, like that of the Holy Spirit, nay which is identical with that of the Holy Spirit, convicts the world of sin and judgment.

And yet, along with this message of hatred toward sin comes the major strain, the dominant theme, in the symphony of Jesus' life, of God's overflowing, inextinguishable love for man—the sinner. Individuals heard the strain—oh, so clearly—the rich young ruler, the woman of Samaria, Zaccheus the publican, Simon Peter the traitor, the poor arab in the Temple—these and scores besides heard the new note, the song of love and forgiveness: "Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more." Here was no consuming fire of wrath, here was no freezing ice of impenetrable sinlessness, lofty, stark, and aloof. Here was gentleness, long-suffering, mercy, love. This was the heart of God. Individuals caught the message, the nation caught it, and slowly the nations catch it, too.

But this goodness, this tenderness, this sinlessness, this embodied mercy, must suffer in the presence of sinfulness. The very word long-suffering shows that we have some inkling of the pains of God. We have suffered, too, have we not, in some feeble attempts at a purely moral redemption. We have wrestled in soul with an erring brother in the bonds of his sin, with a wilful and headstrong child, with a criminal wretch struggling to be free of the shackles of long habit. We, now and then, have made vicarious atonement, at least in its elements, so far as the simple moral motive extends. But we are not God. We did not make man. We are not responsible for his well-being, his ongoing, in short his redemption. We, therefore, cannot understand the full agony of creative grief at the moral maladjustment of the creature.

We do not know, we cannot tell,
The pain he had to bear.

If we suffer in the throes of a rebirth for some friend, parishioner, or relative, struggling loose from a wicked past, what must have been the agonies of Gethsemane, and of the hours upon the cross?

I would not be misunderstood as implying that this sympathetic moral passion is all there was to the atonement. It is about all that we can understand. But at the outset I tried to say that, in my judgment, mystery is a legitimate part of religion; and because we cannot understand more than this is no reason why we should affirm that there is no more. Indeed we cannot understand why there should be pain and passion in mere physical birth, in intellectual birth, in moral birth. Why then is it a thing incredible that we cannot analyze, systematize, theologize plainly, mathematically, dogmatically, this mysterious process of redemption?

The time has gone by, in my judgment, when theologians presume God to scan, when they employ with smug certitude the phrases, "scheme of redemption," "plan of salvation," and the like. We have come to feel that the scheme, if there is one, is too stellar in its scope, the plan, if there is one, is too nearly like the Pleiades in proportions for us to outline with a geometrical exactness, in the size of a printed page.

That "God hath his mysteries of grace, ways that we cannot tell," I, for one, firmly believe. That he has thus dealt in the profundity of his wisdom, with the problem of sin, I have no doubt. That somehow, the sufferings of Christ were necessary to accomplish his gigantic purpose, is altogether in line with the best scientific thought of today. That those sufferings fulfilled something more than the purpose of erecting a beautiful moral ideal of self-forgetfulness, heroism, courage, renunciation, is, I believe, the conviction of this present age and of the best thought of the age just coming on. What that purpose was we can, no doubt, do little more than hint; but that hint, in harmony with the ascent of man, finds its analogue in the struggle for the life of others which is one of the leading themes in the natural science, social science, political science of the time.

Poets sometimes reach truer conclusions than philosophers, as hearts sometimes are more nearly infallible than heads; and it is a modern American, the editor of one of our leading magazines, who writes:

Subtlest thought shall fail and learning falter,
Churches change, forms perish, systems go;
But our deep human needs they will not alter,
Christ no after age shall e'er outgrow.
Yea, amen, O changeless one, thou only
Art life's guide and spiritual goal,
Thou the light across the dark vale lonely,
Thou the eternal haven of the soul.

I do not feel that I have done much more than preach about this theme—and a little preachment, at that. I fear that the academic philosophers who are here will think it woefully inadequate as a theological statement. And yet, if I have done anything at all, in my half-hour, it is to give the impression that I consider this much more of a theme for preaching than for philosophizing; for, when you philosophers shall fail in stating it, we preachers shall succeed in singing it, such an easy and such a winged song it is, so mysteriously beautiful and so beautifully mysterious, into its resting-place in the aching, sin-scarred hearts of men. I cannot state it in scientific fashion, nor do I believe that you can, but I can preach it, after a certain fashion, and by God's grace I intend to go on preaching it, till this poor lisping stammering tongue, lies silent in the grave; and then I expect to hear it both stated and preached in triumphant voices on the plains of God.

The Minister's Tenure Contract

By William Oeschger

To the end that things which are not as they should be, may be improved, these lines are written. One of the greatest evils that exists among us today is the evil of short pastorates. The churches do not keep their pastors long enough. Just about the time that a pastor is well settled and fairly well acquainted with the church membership and the community the pastoral relationship is terminated. The blame for this termination sometimes rests with the church and sometimes with the pastor, himself. In our independent form of church polity there will always be more or less of these uncalled for pastoral changes. Yet it seems that we should earnestly seek to abate the evil. We must do this if we expect to advance the cause of Christ as it should be advanced.

The churches must learn to be patient with their pastors and the pastors must learn to be patient with their churches. There are ebb-tide and flood-tide periods in the life of every church. It is in the ebb-tide period that pastoral relations are for the most part terminated. But that is not the time for pastoral ties to be broken. It is rather the time in which to work, pray, and patiently wait for results. It is the time when both church and pastor should pray for "Sticking Grace."

But it often happens that just in one of these ebb-tide periods the minister's year is up. Nothing could be more unfortunate than that the church at such a time should be called upon to decide whether it wants to re-employ its minister for another year or not. If there is the least doubt in the minds of some that the depression in church work may be due to the minister in charge, it now grows in magnitude and asserts itself against the minister. If there is opposition to the minister this is the time for this opposition to make itself effective. It is the "psychological moment" for breaking the pastoral tie by the church. If it is such for the church it also has its strong temptations for the minister to do the same. If he must stand for re-election at the end of each year, and opposition to him develops be it ever so insignificant, and the minister is of a sensitive nature, he is liable to look with favor upon some other field. This may lead him to open up a correspondence with another church, which finally results that he decides to go to a new field rather than go through the ordeal of brooking the opposition to his re-election in the old field. The result is that a pastoral relationship that was altogether too short is terminated, the church left pastorless and the pastor going to a new field where he must begin all over again.

Now much that led to this unfortunate result is due to the fact that the minister was called for a definite period of time, an annual term tenure contract. Many of the causes that led to the termination of the pastoral relationship would never have had an existence if the church would not have been called upon to pass upon the question of re-employing the minister for another year. If the minister would not have been called upon to stand for re-election he probably would never have opened up a correspondence with another church, which in the end called him away from his present charge.

A better plan, and one that many churches follow, than that of calling a minister for just one year at a time, is to call him for an indefinite period of time, with the provision that either party, minister or church, may terminate the relationship at any time, previous notice of the same having been given three months prior to the date determined upon for terminating the relationship. The very fact that a man has been called for an indefinite period of time has an aspect of permanency to it that the annual term contract does not have. Such a tenure of service is not conditioned upon a favorable election at the end of the year. It does not afford an annual "psychological moment" for opposition to crystallize itself against the minister's tenure of service. The call for an indefinite period of service eliminates many of the evil features that the annual term contract produces. Just because it does this the pastoral relationships that rest upon it are of longer duration than those that rest upon the annual term contract. A complete induction of all the facts would warrant us in saying that if ministers were called by the churches for an indefinite period of time we would have longer pastorates. Let ministers and churches bind themselves together for an indefinite period of time. The result will be longer pastorates than we now have under the annual term contracts. This is the honest conviction of the writer. What does the reader think?

NOW IS THE NICK O' TIME

Now is the time for the friends of the Christian Century and the cause which it represents to aid in building up our subscription list.

The controversy concerning the Centennial Program and the attack on our Missionary Societies having come to an end, as we now hope, our purpose will be to produce a paper that will be an assistant pastor to every preacher into whose congregation it goes.

We mean to make our pages constructive and inspirational. We shall not fear to lead our readers into new truth as God gives ns to see the truth, but our treatment will be irenic, not controversial.

We aspire to be a layman's paper—as well as a preacher's paper. Our pages will discuss life's big problems in which all earnest men and women are interested. We shall have constantly before us the purpose of building up the spiritual life of our readers—in intelligence, in breadth of vision, in zeal. Every member of the Christian Century family should be a better worker in the church and a better citizen of his community as a result of his habitual reading of our pages.

Therefore we are making this direct request of our friends to enlist other readers. We wish to more than double our circulation in this Centennial year. This could easily be done if the enthusiasm conveyed to us in recent letters were directed toward practical effort. Some have already begun this good work. One prominent pastor writes that he has been waiting only until the controversy should be over to make a personal canvass himself in our behalf. Another pastor asks for sample copies to be sent at once to the address of a bright young man whom he has appointed to solicit every family of his church. Yet another assures us that it is his purpose to present the matter from the pulpit next Sunday morning and take subscriptions, then and there.

Without any systematic effort our circulation has increased nearly fifteen per cent in less than two months. With the active support of our loyal friends, the next three months should set us a long way toward our Centennial aim.

We will pay a cash commission to agents who will send us ten or more subscriptions. Write us for terms.

To Our Knees

O God! Our hearts are smitten and withered as grass before this vast and unspeakable devastation.

The cry of the dying and afflicted has rended our ears and weighted our earth with the burden of an inexpressible sorrow.

The forces of nature which man is powerless to control have stricken us and we are wounded and sore.

We gaze upon the frightful carnage benumbed with agony and witless to understand.

We cannot associate thy love with a spectacle so abhorrent nor can we condone so dire a judgment even with the vague sense of justice that is ours.

Yet we confide in Thee.

We believe that Thou sorrowest with us in our grief, O Thou Father of ours, and that in some way ye cannot comprehend Thou sharest the burden of our great affliction.

Thou who knowest the travail of our world, bear unto us Thy gracious consolation.

As we, in our eagerness, give of our store for the needs of those most distressed—so, O Thou Infinite God, in greater and fuller measure give unto all Thy peoples everywhere which populate this earth, increasing wisdom and strength and grace. Give unto us all (needy children that we be) a faith sufficiently founded and enduring to withstand the might of life's bitterest woes—of her direst and most terrible experiences. Speak Thou peace unto us and let the bonds of Thy unconquerable love unite our world.

A. McLEAN'S BOOK FREE.

Our proposal to give a copy of A. McLean's new book on "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher" with each new subscription of $1.50 has proved so attractive that we have decided to continue it beyond the date (January 2), which we had set for its expiration. During January the offer will hold good. Ministers may have the paper (new subscription), and the book for $1.20.

YOUR OWN PAPER FREE

FOR A LITTLE WORK.

Any minister (who is not in arrears to us) can have his subscription date set ahead one year by sending us 2 New Yearly Subscriptions with $3.00. This applies to ministers who are not now subscribers as well as to those who are.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Dear Brother:—

1. What are the fundamental fallacies and un-Christian doctrines of the Christian Science cult, and cite the scriptures that give the clearest refutation of them.

2. What are the truths of the system, and are they receiving sane and "scientific" treatment in the Emmanuel (Boston) and kindred movements?

3. What are the best and sanest books in the refutation of their false doctrines that you are familiar with?

Thanking you very much for your assistance in advance, I beg to remain, Very sincerely yours,

Buffalo, N. Y. S. B. Lindsay.

Perhaps it will be somewhat better to consider the second question first. The Christian Science movement represents a perfectly natural reaction from the materialistic tendencies of our age. Such reactions are always likely to be extreme. The passion for financial success, coupled with a theory that the conquest of material forces and the wealth which that conquest brings constitute the measure of well-being to which men can attain, is a view of life so unsubstantial and false that it is sure to result in a fresh emphasis upon spiritual things. And this emphasis invites just such fantastic extremes as our day reveals.

Then, too, human suffering is one of the great facts of experience. It is so widespread and distressful that among the experiments made to modify or overcome it, it is inevitable that we should meet the extreme form here presented, of opposing it by a denial of its existence. This is what Christian Science does. It resorts to the method of so strongly insisting upon the nothingness of evil, disease, suffering and sin that by a process of hypnotism, brought by concentration of mind upon the fixed idea of prevalent and triumphant good, it secures, for a time at least, conviction and cure.

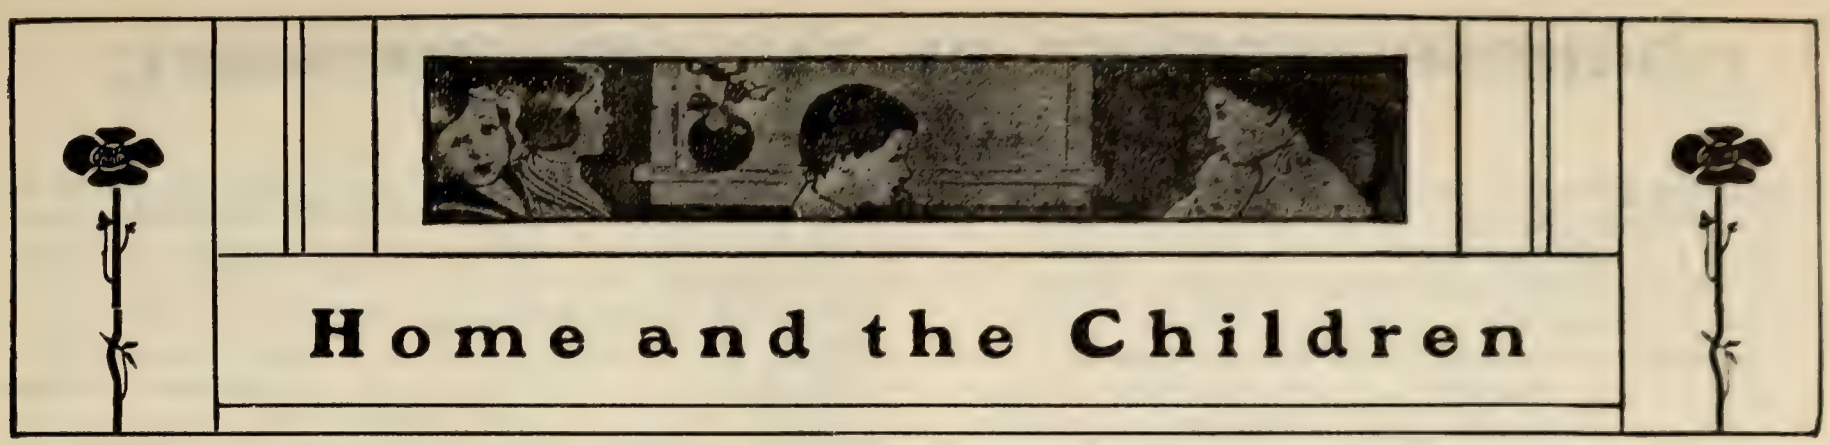
It is not to be doubted that the partial acquaintance of the west with eastern philosophies which place emphasis upon the illusive nature of matter and the ideal of absorption in Deity, has had its effect in making Christian Science popular with a certain class. The mystical element in religion has great charm for lower types of mind, and no one questions the extent to which this factor finds place in the cult we are considering. If one adds the item of taste in church architecture and equipment, and a certain studied simplicity in the forms of worship, which leaves ample room for the constant insistence and re-insistence upon the few fixed ideas of the system, he sees that an appeal of great strength and persuasiveness is made to many people in our generation.

Christian Science stands upon two feet. One is the entirely unscientific and irrational metaphysical theory of the non-existence of evil. The entire New Testament is a collection of texts on this theme. No stronger refutation of the underlying fallacy of Christian Science could be found than the arsenal of references to sin, disease, suffering and death in the teachings of Christ and the Apostles. Everywhere Jesus took for granted the reality of the evil he was opposing. Men were really, not merely in imagination, sick and afflicted. In upholding this view of unreality in evil, Christian Science subjects the Bible to the most fantastic and grotesque system of interpretation ever known outside the bounds of apocalyptic vagaries. The simplest historical facts are "spiritualized" with an ingenuity that would have done credit to the allegorical schools of the middle ages. An example of this may be seen in the interpretation of the two acounts of creation as "natural" and "spiritual" respectively. By such a method, which seeks rather to discover what biblical texts can be made to teach, rather than what the Bible really says, it is possible to vindicate any view whatever. The examples of this vicious use of the Scripture are to be seen in almost every section of Mrs. Eddy's writings, and form the staple quotation of Christian Science liturgies, lectures and literature.

The other foot of the system is the perfectly biblical and scientific truth that evil, sin, disease and death are the enemies against which Christ came to wage warfare, and over which in the end he is to triumph. Christian Science has laid hold of the fact, too long neglected by the church, that Jesus cared for the bodies of men as well as their souls. The Church, in its long insistence on the other-worldliness of religion, forgot that the struggle of our faith must be in behalf of the whole man, body as well as soul, and against the foes that war with every part of his being.

The principle which Christian Science employs, in contrast with its unfounded theory, is the simple one of suggestion. This is the basis of every form of mental therapeutics practiced today. Christian Science differs in no manner from the other forms of healing which proceed upon this view. Among them are faith-cure, divine-healing, prayer-cure, suggestive-therapeutics, the Emmanuel Movement, and even spiritism, insofar as the latter undertakes the cure of disease. Every physician understands, and in a measure employs, this method. Every student of mental science knows its nature and value. It undertakes to create in the mind of the sufferer a state of confidence and hope. This may be based on any one of a dozen doctrines, each one of which serves as the basis of a particular cult. With Christian Science it is the theory already stated. "God is all; God is good; therefore evil cannot be. Sin is evil. Disease is evil; therefore they are not. Deny them. Insist that you are good and that you are well. Properly convinced, you no longer suffer."

It is a satisfaction to record the undeniable fact that Christian Science, like the other forms of healing mentioned, has wrought great good to many sufferers. People whom other forms of treatment left without hope have been quickened into new health and happiness by the practice. This result is quite independent of the theory of Christian Science, and would be the same under any other of the forms of suggestive therapeutics. Many people are only mentally sick anyway. That is, they are impressed with the belief that they are actually suffering from some malady over which medicine is powerless to work healing. In thousands of cases, even of acute physical suffering, these maladies have been shown to be purely mental and imaginary. An example of this type of affliction was mentioned last week in the Christian Century in an editorial entitled "Remember!" For such maladies some form of suggestive treatment is often effective. In others, where some lesion has actually occurred, the same treatment by mental influence is often found remedial, so intimate is the relation of mind and flesh. In all these cases it is the central principle of suggestion, whether employed in hypnotism, suggestion proper, or what is known as re-education. Christian Science is merely one of the forms of healing which make use, some of them unconsciously, of this fact.



It is highly probable that the cures that have been wrought by holy men, holy relics and holy places, have been of this nature. It is not the impartation of power from without, but the awakening of power and courage within. Yet there is even here an impartation. The holy man gives to the sufferer something of his own quiet confidence and in this bestowment has to all appearances, wrought the cure. How far our Saviour employed this principle we have no means of knowing. As far as we can trace his healings in parallel lines with those of men in whose lives such phenomena seem to have occurred, the agreement is striking. Nor is there any reason why Jesus, who lived so truly a perfect life, in harmony with all law and all nature, should have declined to employ a principle seen to be of such wide application. But almost immediately he moves out into wider ranges of wonder-working power where no man has followed him, and the uniqueness of his life as the one perfect and master-life of history becomes at once evident.

To sum up then, Christian Science has enabled many of its believers to attain a calmness, healthfulness and happiness which they had not found before. It has proved what needs always to be kept in mind by the church, the fact that Christianity has a healing power for the bodies as well as the souls of men. In addition, Christian Science has made to the Church the useful contribution of architectural taste of a special sort, and perhaps also some useful suggestions regarding certain forms of worship.

On the other hand it needs to be remembered that it shares its one element of value as a system of healing, with all the other methods of psychic therapeutics, and seems to have no advantage over them. Further, that its theology, in so far as it may claim one, is a sorry thing, the product of an untenable metaphysic and a wholly impossible biblical interpretation when it is added that as a cult it tends to an unsocial indifference to the needs and sufferings of humanity that has never been equalled in the long centuries of Christian history, perhaps an idea has been given of its strength and weakness. Social workers declare with one voice that from Christian Scientists as a class they receive absolutely no aid or encouragement in the very work of relief which the Gospel of Christ inspires.

A list of books on this subject was given in this column in the Christian Century of December 26th.

A loving hand I never forget. I remember in my fingers the large hands of Bishop Brooks, brimful of tenderness and a strong man's joy. If you were deaf and blind and could have held Mr. Jefferson's hand, you would have seen in it a face and heard a kind voice unlike any other you have known. Mark Twain's hand is full of whimsies and the drollest humors, and while you hold it the drollery changes to sympathy and championship.—Helen Keller, in "The World I Live In."

Home and the Children

The Shadow Child

BY HARRIET MONROE IN THE DECEMBER CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Why do the wheels go whirring round.
Mother, mother?
Oh, mother, are they giants bound,
And will they growl forever?
Yes, fiery giants underground,
Daughter, little daughter,
Forever turn the wheels around,
And rumble, grumble ever.

Why do I pick the threads all day,
Mother, mother,
While sunshine children are at play?
And must I work forever?
Yes, shadow-child; the live-long day,
Daughter, little daughter,
Your hands must pick the threads away,
And feel the sunshine never.

Why do the birds sing in the sun,
Mother, mother,
If all day long I run and run—
Run with the wheels forever?
The birds may sing till day is done,
Daughter, little daughter,
But with the wheels your feet must run—
Run with the wheels forever.

Why do I feel so tired each night,
Mother, mother,
The wheels are always buzzing bright;
Do they grow sleepy never?
Oh, baby thing, so soft and white,
Daughter, little daughter,
The big wheels grind us in their might,
And they will grind forever.

And is the white thread never spun,
Mother, mother,
And is the white thread never done—
For you and me done never?
Oh, yes, our thread will all be spun,
Daughter, little daughter,
When we lie down out in the sun,
And work no more forever.

And when will come that happy day,
Mother, mother,
Oh, shall we laugh and sing and play
Out in the sun forever?
Nay, shadow-child, we'll rest all day,
Daughter, little daughter,
Where green grass grows and roses gay,
There is the sun forever.

A RECIPE FOR COOKING HUSBANDS SO AS TO MAKE THEM TENDER AND GOOD.

The following recipe was printed in an interesting cook book gotten up by the ladies of the New Orleans Church:

"A good many husbands are spoiled by mismanagement. Some women go about as if their husbands were bladders, and blow them up. Others keep them constantly in hot water; others let them freeze by their carelessness and indifference. Some keep them in a stew by irritating ways and words; others roast them. Some keep them in a pickle all their lives. It cannot be supposed that any husband will be tender and good managed in this way, but they are really delicious when properly treated. In selecting your husband you should not be guided by the silvery appearance, as in buying mackerel, nor by the golden tint as if you wanted salmon. Be sure to select for yourself, as tastes differ. Do not go to market for him, as the best is always brought to your door. It is far better to have none unless you will particularly learn how to cook for him. A preserving kettle of the finest porcelain is best, but, if you have nothing but an earthenware nappy, it will do with care. See that the linen in which you wrap him is nicely washed and mended, with the required number of buttons and strings nicely sewed on. Tie him in the kettle by a strong silk cord called "comfort," as the one called "duty" is apt to be weak. They are apt to fly out of the kettle and be burned and crusty on the edges, since, like crabs and lobsters, you have to cook them alive. Make a steady fire out of love, neatness and cheerfulness. Keep him as near this as seems to agree with him. If he sputters and fizzes, do not be anxious; some husbands do this until they are quite done. Add a little sugar in the form of what confectioners call kisses, but no pepper or vinegar on any account. A little spice improves them, but it must be used with judgment. Do not stick any sharp instruments into him to see if he is becoming tender. Stir him gently, watch the while lest he lie too flat and close to the kettle, and so become useless. You cannot fail of knowing when he is done. If thus treated, you will find him very digestible, agreeing nicely with you and the children, and he will keep as long as you want, unless you become careless and set him in too cool a place."

POOR UNCLE ED

A Baltimore man was recently showing his nice new opera hat to his little nephew, and when he caused the top-piece to spring open three of four times the youngster was delighted.

A few days thereafter the uncle, during a visit to the same household, brought with him a silk hat of the shiny, non-collapsible kind. When he was about to leave the house, he encountered the aforesaid youngster running down the hall with what looked like a black accordion.

"Uncle Ed," observed the boy, "this one goes awfully hard. I had to sit on it, but even then I couldn't get it more than half shut."—January Lippincott's.

"Will father be an angel?" asked the little boy. "He's got whiskers, and angels don't have any."

"Well," replied the grandmother, "your father may get there, but it will be by a close shave."—Atlanta Constitution.

OUTSIDE THE WINDOW.

By Mabel Osgood Wright.

In Good Housekeeping Magazine.

(Concluded from last week.)

"The chickadee tells you his name," says Beatrix, who is looking over your shoulder, "but those white tail feathers spell the name junco just as plainly when you once know it. He is another of the sparrow family, who, being a seed eater, can live wherever seeds are found, and defy the weather. Though his summer nesting home is north from the Northern states or in high mountains down to Virginia, he is very fashionable and travels in winter quite through the south to the gulf."

"But suppose there aren't any seeds; suppose they are all buried in the snow, what will the juncoes do?" asks Marjorie earnestly.

"Move on, unless some kind people scatter crumbs or grain sweepings to help them out," says Miss Beatrix.

"Then it is only birds that eat seeds that can stay all winter?" says Brother. "Are there seeds in the cracks of tree bark where that red-headed bird is pecking?"

"No, twice no!" laughed Miss Beatrix, turning Brother about so that he faced her. "Though the birds that depend upon lively, crawling, creeping and flying bugs and insects cannot stay after frost has cleared the air of them, there are other birds like the chickadee and downy woodpecker who can find eggs and larvae enough hidden away for the winter sleep to feed upon, and it is for these that they search the bark so steadily. Of course, when ice coats everything, these birds are hard-pressed, and they have to make shift with the few berries or frozen fruits they can find. Oh, they are brave little things, these winter birds, and they make me ashamed when I go growling to school of cold mornings with a thick jacket and cap, and a good hot breakfast under the jacket."

Then you begin to wake from a sort of dream, and putting the glasses in the case, realize that your feet are growing numb, but the spell of outdoors is upon you and you dread to shake it off. You tell Miss Beatrix how the finding of these living creatures in a winter world that you thought lifeless and uninteresting bewilders you, for she is one to whom to confide in seems well nigh a necessity.

"I know exactly how you feel," she said, holding out her hand with a spontaneous gesture as of welcome. "I had lived on a village edge all my life, and of course I knew that birds wore feathers, and flew, and built nests, and sang, and then generally disappeared before cold weather; that is, all except crows and hawks, for every country woman who has kept chickens knows them. One day, near the close of my senior year, a naturalist came to the college and gave us a lecture, or, rather, an intimate family talk, about birds; what they stood for in the plan of creation, their great use

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

The Correspondent: "After friends who have reached mature years have had a serious falling out is there much hope that they will ever become friends again? Is it not true that enmity made in church troubles is usually permanent?"

I must answer by impressions rather than by statistics. Christ must have grievously erred if it is next to impossible to forgive. Love is the heart of his gospel; and a large part of love's work is to forgive. "Love your enemies," does not impose the impossible or the impracticable. We have small hope of the Father's favor unless we forgive. "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," is our constant prayer. All that is necessary is for church folk to take the commandments of Jesus that have to do directly with life as seriously as it does the doctrinal injunctions. It is easy to refuse to forgive even while we are contending for doctrinal purity. We need seriousness and earnestness in seeking to incorporate the Christ spirit in our lives. To contend earnestly for the love once lived should be the effort of all who contend for the faith once delivered. Pride is the enemy of forgiveness. Regarding simply self is grossly unchristian. It is manly and courageous and Christian to forgive and to make advances for the forgiveness of those estranged. Again, time is a wonderful agent to heal wounded feelings. God seems to fill the passing months and years with their days of new experiences of joy and sorrow, and the nights of restful sleep full of the balm of healing. And so hearts made sorrow and cold by separation come to beat in unison again. Once Browning wrote of a masterful contemporary who had left, as Browning thought, the party that stood for the people's good:

"Let him never come back to us;
There would be doubt, hesitation and pain,
Forced praise on our part—the glimmer of twilight,
Never glare confident morning again!"

It may be so with regard to change of parties, especially where the change should mean personal gain, as Browning claimed it did in this case. But even here, Browning accords him Heaven's forgiveness. He concludes:

"Best fight on well, for we taught him strike gallantly,
Menace our heart ere we master his own;
Then let him receive the new knowledge and wait us,
Pardoned in heaven, the first by the throne."

That last line, especially, is worthy of Browning. Our quarrels with averagely good people do not do us justice. They represent the littleness and meanness of our natures. If we pet ourselves and dwell long upon our supposed injuries we shall do both ourselves and those concerning whom we have grieved feelings great injustice. Our better and truer selves should express themselves in forgiveness. Quarrels are three-fourths misunderstandings, and one-fourth the heated uprising of our baser natures. Church differences are usually longer in healing than others. One would think they would be quicker healed, because the law of love is expected to control. They are longer because they are less open. Church people are deceived by thinking often that they are contending for a principle, when really pride is subtly at its damaging and destroying work. But even church estrangements are healed, and often quickly. And when the estranged friends come together again they are frequently better friends than ever. They understand the weaknesses of each other and are determined to have no repetition of the rupture. If there has been division the leaders of the church owe it to themselves, to the church, to the community, to the Lord whom they serve, to the kingdom of love that they should practice forgiveness and thus bring to the church the peculiar and the heartening joy of the restored unity of genuine brotherliness.

If any wish to read a strong portrayal of the development and the disastrous outcome of unforgiving pride he can find it in "The House with the Green Shutters." It is one of the strongest recent sketches of the strife and jealousy of a little Scottish village.

Is the Preacher's Life Tame?

The Correspondent: "A preacher's life is terribly monotonous. I wonder all of us preachers do not die of ennui or melancholy. There is no part of our calling that lends excitement—no tragedy and no comedy—all our rounds are as colorless as a black prince albert. What can we do to keep ourselves from the depression of the awful sameness of our days?"

Is a fireman's life less monotonous than a preacher's? Is the tragedy and comedy continually thrilling through the soul and pen of a bookkeeper? Is the calling of the dignified undertaker a life of great variety? Does the grocer thrill with joy as he ties up his hundredth package of sugar in a single day? Does the physician enjoy the call that breaks the monotony of his slumber at night?

The fact is the preacher is the one man who has all the excitement of the world. He has more time to read than his brothers of the other vocations. All the stirrings and throbbings of the past are his. His quiet looking library is a tremendous battle-field. Theology is the most exciting of the sciences. It deals with all the movements of the soul. An earthquake is not as exciting as these tumultuous movements of the soul. John Smith may be a very staid deacon, but John Smith has his romances, his dreams, his passions, his successes and his failures. The preacher deals with a hundred John Smiths, and all are surprisingly different. A pastoral call is a voyage of discovery. It suggests shipwreck, unknown lands and all the fascination of a voyage into unexplored regions. There is no real excitement and variety save in souls. With these the preacher has constantly to do. If all souls were the same our calling still would be one of interest intense; but as every soul is markedly different ours is the hilarious profession. Nor are we simply onlookers. We do not merely applaud the game; we are in the thick of the fight. We are warring with hearts. The din of Armaggedon is in our ears. The word of truth is the weapon we hurl at the foe. Is it not exciting to watch it do its deadly work? We are actors on the world's stage, playing the drama of the ages. The totality of good in the whole universe and the totality of bad are in deadly conflict. We war with the good; and we fight to win. No! No! we may die of over-excitement; but never of ennui or monotony.

Courtesy in Church Members.

The Correspondent: Do you think church members have good manners?

The church preaches love. Without love it is impossible to please God or man. Love among church members of the same local family ought to manifest itself in Christian thoughtfulness and courtesy. The really thoughtful courteous Christian will not constantly be guilty of small offenses. He will try to accommodate himself to the common good. Sin is but selfishness. He will regard the things of another as well as those of himself. He will put himself out in order to serve. In order to be loyal to this Christian principle of courtesy he must avoid some habits which he is liable to lightly regard.

He must avoid habitual tardiness. He is only giving two periods of an hour and a half each, a week, to public worship. It is a grievous fault to cut continually twenty or thirty minutes from this brief time. Constant tardiness is unfair to the church. Let us dignify the church by promptness as the scholars dignify the public schools.

He must avoid the selfishness of the back seats. Let him walk bravely and enthusiastically up to the front. His coming forward would be a noble confession of his interest. His loyal and interested manner will help to put heart in the service.

He must avoid inexcusable absence. Only sickness or death makes absence excusable. Visitors, late sleeping and indisposition are all such trivial excuses, and an insult to God and ourselves. They demoralize life. Let us have a conscience as to our church attendance.

He must avoid indifference as to the labors of others. In each church there are some who are giving their very lives to make it a success. The only pay they get is the joy of service and suffering. If courteous we will not be unthoughtful of them. We will give them a word of praise. We will do more, we will give them a hand and heart to help. Teach the children to write to the superintendent if compelled to be absent. Write to the pastor once in a while. Both will do better work. Be courteous one to another. "Please" and "thank-you" should have a big place. The Rev. R. J. Campbell once received this letter from a little member of his flock:

"Dear Mr. Campbell: I did not come to church this morning because it was blowey. So I stayed in and played with Nore's ark. Was poor Satan drowned? Perhaps he went into the ark with Mr. and Mrs. Nore. Isn't it a pittey that he does not try to be better?"

If the theological perplexities of such letters would not disturb too much, every minister would be made a better pastor and preacher by the reception of them. The pastor is efficient as he comes in very close personal relations with his people.

The fact that any one takes the pains to write the pastor a letter helps much. Life is made up of little things. Do not let us lose ourselves in the abstract so much that we cannot resolve to give attention to the little deeds and words necessary to brighten the hum-drum of our church life. Be on time. Take a forward seat. Be regular. Be happy, active, encouraging. Always behave well.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Questions for Prof. McGarvey

Readers of this department of The Century will remember that a few weeks ago I asked Prof. J. W. McGarvey two questions, which I hoped he would answer with all the frankness which is characteristic of him. He notices a part of the article referring to him, but fails to see the two questions. I put them in italics so that they would stand out more clearly, but evidently he did not have on his glasses when he read the article or else he had a poor light.

I will put the questions to him again, and this time in a little clearer type. It will be remembered that he said in defense of the "Lexington Creed:"

> "Everybody in Lexington, so far as I know, believes the assertion of Jesus that the books called the Pentateuch are the writings of Moses; but not one, so far as I know, is so silly as to believe that Moses wrote the last chapter of Deuteronomy, describing his own death and burial."

This last sentence from Prof. McGarvey is what puzzles some of us here in Chicago—"silly to believe that Moses wrote, etc."! And yet "the last chapter of Deuteronomy" is a part of the Pentateuch. Why "silly" to believe that Moses wrote that? Is it because it describes events future to Moses—"his own death and burial"? Why should that be a difficult thing to one who was inspired of God? Can not God look into the future? and could he not tell Moses all about "his own death and burial"? According to Prof. McGarvey, Moses looked back 2,500 years and described the creation of the world; why "so silly" to believe that he looked forward one year and described his own death and burial"?

If "the assertion of Jesus" settles the question of the authorship of the Pentateuch for Prof. McGarvey, the assertion of Jesus concerning the motion of the heavenly bodies ought to settle the question also. I was taught in my early school days, and I have been inclined to believe, that the sun stands still, and that the earth moves. But the assertion of Jesus is that God "makes his sun to rise on the evil and the good" (Matt. 5:45). If the one who disbelieves the assertion of Jesus that Moses wrote the Pentateuch is an infidel, as Prof. McGarvey teaches, then the one who disbelieves the assertion of Jesus that the sun rises must also be an infidel. That is just the accusation that was made by the Roman Church and the Protestant Reformers alike, against Copernicus and all others who taught, contrary to the assertion of Jesus, that the sun stood still.

None of us here in Chicago wants to be an infidel or be known as an infidel; yet I see that some of us are in danger of being called infidels by Prof. McGarvey if we accept the astronomical doctrines taught in all of the schools. I wonder how Prof. McGarvey treats this assertion of Jesus about the motion of the sun.

The Questions.

1. Do you believe that the sun rises and sets according to the Ptolmaic system of astronomy or that it stands still according to the Copernican system?

2. On what grounds do you affirm that it is silly to believe that Moses wrote the account of his own death and burial?

Lexington will confer a great favor upon Chicago by answering these questions. They involve all our differences.

Jonah and McGarvey vs. Jesus.

In making his reply to other parts of my article Prof. McGarvey calls the "Lexington Creed" which I formulated "a cob house," which he "kicked over, more in fun than in malice," and says:

"In scrambling for his cobs, to get them in place again, Bro. Gates gets funny, and charges me with contradicting Jesus. Jesus, he says, said it was a whale that swallowed Jonah, while I say it was a big fish." Here is what Prof. McGarvey said: "If Gates had put it 'the great fish,' instead of 'the whale,' this article would have been correct." Now he justifies that slight upon my biblical scholarship by saying:

> "I had supposed that every editor of a religious paper in Chicago had learned long ago that the word 'whale' in the remark of Jesus about Jonah is a mistranslation. If not sooner, he ought to have learned it from the Revised Version."

I used the King James Version until Prof. McGarvey told all who would be exact and careful scholars to use the Revised Version. I used the Revised Version until he told all of us learned scholars to use the Standard American Version. I use that now, but all of these three versions have exactly the same reading—"for as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of the whale" (Matt. 12:39). What does Prof. McGarvey mean by saying there is a "mistranslation"? There has been no change in the reading in any of these new versions. I know, of course, that in the Book of Jonah, the word means and is translated "great fish." But Jesus said it was a "whale." We now have Jonah and McGarvey against Jesus. I prefer to follow Jesus rather than either McGarvey or Jonah. Which does the professor believe correct—Jonah or Jesus?

Prof. McGarvey will have to try again to get out of his difficulty. I confess that the point is not a profoundly important one—"whale" or "great fish"—but it was not I who raised it. It seemed important enough to Lexington to make an issue out of, and it was too good for Chicago to let alone. It is Lexington and not Chicago ground we are on. Fine points and sharp turns, however, are peculiarly Lexingtonian; and this Jonah difficulty is just a sample of the way mole-hills are turned into mountains, and mint, anise and cummin are tithed in the theology of Lexington. Where you have a theory of verbal inspiration you are likely to have a practice of verbal scrupulosity. We ordinary human erring mortals in things theological do get a great deal of comfort when great Homer nods. When Lexington slips up on fine, correct biblical usage, there is a gleam of hope, and there ought to be a degree of tolerance, for the rest of us poor mortals.

Lexington Never Changes.

But Lexington never seems to learn the lesson of tolerance and liberty, and sweet human charity, even from her own mistakes and lapses. Like Rome, she never changes, and never goes wrong. Her laws of orthodoxy are inexorable, like the laws of the Medes and Persians. Deviation from the straight and narrow path that leads to belief that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, and that the whale (Lexington forgive! Better "great fish") swallowed Jonah, is visited with awful anathemas. The torches with which she burns the tender reputations of good men are composed of such exquisite terms as "infidel." "destructive critic," "poisonous teaching," "German rationalism." But Lexington reasons: Did not Jesus use such terms as "false prophets," "hypocrites," "whited sepulchers," "serpents," and "offspring of vipers," against false teachers; and did not Paul warn against men who teach a different doctrine? Why may we not use these terms, or similar terms that are understood, against false teachers.

If Lexington could be as sure as Jesus and Paul that teaching was false, and that ideas were infidel and poisonous, then she might exercise their judicial prerogative. But it is only on the basis of an authority and infallibility which belongs only to inspired men that Lexington can proceed against false teachers. Suppose Lexington should make a mistake (and that is possible) and anathematize a man who was innocent of the religious crime of infidelity; what could she do to make amends for the wrong? Could she ever give back the reputation destroyed, or cancel the pain that it has caused? Are there any courts in which one who has thus been wronged can secure justice?

Theological Libel.

The Outlook of New York, has been saying some timely things with reference to a man's right and property in a good name. "It is high time for the American people to recognize that 'Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor' is a part of the moral law; that reputation is a valued possession which it is the duty of the community to protect; that they do not sufficiently protect it if they simply leave a man who has been robbed of his reputation to bring a suit for damages; that to rob a man of his reputation is a crime against the community as well as against the individual, and it is the duty of the community to punish it."

Theological libel is just as damaging and as criminal as civil libel. To call a man an infidel in the religious sphere is the same as to call him a thief or a murderer in the social sphere. It hurts him as much in the one as in the other. It puts many a man out of business in both. But in the social sphere a man can seek redress at law, and be judged innocent or guilty by one law. But in the religious sphere there is no redress, and a man is judged innocent or guilty by as many laws as there are opinions as to what constitutes infidelity. At Lexington a man is an infidel if he denies that Moses wrote the Pentateuch; a partial infidel if he denies that the whale swallowed Jonah.

In most circles among the Disciples a man is amenable to one law of faith—faith in Jesus Christ, the Son of God. If he believes this, and lives as if he believed it, he is a Christian. While the only thing that constitutes infidelity is denial of this in word and life.

The voice of God is always calling us to higher things.

The Christ-controlled life yields the largest measure of usefulness and happiness; because it is the gentle life.

The greatness of gentleness is of finer quality and far more pleasing and enduring than that wrought out by force.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

The Messiah Vindicated*

It will be remarked as one of the most valuable improvements in the arrangement of the International lessons that the passage of Scripture to be studied covers much more territory than hitherto. This will remove something of the objection hitherto so strongly urged, that the lessons are too brief and scrappy, and that they leave such unconsidered intervals between. The lesson texts will, in the future, extend much further than the printed text, which will embrace about the same amount of biblical matter as before.

Brevity of the Record.

The two studies devoted to the second chapter of Acts are inclusive of the entire chapter. The first gives the setting of the Day of Pentecost and the arousal of the one hundred and twenty disciples to their holy task by the coming of the divine Spirit upon them. The second gives the main ideas of the sermon of Peter, and the results that came from its delivery. We are not to suppose that we have all the words of the apostle, for the custom of the Bible is to give a brief resume of what was said on such occasions. Then, too, we are expressly told that Peter said much more than was written down. But the things recorded were sufficient to give an adequate idea of the whole as it was recalled by those who heard it.

The Words of Joel.

First, the astonishing events of the morning were interpreted. The strange things which the multitude had heard, which some thought were the utterance of foreign languages on the part of the disciples, and others supposed were the cries of drunken men, were, he said, in reality the climax of an ancient prophecy. Joel, whose work fell some time in the latest period of the Old Testament history had spoken of the time to come when great disturbances of nature would take place, as the signs of the fact that God was about to pour out his spirit upon the chosen people. These words Peter declared had now been fulfilled in the signs of Pentecost. It is clear that neither Peter nor his hearers thought of the convulsions of nature spoken of by the prophet as more than figures of speech, for none such had occurred, and the people did not demand to know what he meant. Both he and they understood the language of the prophet in the usual manner of apocalyptic speech. But both realized that strange changes had come upon the community at that feast, and that these events of the day might well be called the fulfilment of Joel's words.

The Miracles of Jesus.

After this preface, which not only secured their attention but convinced them that the matter in hand was far more important than any other event of the feast, Peter proceeded to drive home the great facts of the Savior's life and death. First there was the fact that the Nazarene had wrought miracles among them, with which they were quite familiar. This use of the miracles of Jesus by Peter at a time soon after the actual work of the Lord is one of the surest proofs that the Master did perform these deeds of power. Otherwise there would have been neither point nor safety in a reference which could so easily have been refuted by his hearers.

The Murder of the Messiah.

The second item of the sermon was the charge that they, the people of Jerusalem and the nation at large, had taken this good man, this worker of kindly ministries, and had delivered him up to death. Nor was this a mere act of mob violence. It was consistent with the long history of unfaithfulness characteristic of the nation, and was a part of God's plan for the correction of the people and the saving of the world. In following out their own mad passions they were bringing upon themselves the judgment of God, were making their national sins odious beyond description, and were fulfilling the very plan which they had seemed most bent upon thwarting.

The Sixteenth Psalm.

This was shown by the return from the dead of the very One whom they had so sorely mistreated. And here the third point in the discourse was reached. The resurrection of Jesus was the prime fact of the Gospel which Peter was announcing. This he first set in the light of Old Testament words. A psalmist of the past had spoken of his confidence that God would not give him over to the power of the grave, but would continue him in the high fellowship of divine favor. Since David was known among the Hebrews as the Psalmist par excellence, the father of sacred hymnody, all the psalms were attributed to him without reserve by the Jews of Jesus' day. Moreover, this Sixteenth Psalm was counted Messianic by them, a forecast of the triumph of their future king over all opposition. Peter takes it at its highest value as rated by them, and applies it directly to Christ. The questions of its origin and first meaning were secondary to its value in the estimation of his hearers—a Davidic and a Messianic psalm. It was therefore the very vehicle to use most effectively in conveying to this Jewish audience the fact of Jesus' resurrection.

The Higher Use of the Psalm.

In this use of the psalm may be seen an instance of that free use of the Old Testament by the interpreters of the Gospel which has caused no little perplexity to Bible students, and yet is not difficult to understand in the face of all the facts. The study of Psalm Sixteen reveals clearly the fact that the composer was thinking of himself and not another; that he was not speaking of deliverance out of the grave but of salvation from it, i. e., of prolonged life. This is the manifest meaning of the words, "Thou wilt not give over my soul to Sheol, neither wilt thou permit thy devoted one (the Psalmist himself) to see decay." But the New Testament writers and preachers saw that in the light of Jesus' experience and the wide meanings of the new faith, the original use of the words did not exhaust their value, and they felt free to use them as admirable statements of truths far greater than their authors conceived. This principle explains the meaning of many passages in the New Testament which seem to find in the older Scriptures values which are not apparent to the student who examines them.

Jesus the Goal of the Old Testament.

Peter says that David, whom he accepts as the author of these words, did actually come to the grave as they know. Did his words, then fail of meaning? No. They had a larger significance than his own life. Only in the Messiah did they find fulfillment. David had recognized that One greater than himself should come, who was not to share the ordinary experience of subjection to death, but was to escape the snares of the grave through the divine power. This One was no other than the promised son of his line, through whom the glories of Israel were to be perpetuated and brought to their climax. In the light of the resurrection, of which he and his fellow disciples were the witnesses, he and they were prepared to insist that the Promised One of the psalmists and the Christ of Nazareth were one and the same. The writer of the Hundred and Tenth Psalm (David once more, in the thought of both Peter and his audience) had spoken of one higher than himself, to whom God gave the high place at His own right hand. This was the same Christ. Let the house of Israel know then that in the recently crucified but now risen Jesus the promises of the past and the hopes of the future were accomplished.

Fact vs. Illustration.

Peter did not quote from the Old Testament to prove the resurrection of Jesus. There was but one proof of that fact, and that was the testimony of himself and his companion disciples, who had seen the Master alive from the dead. But his purpose in referring to the psalms was to show that upon their own construction and interpretation of these Scriptures, which he fully shared, the resurrection was not only possible but an expected fact in the experience of David's great Successor. The Bible student must keep in mind the fact that the writers of the Scriptures employ every method of illustrating the great truths which lie heavy on their hearts. The truth itself, the fact of which they are speaking, is the matter of supreme importance. The illustration is of secondary value, but chosen because of its power to direct attention to the theme in hand. The illustration may be a fact of history, a bit of song from the past, a miracle, a parable or a fable. Whatever has the power to fix attention upon the fact or truth in hand is worth while. The illustration may be of but partial value in itself, it might even have no foundation in fact. Its invalidation, were such possible, would in no way affect the truth which is the matter of moment.

*International Sunday-school lesson for January 17. The Beginning of the Christian Church, Acts 2:22-47. Golden Text, "They continued steadfastly in the apostles' teaching and in fellowship, and in the breaking of bread and in prayers," Acts 2:42. Memory verses, 32, 33.

The Fact of the Resurrection.

So of this incident of our study. It was the resurrection of Jesus which Peter wished to burn into the consciences of his hearers. That tremendous fact, proved by the witness of the disciples and needed to complete the hopes of the Old Testament; was the vindication of the Messianic claim of Jesus, and the evidence that in his death the nation had committed the greatest crime in history. The indictment was crushing. The charge was unanswerable. The Day of Judgment was at hand to bring the retribution which such sinners richly deserved.

The Results of the Sermon.

In terror they looked at each other and then cried out, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" It was not the question of seekers after spiritual blessing. It was rather the cry of men who are suddenly confronted with the awful proofs of guilt, and know not which way to turn. The wrath of God was upon them. What should they do? With masterful use of the moment and the fear of the people, Peter said to them, "What you really need to do is not merely to escape the anger of God, but to take up the holy life which this Nazarene, your Messiah and Savior, enjoins. Repent of your sins. Accept the badge of discipleship in the company of his followers. The memory and the guilt of those sins of the past will fade in the new passion of love and service. You shall be free from the power and the penalty of your sin. You shall have the spirit of love, of brotherhood, of purity and of prayer. You shall have the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit of promise."

With such words, and many more not recorded, he turned their minds from the mere emergency of present peril to the higher duty and joy of Christian life, and their happy response in baptism made that day memorable in the annals of the faith.

THE PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

Topic January 13: The Church and Men. John 1:35-51; Acts 4:4.

It is too late in the day to say that men are less religious than women. We must reason from accidents and get down to the abiding qualities of character. Men are just as much interested in the meaning of life as women. They are not inferior to their wives and sisters in the love of righteousness. They have temptations and sins peculiar to themselves, and so have the women. In some countries women go to church in larger numbers than men. This shows that the prevailing type of church life in these countries is feminine rather than masculine; it does not prove that Christianity makes a stronger appeal to women than to men. The masculine and the feminine element are both needed in the church. It is a waste of breath to tell men that they ought to join a church whose preaching and activities are suited to the mind and hand of woman. They intend to be men and if they cannot be men in the church, they will stay out in the world.

Men Need the Church.

The energy of the American man is the admiration of the world. He cannot be idle and he works with a purpose. In this his strength is also his weakness. He is so busy with the one thing that comes to his hand to do that he has no time to look over the whole field of life and learn the relative values of things. Hence it happens that many men, whose ability to make money is conspicuous, are exceedingly bad citizens. They pay their taxes grudgingly. They look upon city councils and legislatures as legitimate commodities for the ownership of which money should be spent with lavish hand. They take thought for the common welfare only when their selfish schemes are not in danger. Having no insight for spiritual realities, some of them seek satisfaction in the indulgence of the basest passions. The suicides that follow business reverses and the madness with which speculation is carried on are evidence that business men need faith, a faith that gives serenity and a sense of the worth of friendship and love. The business world needs men who will sacrifice financial success in the interest of humanity. The spirit of Paul, who gave his testimony at the cost of his life, is as much needed in commercial and industrial circles as it is on the mission field.

The Church Needs Men.

The church has work for men. It has a place for men in its ministry. It has been said that ministers help to continue the divisions among Christians by insisting on the importance of scholastic distinctions that have nothing to do with life and godliness. If there is any ground whatever for this assertion, the church has reason to pray for men in the ministry who know where to put the emphasis. Real men are needed for elders and deacons and for Sunday-school leaders. The boys are lost to the Sunday-school because the men are not studying their Bibles. Men who are face to face with the problems of the age are capable of testing the doctrines preached in the church. Down in the mountains of the South where men have little to do the doctrines of free will and predestination are discussed with a fervor that would do credit to the demons in Milton's hell, but no great spiritual revolution has been started by these discussions. Dr. Grenfell met Mr. Moody in a hotel in Boston and said to him, "Fourteen years ago I put my faith in Christ after hearing you preach." "Oh," said Mr. Moody, looking Grenfell over, "and what have you been doing since." Dr. Grenfell is one of the great men of the modern church because he believes he is in the church to do and not to debate. Men still have in them the heroic element and the church should appeal more and more to that element and use it.

Men to Win Men.

Andrew brought Peter to Jesus. Philip brought Nathanael. And thus the company of the disciples grew. These was no effusive or affected emotion. The personal workers were serious. They spoke straight to the hearts of the men they sought. The men in the churches today can manifest an equal sincerity. No doubt many of them are deterred from soliciting the obedience of their friends to Christ by their distaste for the pietistic methods with which they have themselves been tormented. They do not know that there is a way for one who has a proper regard for the rights of free men to speak earnestly to another about Christ. The New Testament has examples of the right method of approach. It illustrates how men who are not fanatics, may exert their influence for the building up of the kingdom of God. If the men of the church will talk in their own way, without aping the zealot, about the power of the gospel and the activities of the church, multitudes will confess the name of the Master.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

I. ENROLLMENT. It has been well said that the price of a graded Sunday-school, like that of liberty, is eternal vigilance. Once the school has been placed on a graded basis, all scholars, without exception, must be made to conform to its classifications. No plea of personal affection between the teacher and scholars under the old system, should be permitted to interfere with the assignment of every pupil to the proper class. It is better that a few scholars should drop out than that the grading should be perfunctory and incomplete. The same is true of every NEW SCHOLAR. None should be taken into the school without first being assigned to the proper department and class regardless of individual preference. The neglect of this rule will soon reduce the best graded school to the chaos from which it sprang.

II. PROMOTION. Some system of promotion is essential to a properly graded school. The Sunday-school being a purely voluntary institution, there cannot be the same stringency here as in the day school, but much can be done by a wise system of promotion, to encourage the scholars to do their best work. Promotion should be of two kinds—ordinary and certificated:

(1.) ORDINARY PROMOTION applies to all scholars alike, and is determined by age alone. This should be the only kind of promotion recognized in the beginners' department.

(2.) CERTIFICATED PROMOTION depends on the fulfillment of certain definite requirements. Written examinations should be held at the close of each school year, and certificates of promotion awarded to all scholars who reach a certain percentage. These entitle them to pass into the next higher class. On passing from one department to another, special DEPARTMENTAL CERTIFICATES should be given. Upon completion of the regular course of the school, a diploma of graduation may be granted. Graduation or Promotion day, should be one of the most prominent in the school calendar, and the exercises should be such as to impress upon the pupils the real honor of promotion.

III. CLASS MARKING. In order to maintain a high standard of work, some system of class marking, other than that of mere attendance is advisable. Nothing stimulates the interest of the scholars more than the knowledge that an accurate record is kept of their standing. The things taken into account should be attendance, punctuality, offering, bringing of quarterly and Bible, lesson study, church attendance. The values assigned to each of these will, of course, vary in the different departments. Deportment may be added in the Primary and Junior grades. The following is sugestive only: attendance 25, punctuality 10, offering 10, lesson preparation 25, bringing quarterly and Bible 10, church attendance 20; total 100.

IV. HOW TO START A GRADED SCHOOL. For the benefit of those who desire to grade their Sunday-school, the foregoing principles may be summed up in the following suggestions: Get an accurate record of the ages, or public school standing, of all the scholars, and separate them into Elementary, Primary, Junior, Intermediate, Senior and Adult departments. Then divide up each department into classes, assigning to each a teacher properly equipped for the work of that particular grade. At the head of each department, put a Superintendent, and, if the department be large, a Secretary also. Where possible, let the Department meet separately for either opening or closing exercises. Where this cannot be done let its identity be preserved, by having its own reports, departmental interests, etc. Appoint a Secretary of Enrollment for the school, whose duty it shall be to see that new scholars are assigned to the proper classes. Let all records of class standing, examinations, eac., be kept as strictly as in the day school. Have regular departmental conferences, at which the teachers of the several departments may meet together and discuss their methods of work. Once every quarter, at least, have a full meeting of all the teachers and officers of the school for the purpose of mutual inspiration and advice. Order a series of graded lessons helps; but be sure they are GRADED.

QUESTIONS. (1) What is a graded Sunday-school, and why is it necessary? (2) Name the essentials of grading. (3) What should be the basis of classification? (4) Give the five great divisions into which the School should first be divided, and the ages corresponding to each. (5) What are the Home and Teacher Training departments? (6) What is meant by "graded lesson material?" (7) What is meant by "graded methods?" (8) What is meant by "graded teachers?" (9) If the School is to be kept on a graded basis, what principles of enrollment must be observed? And explain why. (10) What is the value of promotion? (11) What two kinds of promotion are there, and explain each? (12) Tell in your own words how you would establish and maintain a graded school.

to us in keeping down insects, and the most spiritual beauty of their home lives and affections. I was interested at the time, but the talk vanished into my brain cells and was forgotten, as things often do for which we have no present use.

"The first winter after I returned here to teach I was pretty blue and everything that came my way seemed to deepen the dye. One afternoon—it was precisely such a gray day as this— my head ached so that I could not do my school work, and putting it away, I pulled on my oldest coat, and jamming my hat over my eyes, I walked down the road to a clearing in the woods by the river, where, sitting on a stump, I was prepared to really enjoy a fit of crying. A soft whistle startled me, and out from the brush flew a streaked, sparrow-like bird with a pure white throat band, gave a couple of sweet notes and passed. I didn't know that it was the white-throated sparrow of the silver song, but I did know that i was beautiful, that it had spoken to me in my bitterness, and a desire to learn its name stopped my tears. Then suddenly my brain cells opened, the talk on birds filled my mind, but with an entirely new meaning, and I determined that I would learn all I could about these little winter companions and make chums with them if possible.

"I wrote to a bird-loving friend for advice as to the best way to learn. 'Begin now,' he answered, 'in winter, when the leaves are off and the birds are few; then when the spring rush begins, you will know half a dozen types that will guide to others," and he enclosed a list of a baker's dozen of birds that I should be most likely to find hereabout.

"After that, whenever I grew blue, I seized my paper and the book that came with it, and went out; and as my list of bird friends lengthened the depth of the blue dye that tinged my sight diminished. Now, Mrs. Hale, if you'll ask me up to the house for a cup of tea, I'll write out a list for you and the children, for I'm soon going to have a bird club for my kindergarten class, and then you will be completely drowned in questions."

Somehow the sitting room is a wholly different place from the room you left an hour before, infinitely brighter, even though the outside light is fading. The children bring forward the tea table to the hearth, while Miss Beatrix, pulling off her crimson sweater and straightening her locks that the tam-o'-shanter has tousled, sits on the little wicker stool and coaxes the fire into life.

The kettle is slow about boiling, and while you wait she asks for a pad to make the list.

"But can't we do something to help the birds when it is cold right off now, without waiting to know their names?" urges practical Marjorie. "A poor man came to the door for breakfast this very morning, and we didn't know his name; but he didn't mind a bit, only just wiped his mouth with his sleeve and asked for more coffee."

"Certainly you can," answers Miss Beatrix, "if you ask your father to put up a shelf with a little roof to it to keep off rain, on the south side of the old pine tree by the fence, and make it of old wood if possible, for birds are wary of new things. You can spread dog biscuit crumbs on it for the birds that love seeds, and nail some lumps of suet to the edge for the other birds that are meat eaters and love grubs, larvae and such like; and never leave the shelf empty! I've tried almost everything and suet seems to be more like the worms and things they find in trees than anything else. Then, what better place could mother have for learning the bird's names than by watching them when they come to feed?"

"I'm only writing down the easier birds that you are sure to see Mrs, Hale," Beatrix says, "because a dozen or so is enough for a beginning, and then I'll list the books. When you've learned all about a few birds, their spring and fall journeys, songs, nesting, change of feathers, you'll have a grip on the whole thing, and then it will be spring, and when you go out with your opera glasses, you will see so much color and hear such exquisite music that you can play you are at an opera out-of-doors."

Beatrix's fountain pen flies over the paper, and as she writes she reads the names aloud: Slate-colored junco, snow-flake, American goldfinch, white-throated sparrow, red cross-bill, purple finch, song sparrow, bluejay, chickadee, winter wren, brown creeper, downy woodpecker, white-breasted nuthatch, meadowlark, flicker, or golden-winged woodpecker.

"These names will serve merely as a clue to what you may expect to find. You must identify them yourself by reading them up in one of the books. I'm reversing the kodak legend to run 'I press the button; you do the rest.'"

ETIQUETTE OF GIFT-GIVING.

There is an etiquette governing the giving and receiving of presents, because there is always a best way to do everything. If we penetrate below the surface of the little courteous conventions we shall find that consideration for the feelings of others underlies all. Do not try to make your gift look as though it cost more than you paid for it. Aside from the paltry spirit of such giving it is a delusion and a snare, for next year your offering must seem to be as fine as the one of this season, or you may appear to have been less anxious to please your friend. The best gifts are those which put no tax upon material resources, but trifles of which the recipients may make frequent us, and so keep the giver in mind. Take the time to write a few words of loving or cordial greeting on the cards that accompany your gifts. Without evidence of individual, personal thought the offering of even the finest present appears somewhat graceless and perfunctory. A message on a card is better than a note, because more informal, and one should not seem to make much of a gift. Having your presents daintily wrapped is not less a matter of courtesy. Let their outward appearance commend them. Leave them or send them to their destination the day before Christmas—unless you can insure their reception early in the day. A tardy gift appears like an after-thought.—December Ladies' Home Journal.

SIGHT.

By George W. Thomas.

Dear Lord, if ever I
  Forget thy hallowed name,
And thine all-searching eye
  Discern my secret shame,

Restore my failing sight;
  The blinding film remove;
With floods of heavenly light
  Thy wayward child reprove.

The vision of thy charms
  Shall break my heart in twain,
Thy love, that frowning death discerns,
  And snaps the galling chain.

O Saviour, ever near,
  Our Friend and Lover Thou,
Thy gentle whisper brings good cheer,
  And smooths the troubled brow.

CHICAGO

THE OLD TESTAMENT ORDER OF THE SONS OF BELIAL IN TWO TYPICAL DEMONSTRATIONS IN CHICAGO—O. F. JORDAN WRITES OF THE FIRST WARD BALL AND THE NEW YEAR'S EVE ORGY.

On two recent occasions, the Old Testament order of the Sons of Belial, so much opposed by the prophets, has made strong demonstrations in Chicago. On these occasions, the social student has had much food for meditation presented. As this type of individual is more numerous than many of the modern prophets would want to admit, it will be worth our while to note the doings of the Sons of Belial.

"Scarlet Women and "Scarlet Men"

One demonstration occurred in connection with the famous First Ward ball some weeks ago. This ward is made up of the boarding houses that fringe the business district. The widely celebrated aldermen are the Honorable "Bath-house John" Coughlin and the Honorable "Hinky-Dink" otherwise known as Michael Kenna. This first ball is an annual event held in the Coliseum by these celebrated citizens whose generosity in the distribution of drinks is sung to every tune in the tenderloin. The Grace Episcopal Church which is adjoining the Coliseum, attempted to secure an injunction against the promoters of the ball but without success. The powers that be decreed that so respectable an affair should not be interfered with in any way. A motley, mad company it was. Made up of the lost souls of Chicago. We regret that the poetic genius of a Dante or of a Milton who must describe the lost souls in Hades, was not allowed to feed upon the material presented. The scarlet woman and the scarlet man—for why should they not have a like stigma—were present from all parts of the city. Liquor was consumed in quantities to astonish any but the most hardened. The temper of the audience is best illustrated by the press reports of the doings of his honor, "Bath-house John." He found a staff photographer of the Record Herald waiting outside the building. The presence of a newspaper man is always a danger signal to men of this type. Whatever may have been the inciting cause, the press report states that "Bath-house John" attacked the reporter and demolished his camera, supported by the sluggers that form the body-guard of the brave alderman.

A wave of horror and shame has gone over Chicago since the reports of this orgy have been published. Yet the Sons of Belial are so well connected that little if any legal trouble has arisen for them.

Chicago's Welcome to the New Year.

On a larger scale was the meeting of the Sons of Belial on New Year's Eve. It has become a city custom for the pleasure-loving part of the population to turn out on that evening. Seats in the restaurants of the loop district are sold by speculators for fifty dollars. It is estimated that every guest in the fine restaurants spent fifty dollars each, mostly on wine. The poorer devotees of pagan sensualism walked the streets, drunken men and women jostling the curiosity seekers that were also on the scene.

On this evening the forces of evangelical Christianity also had a meeting. It was a counter movement to remove the flavor of the First ward ball from the Coliseum. Great evangelists like Dr. Chapman, Biederwolf, Dixon and others were present. The meeting filled this great building, the largest in Chicago, to overflowing, and an overflow meeting was held in a neighboring church. This splendid crowd might seem to exhibit a force adequate to meet the Sons of Belial. It is discouraging, however, to see how little comes from some of these meetings of the evangelical Christians. The highly emotional leadership of the Moody Church on the north side is able to generate a tremendous voltage of enthusiasm, but is unable to convey it over the power wires to the machinery of social service. We need not less enthusiasm but more intelligent and capable leadership in the work of the kingdom. It is encouraging that fifteen thousand people should meet to oppose the Sons of Belial on New Year's Eve. It is discouraging, however, that when the noise of demonstration is over so little remains behind.

Christ's Love of Sinners.

Whence come the Sons and Daughters of Belial? They do not marry or have children. They live but a single generation. The curse of illegitimacy that has fallen on Paris is not a serious problem here. It is the sad fact that the Sons and Daughters of Belial are often the Prodigal sons and daughters of our Christian homes. We cannot dwell long on the good old parable in our churches without the tears welling to the eyes of a parent who has suffered a bereavement worse than death. Jesus was known as a friend of publicans and sinners. He would be working in Chicago much in the First ward from which His church has fled as from the plague. His splendid optimism would insist that the very Sons of Belial might become the Sons of God.

But He would have us do more than pick up social wreckage. He would have His church prevent the making of "rounders." The homes would be made more home-like, the churches more open and brotherly, and our schools more effective in character-building. Not so much with new machinery as with the vitalizing of old institutions would we be taught to present the recruiting of the ranks of the Sons of Belial, and the Sons of the Kingdom would be the more numerous.

Echoes from Philadelphia.

The Federation Council held a meeting at the Y. M. C. A. last Monday with the various denominations present. The speakers reported the national meeting at Philadelphia. These speakers were Rev. John P. Hill, secretary of the Board of Church Extension of the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Herbert L. Willett and C. D. Mitchell, pastor of St. James' Methodist Church. One of the practical enterprises inaugurated last Monday was the starting of a fund for the employment of Mr. Colby as agent of the Protestant churches in the Juvenile Courts. The Catholics have an agent there claiming every unattached child of Catholic parents and ready to receive all others.

The perpetuation of denominational difficulties and differences was ridiculed by all. Rev. Mr. Mitchell told a story of two German Reformed churches at a country cross-roads. When asked to explain the difference between the churches a countryman replied, "The old church believed that Eve tempted Adam with an apple; but we believe he was a 'son-of-a-gun' from the beginning."

Chicago preachers are much interested in a series of social studies edited by Josiah Strong called "The Gospel of the Kingdom." Some Chicago men among the contributors to the series are, Dr. Willett, Bishop Fallows, Prof. Henderson and Prof. Graham Taylor.

These studies are to be used in weekly meetings such as prayer-meeting, Christian Endeavor or adult Bible class. The studies for November show the curve of the series. "Working Women," "Woman's Wages," "Effects on Home Life," "Sweating and Consumers' Leagues," "What the Church Can Do."

The literature can be secured of the American Institute of Social Service, Bible House, Astor Place, New York. There can be no doubt of the benefit of introducing such a course into the life of any church.

CHURCH NOTES.

Ministers' Meeting.

The Ministerial Association will meet at the Jackson Boulevard Church, January 11, at 10:30 A. M., and will be addressed by the Rev. G. W. Thomas.

Let all the members of the association accept this as formal notice and make every effort to be present.

Stephen J. Corey will preach at Evanston on next Sunday evening.

Rev. Will F. Shaw left last Monday for a month's meeting at Newman, Ill.

C. E. Rainwater and wife made an extensive trip visiting relatives during the holidays.

Dr. Layton of China was at the ministers' meeting Monday. He will spend his furlough in Chicago. Our churches ought all to hear his story.

There have been two baptisms at the Metropolitan Church the past two weeks. Last Sunday night an unusually large audience greeted the minister, A. T. Campbell.

The Austin congregation gathered at the home of Rev. and Mrs. G. A. Campbell on New Year's evening. They left a holiday present for Mrs. Campbell and heartiest expressions of good-will for all in the household.

C. G. Kindred was at the ministers' meeting for the first time last Monday. He told his brethren of his preparation for the other world. His deep religious experience during his illness impressed all with the reality of the Christian faith. There were five additions at Englewood Sunday.

The rally of the Foreign Society will occur at the Jackson Boulevard Church next Monday. Stephen J. Corey will give his moving picture lecture in the evening. In the afternoon, returned missionaries and local pastors will give short addresses. The church serves a turkey dinner in the evening.

Prof. Lester Bartlett Jones of the University of Chicago spoke to the ministers last Monday on church music. He pleaded for high grade music throughout the church work. He would have the jingle hymns of popular evangelistic tabooed and the great, yet simple hymns of the past substituted.

The Evanston Church closed the year with a surplus in the treasury. The membership will be canvassed this month for funds to get on to the new lot. The old building may be moved over to the rear of the lot and remodeled for institutional work. The Sunday-school was the largest the past quarter that it has been in the present pastorate.

The quarterly rally of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society will be held at the First M. E. Church Sunday afternoon, Jan. 24. Dr. E. S. Ames is the speaker, and the Hyde Park choir will lead the music. Dr. Ames is qualified by his long residence in the city and by his social insight to deliver a masterful address. The interest already generated promises an unusual crowd.

WITH THE WORKERS

Living Link Evangelist, F. A. Sword, is in a meeting at Brooklyn, Ia.

The church at Alvin, Ill., has called T. J. Buck, of Frankford, Ind., to become their pastor.

The First Church, Omaha, Neb., has called to its pastorate J. M. Kersey, of Parsons, Kansas.

After a successful pastorate of eight years, E. L. Prunty has resigned the work at Brookfield, Mo.

The church at Winchester, Ill., under the leadership of Lew D. Hill, raised fifty dollars for state missions.

J. Will Walters has closed his work at Niantic, Ill., and entered into service with the church at Sullivan, Ill.

R. D. Brown and the church at Chapin, Ill., began a meeting Dec. 27, E. O. Beyer of Chicago is leading the singing.

T. L. Lowe, Union City, Ind., has received a unanimous call to the Fourth Ave. Church, Columbus, Ohio, to succeed Walter Mansell.

The church at Wibders, Ga., will dedicate its new building the first Sunday in February. Geo. L. Snively will have charge of the service.

E. F. Leake closed his work at Onawa and began at Vinton, Ia., Dec. 1, where he succeeds A. B. Elliott who takes the church at Grand Junction, Colo.

F. D. Ferrall has entered upon his fourth year with the church at Bloomfield, Ia. Bruce Brown, of Valparaiso, Ind., will assist them in a meeting beginning January 6.

Walter Mansell, Columbus, Ohio, goes to the work at Crawfordsville, Ind., Jan. 10, where he succeeds Earl Wilfrey, who has become pastor of the First Church, St. Louis.

F. J. Stinson and wife, Eldorado, Kan., have moved into the new parsonage. The members of the church celebrated the event with a surprise party, with a delightful program and refreshments.

The Central Christian Church, Peoria, Ill., is preparing to welcome W. F. Turner, of Joplin, Mo., as their pastor. The reception committee consists of the president of each of the auxiliaries of the church.

W. A. Green, of Kewanee, Ill., is in a meeting with the church at Camp Point, thus returning the service of the pastor H. J. Reynolds, of Camp Point, who recently assisted in a meeting at Kewanee.

Wilhite and Gates will assist the church at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, in a meeting during February. The meetings will be held in the skating rink which seats from 1,500 to 2,000 people. L. O. Newcomer is the aggressive pastor.

The members of the church at Colusa, California, have petitioned H. J. Loken to reconsider his acceptance of the call to the church at Alameda. We have not heard whether he will yield to the entreaty of his church.

The church at Cheney, Kan., received 100 new members in a meeting led by Edward Clutter. They have increased the salary of their pastor, H. J. Meyers, and on account of the large audiences are compelled to face the problem of increasing the size of their building.

TELEGRAMS.

Eureka, Ill., Jan. 3.—Annual report shows four thousand dollars for missions and benevolences. No large gifts.
Alva W. Taylor.

Washingon, Pa., Jan. 3.—Twenty-four added today, one hundred and fifty-eight to date. Greatest Washington meeting in twenty years. George L. Snively easily ranks with our greatest evangelists in resourcefulness, drawing and converting power. Many new subscriptions today. Meeting closes too soon. Evangelists begin next at Marshall, Mo. E. A. Cole, Minister.

Des Moines, Iowa, Jan. 3.—Eighty-three added today—first invitations. Began with Central Church, Finis Idleman, pastor, Thursday. Sixteen converts this morning, sixty-seven tonight. I worked with Brother Idleman four years ago at Paris, Illinois, and with this church 8 years ago when Dr. Breeden was pastor. Brother Idleman is a prince among pastors, with unlimited enthusiasm and consecration. Vancamp and Mrs. Scoville are here. Rockwells at my parents' home, Butler, Indiana, where I gave three invitations last week with twenty-four and eighteen added. Today was our greatest first day with a single church.
Chas. Reign Scoville.

Findlay, Ohio, Jan. 3.—Began with First Church today under favorable conditions. Pastor John Mullen and his people earnest and hopeful. Mr. Leroy St. John, the peerless song leader, began permanent engagements with me. L. E. Seller.

Joel Brown held a meeting at Lancaster, Mo.

Knowles and Ridenour began a meeting at Beaver Crossing, Neb., January 1.

The Foreign Society is making a strong appeal for a Christian physician for work in China. Certainly America's abundance should supply China's need.

H. E. Oldaker, Salinville, Ohio, is holding a short meeting for the La Belle View Mission, Steubenville, where C. N. Garrett, a Bethany student, is the minister.

J. R. Golden began his pastorate with the West Side Church, Springfield, the first Sunday in January. He was heartily welcomed by the other ministers and churches of the city.

The First Church, Springfield, held its annual meeting New Year's night. The reports from the various departments showed the church to be in the most prosperous condition.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., under the leadership of F. W. Burnham, is entering enthusiastically into the preparation for the union meeting which will be led by "Billy" Sunday.

The Chicago Christian Missionary Society will hold its next quarterly rally at the First M. E. Church, Jan. 24. The address will be delivered by Dr. E. S. Ames, pastor of the Hyde Park Church.

A. F. Stahl has been two weeks with the church at Steubenville, Ohio, and the church is under his leadership taking on renewed courage. Their Sunday-school brought together a bountiful supply of provisions for the poor of the city. The church has a benevolent fund of $800.00, and they see that no child is kept from Sunday-school for lack of clothing.

W. S. Johnson is now in a meeting at Panora, Ia.

One thousand in the Sunday-school, Jan. 3, was the standard set by the North Tonawanda Church (N. Y.)

G. N. Griswold, Waveland, Ind., is available for a series of meetings. He is an evangelist of experience.

The church at Billings, Montana, Walter M. Jordan, pastor, began a meeting Jan. 3. Miss Lucille May Park leads the singing.

President A. McLean and Secretay S. J. Corey are making a great record in missionary rallies this year. The moving pictures, a new and instructive feature are proving very popular.

E. D. Long, 5218 Union avenue, Chicago, Ill., is available for pulpit work with churches in or near the city, until April first, and will assist churches either as regular or occasional supply work.

Geo. B. Stewart, Warrensburg, Mo., speaks in the highest terms of the work of Evangelists Snively and Altheide who assisted in the recent meeting at Warrensburg in which there were 77 additions to the church.

M. E. Dutt has just closed the first six months of his pastorate with the church at Las Vegas, New Mexico. In that time there has been a net increase in the membership of 25, and the church is in the most prosperous condition.

W. C. Bower, pastor of the Tabernacle Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., is spending a few weeks in special studies at the Columbia University. Lowell C. McPherson, Vice-President Keuka College, is supplying the pulpit at the Tabernacle Church.

W. S. Johnson, evangelist under the State Board of Iowa, closed a meeting at Griswold, Ia., Dec. 22. Miss Ola Bowles, of Des Moines, led the singing. She is highly commended for her Christian character and ability as soloist and director of music. There were 34 additions to the church. S. R. McClure is the energetic pastor.

Harry G. Hill, Third Church, Indianapolis, announces the following series of "Larger Life Sermons," to be preached Sunday evenings during January and February: "Humanity's Highest Honor"; "As a Man Thinketh"; "The Will to Be Well"; "What All the World Wants"; How to Have Personal Power"; "Wisdom's Ways"; "How to Be Happy"; "The Way to Wealth."

J. T. Brown, Johnson City, Tenn., announces a series of eight sermons on "Foreign Countries and Heathen Religions" for the months of January and February. The sermons will be illustrated by the use of the stereopticon. This is the very best way to interest people in Foreign Missions. Preachers, the Foreign Society will furnish you slides for this sort of work, asking only that you pay express each way, and return the views within two weeks.

M. F. Harmon, editor of the Christian Messenger, Jackson, Miss., commends editorially the present work of the Christian Century and adds: "From Willett's 'Confession of Faith', he seems to be believing in almost everything which we have usually considered to be essential and possibly in a little more. Why don't the Standard accept his statement, treat him as a brother, and go on about its business? It may cause Willett to be taken off the program but it can't turn him out of the Kingdom, nor try him for heresy."

WITH THE WORKERS

AT OLD EUREKA.

Dear old Eureka! As Paul said of the Philippians, "I thank my God upon every remembrance of you." Eureka is not a town, a place on the map, only. It is a life, a character, a spirit, an inspiration—the embodiment of great spiritual and intellectual forces. For three-quarters of a century good men and great and noble and consecrated women have been pouring the tides of highest thinking and purest living incarnate in splendid personalities into "Eureka." And today Eureka—College and church—is a source of almost constant streams of influence carrying blessing and benediction throughout the world. How much do some of us owe Eureka. For three years of academic training under the old masters—Radford, Everest, Allen and others, for the degree of Bachelor of Arts conferred more than thirty years ago and for Master of Arts three years later. For the privilege of winning the best wife the Lord ever gave any man. These are supreme among her myriad of gifts to me. Why shouldn't I love Eureka? Seven years ago when the new edifice was completed, it was my privilege to share the fellowship of the church in the service of dedication. But the greatest joy and honor the Eureka Church ever bestowed upon an alumnus of the college was mine last month when I was privileged to lead this grand old church—winner of so many victories— in a twenty-five days' soul winning campaign. The character and results of this campaign have already been adequately and admirably reported by the pastor and Prof. Radford. Let it be mine to set down some impressions of the church as it is today and its ministers. Later I shall perform a similar service for the college. The Eureka church has had a glorious history. Some of the greatest men the brotherhod has known have preached for it. Some of the best pastors have shepherded this flock. But the flock is larger today than ever before—the church vastly stronger in every good word and work.

For six years Alva W. Taylor has led the Eureka flock into "green pastures and beside still waters." And his leadership has indeed been a masterful and yet withal a gentle one. As few men among us, Brother Taylor combines the essential qualities of the preacher, the pastor and administrator. He has the vision of the prophet, the sympathy and considerate care of the shepherd and the masterful grasp of affairs, the close attention to detail, the managerial qualities of the trained executive. In these six years of his incumbency the church has steadily advanced in every department. In this period more than two hundred and fifty have been added to the church by baptism and a much larger number by statement and letter. More than $17,000 have been given for missions and benevolence. The missionary offerings have increased from $1,000 the first year of his pastorate to nearly $4,000 the last year. In each of the last three years the missionary offerings have exceeded the offerings for current expenses. Is there another church in the brotherhood that holds such a record? The past year has been the crowning one of this pastorate. The accessions have been larger, the giving more generous, the spirit of Christ in the church more evident and every auxiliary at the high tide of its life. A remarkable characteristic of Brother Taylor's ministry is its effectiveness in reaching and winning young men. A large number of baptisms during the entire pastorate have been young men and the very best workers in the church today are from their ranks. The students of the college have been greatly inspired by his ministry and they are, with few exceptions, in the church.

Brother Taylor is a vigorous and virile thinker, a dilligent student, with a strong hold upon the vital things, the eternal verities of the gospel. Sometimes he is, I think, misunderstood in his teaching, but to me he seems to be above all things loyal to Christ and His gospel and aware of the Spirit of the Age. His supreme desire is to commend his Master to the minds and hearts of those who need Him.

Brother Taylor has until now resisted the many temptations that have come to lure him to a larger field and a greater work, but the repeated and reinforced appeals of the Irving Park Church, Chicago, though once declined, ought to be effective. In such a field, with ample scope for his versatile powers, his superb sociological and spiritual equipment he will do his greatest work.

H. O. Breeden.

WITH THE WORKERS

Assisted by Chas. Altheide (singer), and Geo. L. Snively (Evangelist), the church at Marshall, Mo., with B. F. Wharton as pastor, began a meeting January third.

The church at Metropolis, Ill., has just closed a meeting with R. R. Hamlin of Fort Worth, Texas, as Evangelist. There were 83 additions to their membership.

J. W. Lowber of Austin, Texas, preached his farewell sermon for that church January 6, thus closing an unusually successful pastorate which has lasted through a period of twelve years. He expects to devote his time to lecturing.

The Allen Ave. Church, Richmond, Va., held a four days' meeting, Dec. 27 to 30, in opening the Sunday-school section of the church. There were services on Sunday, and at 8:00 o'clock Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday evenings.

Geo. L. Snively, who has just closed a meeting with the church at Washington, Penn., of which Bro. E. A. Cole is pastor, says of the pastor: "He is the most popular preacher in the city and pastor of the most useful church there."

T. L. Read closed a six weeks' meeting at Chapin, Ill., on December 20, with 107 added, 83 baptisms, 66 men and 41 women, only five under 16 years of age; 20 men and their wives; 19 reclaimed, 5 from other churches, who had been baptized. Net gain to the brotherhood 88. He was assisted by J. Wade Seniff of Pittsfield as chorus leader and soloist.

H. H. Peters will present the cause of Christian Education in several of the leading churches of Illinois during the month of January. Among them will be University Place, Champaign, Rantoul, First Church, Bloomington, Lexington, Decatur (Central), Latham, Jacksonville, and Watseka. He writes that the prospects are bright for Eureka College.

We receive with sorrow the news that Mrs. W. T. Moore, president of Christian College at Columbia, Mo., has broken down in health by her strenuous labors for the school for which she has sacrificed so much. Mrs. Moore has been president of Christian College for the past twelve years, and has not only given herself, but a large amount of money, to the building up of this time-honored institution. She will resign the presidency of the college the first of next June and take a well-earned rest. Friends everywhere will wish her perfect restoration and a speedy return to her great usefulness.

KEUKA COLLEGE

A remarkable incident in the progress of union between Free Baptists and Disciples is their co-operation in the conduct of Keuka College, Keuka, N. Y. We take pleasure in presenting to our readers the following agreement which forms the basis of the co-operation, which has been adopted by both bodies: 1. That the Disciples of Christ co-operate in the management of Keuka College. 2. That the Disciples of Christ be given the privilege of naming four trustees immediately, and that, as other vacancies occur in the board, the number be increased as expedient, until they shall have equal representation with the Free Baptists. 3. That the Disciples of Christ be given at least one representative on the Executive Committee, and that they be duly represented in the personnel of the Faculty. 4. That the Disciples of Christ co-operate with the College in providing proper support, and in conducting a joint canvass for $100,000 additional endowment, the income only of which is to be used for the maintenance of the College. 5. That the Disciples of Christ secure for the College a suitable man to enter upon field service, to aid in securing students and money for the institution. 6. That, upon entering into this co-operation, the Board of Trustees appoint a Board of Arbitration, to consist of three members, one a Free Baptist, one a Disciple of Christ, and these two to select a third at their convenience. That, in case of any continued disagreement in points essential to the welfare or policy of the College or in matters that are fundamental to our continued co-operation this Board of Arbitration shall have the authority to decide such questions as shall be referred to it by the Trustees; it being understood that in case of any division of property being necessary, the Disciples of Christ shall share only in that part of the property which they have helped to accumulate. It is suggested, on behalf of the Free Baptists, that the first President of the College under the new arrangement be named by the Disciples of Christ; and it is their desire that a Biblical department be established under his direction. It is the opinion of the officers of Keuka College that this plan of co-operation will be welcomed by a large number of the Free Baptists, there being no apparent opposition to it; while it is the opinion of the Disciples that such a union of efforts will be potent in promoting Christian unity; and it is hoped by all that names and thoughts of distinction will rapidly disappear in loyal service of the Master in the cause of Christian education.

"CHRISTIAN MEN"

The first number of Christian Men has come to our desk. It is the organ of the Committee of Men's Organization Disciples of Christ, published at Kansas City, Mo., with P. C. Macfarlane as editor and business manager. On the front page is the cut of R. A. Long, president of the National Men's Organization, and on another page a short sketch of Mr. Long's very interesting career as a Christian business man. It is the plan to give each month a sketch of some captain of industry among us. The magazine contains such articles as "The Minister's Work a Man's Work," "The Men's Brotherhood," a sketch of the history of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, some model constitutions of men's associations, a sketch of the Men's work in the Christian Church of Alameda, California, where the editor P. C. Macfarlane has closed a successful pastorate to take up the larger work with men of the entire church. The magazine is bright, aggressive, virile, and will be a great service to the work of the men in any church where it may be taken.

LUM GRADED SCHOOL.

In the call for gifts for the Southern Christian Institute, on account of the burning of Allison Hall, we have overlooked the needs of the Lum Graded School. In our last appeal we stated that enough clothing had been sent to the S. C. I., but enough has not been sent to Lum. On account of the unusually hard times, there will be great suffering in that part of Alabama this winter. A good supply of clothing will enable the workers there to not only relieve suffering, but to greatly strengthen the mission of the school in the community. Send good, warm clothing, securely packed in strong boxes. Direct boxes to Isom Franklin, Calhoun, Ala. Letters directed to Lum, Ala., will reach him. Please note this call from the suffering.

WITH THE WORKERS

S. D. Dutcher has begun work as pastor at Terre Haute, Ind.

Mr. and Mrs. F. H. Cappa, singing evangelists, are assisting J. M. Vawter in a meeting at Sullivan, Ind.

March 1 Nathaniel Jacks will close his work at Texarkana, Texas, to enter the generalistic field.

The Broadway Church, Louisville, Ky., is placing a new pipe organ in their building. W. N. Briney is the pastor.

Jewell Howard has resigned the work at Amarillo, Texas. This is a good church and should not be long without a pastor.

C. G. Brelos is considering the work at Galveston, Texas, where there is a larger German population than in any other city of Texas.

Mrs. M. M. Blanks, of Lackhart, has given a new building to the Bible Chair work at Austin. Work on the structure is about completed.

Randolph Cook, minister at Enid, Okla., is pushing the work with vigor. The C. W. B. M. offering was $29.00. Additional payment on church debt.

The meeting with the Budd Park Church, Kansas City, led by Wilhite and Gates, resulted in 87 additions to the church. B. L. Wray is the pastor.

Good reports come from the work of Cephas Shelburne with the East Dallas (Texas) Church. There have been 14 additions to the church in the last few weeks.

John L. Brandt and wife expect to make a circuit of the globe immediately following the Centennial Convention. The chief purpose is to study the work of our mission fields.

The new church at Winchester, Ky., which will cost $75,000, is nearing completion. It will be one of the finest buildings which we have in the state. J. H. McNeil is the pastor.

C. R. Oakley, who began work with the church at Mansfield, Ohio, in November, is getting the work in fine shape and is most highly commended by the people of his church.

President E. V. Zollars and Bro. LeMay are pushing hard their campaign for funds for Oklahoma Christian University, Enid, Okla. Since October 1 they have raised $25,000.00.

On the 19th of January E. L. Powell and his church will hold their annual banquet for the men of the city. The banquet has come to be regarded as one of the principal events in the calendar of the life of Louisville.

The church at Richmond, Ky., has raised about $29,000 toward a building fund and will begin work as soon as a sufficient amount is raised. Cloyd Goodnight will be E. E. Moorman's successor in the work at Danville, Ill.

The work of Oklahoma Christian University is greatly prospering. Its present enrollment is 250 students. About sixty of these are in preparation for the ministry, many of them supporting themselves by preaching for nearby churches. Twenty states are represented in the student body. All members of the faculty are enthusiastic over the work of the school.

Harvey Hazel will succeed W. L. Martin as pastor of the Boyle Heights Church, Los Angeles.

Charles E. McVay, song evangelist, has an open date for March. Address him at Atlantic, Iowa.

W. H. Weisheit, the new pastor at Bellevue, Penn., has been holding a good meeting with his home church.

I. H. Teel recently resigned at Visalia, Cal., to become pastor at South Berkeley. His new work is prospering with ten additions during December.

Evangelist H. Gordon Bennett began a meeting January 3 at Nanton, Alberta. He continues for some time in evangelistic work in western Canada.

Clutter and Epler are in a good meeting at Osborne, Kan., and will hold a meeting at Miltonvale, Kan., where Eli Walker is minister, during the month of January.

Granville Snell is in a good meeting with pastor Rusk at Elmo, Mo. Four added and good prospects. Mr. Snell sends the Christian Century his earnest approval of our "stand for Christian liberty."

The building being erected by the National C. W. B. M., as the home for the Mission Training School, at Irvington, Ind., in connection with Butler College, is progressing rapidly. It will be ready for occupancy by the time the flowers bloom.

It is announced that E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., a prince of our preachers, and Dr. Anna Gordon, former Living Link missionary of the First Christian Church, are to be married some time in February. The Christian Century extends its felicitations.

J. F. Findley gave his lecture on the "Passion Play" at the First Christian Church on Tuesday evening, Dec. 22, to a large audience. From the fact that Brother Findley witnessed this Tragic Drama at Ober-Ammergau in 1900, made it quite impressive, and he is requested to repeat it (the "Passion Play") again in the near future. The net proceeds for the church were something over forty dollars.

Albert Stahl, recently pastor of the Second Church in Akron, O., has accepted the pastorate of the church in Steubenville, O., and will begin his work with the opening year.

E. J. Church will close a successful three and one-half years' ministry at Granby, Mo., April 30, 1909. Would like to hold two or three meetings in the spring before locating elsewhere. Terms reasonable. Have had 67 additions this year.

Edward Oliver Tilburn will hold meetings in Montana for several weeks under the auspices of the Montana Christian Association by whom he is highly recommended as pastor or evangelist. He can be engaged for meetings during 1909, and proposes holding summer meetings under a new but tried and successful plan with him. Would consider a pastorate. His address is 119 West Galena St., Butte, Montana.

The church at Veedersburg, Ind., closed a four weeks' meeting last Snuday night with a service in the Opera House that broke all records for attendance in that auditorium. There were 71 added to the church, and the meetings accomplished far more than any one dared to hope. Harry A. Davis of Chicago was the evangelist, and he proved himself to be one of unusual power. The church and community were delighted with his work. Mr. Kelley begins at Wayntown, Ind., Jan. 10.

The church at San Angelo, Texas, is preparing to erect a new building to cost from $25,000 to $30,000.

H. B. Easterling and E. E. Nelms are in a good meeting at Lane, Ill. Seven persons were added the first week.

The church at Oceanside, Cal., Oscar Sweeney, pastor, is being assisted in a meetin by Grant K. Lewis. Prof. B. P. Stout, of Philadelphia, has charge of the music.

W. F. Richardson, pastor of the First Church, Kansas, City, Mo., spent the holidays with his wife and son and daughter at Roswell, N. M., where they are staying for the son's health.

C. B. Reynolds has accepted a call to the church at Alliance, Ohio, and will soon close his work with the church at New Philadelphia, where he has served for two and one-half years.

H. H. Peters of Eureka College delivered an address in the Christian Church of Rantoul, Ill., the evening of Jan. 3 to a large and enthusiastic crowd. Mr. Peters was pastor of this church for three years, resigning to enter Eureka College eight years ago.

The church at Ionia, Michigan, will celebrate the semi-centennial year of its history January 24. A special invitation is extended to "all Disciples who have been members of this church, whoever or wherever they may be, to come home and spend a few days under the old roof-tree." G. W. Moore is the present, much-beloved pastor.

The church at Woodward, Okla., where E. S. McKinley is the pastor, is planning to raise all money for their expenses by the tithing system, thus abandoning the conventional contribution basket. They have pledged $1,350 for Christian Education this year, and have given their pastor an increase in salary.

INTERESTING FACTS.

Food Knowledge on the Farm.

With the Rural Free Delivery of mails, the farmer is as closely in touch with what is going on in the world, as his city brother.

What to eat, in order to get the best out of one's brain and body, is as important for the modern farmer as the manufacturer, business man or professional worker. An Illinois farmer writes:

"I am a farmer and was troubled with chronic indigestion for two years—suffered great agony and could find no permanent relief from medicines.

"A friend suggested that I quit using so much starchy foods, which are the principal causes of intestinal indigestion. I began to use Grape-Nuts and have continued with most gratifying results.

"Grape-Nuts food has built me up wonderfully. I gained 6 lbs., the first four weeks that I used it. My general health is better than before, my brain is clear, my nerves strong.

"For breakfast and dinner I have Grape-Nuts with cream, a slice of crisp toast, a soft boiled egg and a cup of Postum. My evening meal is made of Grape-Nuts and cream, alone.

"This diet gives me good rest every night and I am now well again."

WITH THE WORKERS

FOREIGN MISSIONARY RALLIES.

Campaign of missionary rallies with moving picture exhibition at night will be conducted by the Foreign Society during January and February. These meetings will be led by President A. McLean and Secretary Stephen J. Corey. The meetings will begin at 2 o'clock in the afternoon and continue until 4:30. At night an exhibition of our missionary work around the world with moving pictures and stereopticon slides. These evening services are very popular. Large audiences attend. The moving pictures are very rare and bring the realities of heathen life before the people in a striking way.

The following returned missionaries will speak at the afternoon metings. M. D. Adams, who has been twenty-five years in India, Dr. Butchart of China, W. H. Hanna of the Philippines and H. P. Shaw of China.

DOINGS AT DIXON, ILL.

With the exit of 1908 I close ten months of service in this important field of northern Illinois. The visible result shows that fifteen have been added to the church at regular services.

All departments of the church reveal a marked increase. The Sunday-school won the banner in a midsummer contest with three other schools. We celebrated the victory with a week's rally, at which the various interests of the church were presented by visiting ministers.

The church has strugg'ed under a growing indebtedness for several years. We began a campaign to provide for this and make needed improvements, among which was a splendid light plant. We have succeeded.

The church is growing in power. We begin an evangelistic campaign under the leadership of Lockhart and Lintt.

The minister has been honored by the office of secretary of the Ministerial Association, also selected to teach the Union Y. M. C. A. Teachers' Training Class which has grown to a Century Class.

The minister has made ten special addresses and conducted a three weeks' evangelistic meeting with the historic Old Pine Creek Church, at which there were 17 added, this in addition to the regular work.

Fraternally yours,
A. R. Spicer.

THE TEXAS MINISTERIAL INSTITUTE.

Three important meetings lasting ten days, combining the Ministerial Institute, the Texas State Mission Rally and the Texas Lectureship, will be held in the Chapel of the Texas Christian University, Waco, January 26 to Feb. 4. The three programs will furnish a rich variety of thought and inspiration, and promise to be a valuable contribution to the progress of the cause in the southwest. The Central Christian Church in Waco unites with the University Church in extending a hearty welcome to visitors whether living in Texas or elsewhere. An effort will be made to secure special rates on railroads, and free lodging will be provided for all. It is earnestly hoped that a large attendance will continue through all these meetings.

The Lectureship will discuss among others the following subjects: "Christ and the Human Soul"; "Principles of Scientific Criticism"; "Our Church Polity"; "The Supreme Apologetic"; "Christian Science"; "Legal and Spiritual Effects of Our Plea"; "Method of Scientific Criticism"; "The Growing Church and Ministerial Supply"; "The Declaration and Address in Relation to our Present Day Problems"; "Historical Problems in Daniel"; "Studies in the Psalms"; "Studies in Isaiah."

The Institute will discuss: "The Place of the Doctrine of God in preaching"; "The Breadth of the Twentieth Century Ministry"; "The Septuagint Translation of the Old Testament"; "How to put a Church to Work"; "Pastor and Church College"; "The Church and Foreign Immigration"; "The Minister in His Library"; "Missionary Co-operation of Texas with other States"; "The Impending Prohibition Battle"; "The One Faith"; "Studies in the Psalms"; "The Minister and Social Problems," and a series of four addresses by representatives of four different churches on the attitude and tendency of these churches towards Christian unity.

The State Mission Rally will present a session of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, a Business Men's session, a Bible School session and a Missionary session. A few of the subjects are: "The Texas Bible Chair"; "The Imperialism of Christ and His Gospel"; "The Best Method of Reaching Southern People with the Gospel"; "Our Duty to our German Citizen"; "Our Field and our Forces"; "Business Men and the Church."

On each school day an address will be given to the entire university and visitors. These programs will be exceedingly valuable to all persons interested in a study of religious questions, whether preachers or other workers in behalf of Christian truth. The program is modern, and the speakers are among the best in the south.

Clinton Lockhart.

Chas. G. Stout was with us in Denver, Colo., at a most delightful meeting, closing on the 21st of Dec. Stout is an ideal evangelist, and a most pleasant yoke-fellow. He goes to Longmont next. There were twenty-one additions in our meeting at the East Side Church; ten baptisms.

THEN AND NOW.

Complete Recovery from Coffee Ills.

"About nine years ago my daughter, from coffee drinking, was on the verge of nervous prostration," writes a Louisville lady. "She was confined for the most part to her home.

"When she attempted a trip down town she was often brought home in a cab and would be prostrated for days afterwards.

"On the advice of her physician she gave up coffee and tea, drank Postum, and ate Grape-Nuts for breakfast.

"She liked Postum from the very beginning and we soon saw improvement. Today she is in perfect health, the mother of five children, all of whom are fond of Postum.

"She has recovered, is a member of three charity organizations and a club, holding an office in each. We give Postum and Grape-Nuts the credit for her recovery."

"SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION."

The Southern California Christian Ministers' Asssociation is one of the most pleasant and most helpful factors of the church work on this coast.

For years it has met regularly on the first Monday in each month, pro-rating traveling expenses so that all of our ministers in our southland can afford to attend.

With the rapid extension of our churches in recent years, the association has enjoyed a proportionate growth. Formerly the meetings were held in different localities, going from church to church, but for the last three years, to avoid confusion and for convenience of all, the meetings have been held at the First Christian Church in Los Angeles.

The attendance of "laymen" has been encouraged until now the monthly sessions have an attendance of from one to two hundred, and this is constantly increasing.

This attendance is fostered by the social hour including a luncheon in the basement of the church, served by the Ladies' Aid Society.

Doubtless the attendance will be augmented this year by the unusual character of the program. The chief feature is to be Centennial themes, assigned as follows: "Beginnings of the Restoration Movement," by W. H. Martin, of Whittier. (This was discussed in December.)

"Thomas Campbell and the Declaration and Address," W. E. Crabtree of Central Church, San Diego. January.

"Alexander Campbell," by A. C. Smither, of First Church, Los Angeles. February.

"Coadjutors of Alexander Campbell," by Geo. Ringo, of Westside Church, Los Angeles. March.

"Isaac Errett's Contribution to the Restoration," F. M. Dowling, of First Church, Pasadena. April.

"Christian Union," by F. M. Rodgers, of First Church, Long Beach. May.

"The Outlook," by J. B. McKnight, of Magnolia Avenue Church, Los Angeles. June.

"Distinctive Doctrines of the Christian Church," by J. N. Smith, of the Eastside Church, Los Angeles. July.

These addresses will be carefully prepared and are expected to be fairly exhaustive in treatment. They will constitute the morning lectures at the Long Beach Convention next August, and are the same themes which will be discussed at the Centennial Convention at Pittsburg.

All members of all our congregations are invited to these meetings, and these addresses with other high class features of the program each month ought to insure an attendance that will tax the capacity of the lecture room of the First Church. The committee and the association say, "Come!" Let him that heareth say, "Come!" And whosoever will let him come.

Geo. Ringo.

THE CENTENNIAL EDUCATION DAY.

For several years the third Lord's Day in January has been designated "Education Day." Most of our colleges have sought to utilize it as the occasion for making reports of their work to the churches. Many churches have earnestly coöperated with them in making the day yield a better understanding between the college and the church. Where this has been done an intimate relation exists that is second in its force and tenderness only to the personal relation between the graduate and his Alma Mater. The Christian college belongs to the church and the church in a very real and reciprocal way belongs to the college. One cannot thrive without the other.

CHICAGO

Continued.

There was one confession at Maywood last Sunday.

The church at Harvey had a number of additions last month.

Rev. G. W. Thomas, who is in a meeting at West End, was in the ministers' meeting Monday. He comes from Lynnville, Ill.

Sheffield Avenue Church has been having a series of free Friday evening entertainments to enlist their neighborhood.

Dr. Gates preached at Chicago Heights last Sunday. No pastor has been located there yet.

J. K. Arnot preaches at Armitage Avenue Church now. He is making a canvass of the neigborhood to see how many are unchurched.

I recently assisted Carey E. Morgan of Paris, Ky., in a two weeks' meeting, the numerical results of which were sixty-six additions to the congregation. Rarely, if ever, have I led in a meeting where there was more beautiful harmony and more perfect co-operation and sympathy with the plans and methods of the evangelist. The congregation is cultur d, hospitable, responsive and consecrated. Brother Morgan is a princely preacher and a royal leader of men. He and his wife take the initiative in every forward movement in the community.

The Sunday-school of this congregation is doing a notable work. Its superintendent, Wm. Hinton, is a man of vision. During the afternoons of the meeting I delivered a series of lectures to the teachers of the Sunday-school and others especially interested in this work.

On the last evening but one of the meeting, about thirty of the alumni of Transylvania University met in reunion and banquet and discussed most enthusiastically the interests of the institution. Three of the trustees of Transylvania University, Messrs. John T. Hinton, Robert C. Talbott and Carey E. Morgan, are members of this congregation.

Charcoal Purifies Any Breath

And In Its Purest Form Has Long Been Known As the Greatest Gas Absorber.

Pure willow charcoal will oxidize almost any odor and render it sweet and pure. A panful in a foul cellar will absorb deadly fumes, for charcoal absorbs one hundred times its volume in gas.

The ancients knew the value of charcoal and administered it in cases of illness, especially pertaining to the stomach. In England today charcoal poultices are used for ulcers, boils, etc., while some physicians in Europe claim to cure many skin diseases by covering the afflicted skin with charcoal powder.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges go into the mouth and transfer foul odors at once into oxygen, absorb noxious gases and acids and when swallowed mix with the digestive juices and stop gas making, fermentation and decay.

By their gentle qualities they control beneficially bowel action and stop diarrhoea and constipation.

Bad breath simply cannot exist when charcoal is used. There are no ifs or ands about this statement. Don't take our word for it, but look into the matter yourself. Ask your druggist or physician, or better still, look up charcoal in your encyclopedia. The beauty of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges is that the highest pharmaceutical expert knowledge obtainable has been used to prepare a lozenge that will give to man the best form of charcoal for use.

Pure willow and honey is the result. Two or three after meals and at bedtime sweeten the breath, stop decay of teeth, aid the digestive apparatus and promote perfect bowel action. They enrich the supply of oxygen to the system and thereby revivify the blood and nerves.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are sold everywhere in vast quantities, thus they must have merit. Every druggist carries them, price, twenty-five cents per box, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail, free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

A SPLENDID ACHIEVEMENT IN RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

On Sunday, December 27, the congregation formerly known as the West End Christian Church of Richmond, Va., dedicated the Sunday-school section of its new building in Lee District, and will hereafter be known as the Allen Avenue Christian Church of that city.

This church was organized eight years ago with a membership of 61. A lot valued at $3,000 was leased for five years with the privilege of purchase at the end of that term, and a modest building erected at a cost of $2,000. Henry Pearce Atkins, then of Harrodsburg, Ky., was called to its pastorate in April, 1901, with promise of support from the A. C. M. S. and C. W. B. M. From the beginning, however, the church proved self-supporting and the appropriations made by these societies were returned. In 1906 the church bought the lot which it had leased and shortly afterwards sold its property for $4,500. A new site, six squares west of the old, was selected; and a lot, 80 by 129 feet at the corner of Allen and Hanover Avenues, was purchased for $5,200. In February, 1908, plans were drawn for a building to cost about $30,000; and the contract for the Sunday school section was let shortly afterwards. This section was occupied on December 27.

The building is of brick and terra cotta, of Gothic design, planned to accommodate a Sunday-school of about 400. It is equipped with class rooms, gallery, dining room, store room and kitchen; and so constructed that the main auditorium with a seating capacity of 550 may be added without mechanical difficulty to what is now the front of the building.

This section, furnished, cost $17,500—or $22,700 including the lot. $10,000 of this was provided for by the sale of the old property for $4,500 and $5,500 raised in a building campaign last April. Before dedication the total amount to be raised or carried was $12,700. The Society of Church Extension offered $8,000 on its usual condition. To meet this condition it was necessary to raise $4,700 on the day of opening, which was done in a spiritual service under the direction of our Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, who dedicated the old building eight years ago. The Sunday-school of 160 and the membership of 230 have given about eighty per cent of all money raised. Friends everywhere had part in the rest. The largest gifts were $300, but the accumulation of the many smaller ones made the enterprise possible.

FROM THE NEW MEXICO EVANGELIST.

A three days' trip from Las Vegas brought me to Aztec in the northwestern part of New Mexico. Near here are the old Aztec ruins which have been standing for many centuries. For thirty years this country has been settled by a fine class of people. Apples of an extra fine quality are raised here. You will not find a more orderly community anywhere in the east. It is the second place in New Mexico to vote out the saloon. Bro. John Hay preached here a number of times this year and prepared the way for the meeting which resulted in an organization of 23. Three baptisms.

THE SOUTHWESTERN STUDENT CONFERENCE.

A religious meeting which deserves more than a passing notice was the Students' Conference which met at Ruston, La., Dec. 26-Jan. 3. At this conference there were delegates from many of the colleges and universities in Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas. There were about 125 men present. The Bible classes, Mission classes, Institutes on the Ministry and Personal Evangelism, the Volunteer Band, as well as the great sermons and addresses set many a man on edge spiritually and sent him back to his college determined to do a great work among his fellows for Jesus Christ. Some of the leading religious men of the South as well as several international secretaries led these students in their thought and devotion. Several men took their stand for Christ and many Christians decided on life callings.

It is well to keep one's eye on the great growth of this organization among the students of our land. The church though infinitely older has many valuable lessons to learn from this organization on the questions of Christian union, business methods, effective organization, genuine earnestness and consecration.

This organization is really getting the cream of the Christian young men of our colleges and land for effective Christian work and for this, one can only express the deepest gratitude to God. Frank L. Jewett.

Jesus as a Religious Man

It is a great achievement of faith when our souls abandon all Christian religions and accept the religion of Christ. The Christ who is made the center of a so-called "Christian System" may be very unlike the Christ who actually lived in Galilee. In our habit of making him the object of our faith there has grown up a more or less artificial conception of his personality which can only be corrected as we call ourselves back to contemplate him as a man of faith himself. A system of religion even with Jesus as the center of it may be and usually is something quite different from the religious faith by which Jesus himself lived.

Yet there is nothing clearer, once we think of it, than that Jesus came among us not to give a new religious system to the world but to live the true religious life among men, who, catching his spirit, possessing his mind, would carry this new life to others even as he had brought it to them. Christianity is not a dogma of any kind, not even a dogma concerning Jesus' person; it is a life, the life Jesus himself possessed. This life of Jesus was religious through and through. It was the perfect expression of God's holy will. It was divine life, but we must not on that account yield an iota of its human reality.

It should be instructive and wholesome for us to consider Jesus as a religious man, for then we will have a clearer conception of his right to be an object of our religious faith and worship. This right to be worshipped is not an arbitrary one asserted by virtue of Jesus' official relation to God, but a moral one certified to us by the character of his actual experience of fellowship with God.

What are the basic convictions upon which Jesus risked his all? This is the question we are to ask if we would discover any man's faith. For faith is not what a man believes through argument, but what, perhaps without proof, he feels so strongly must be true that he risks his soul's goods upon its being so. Upon what basic convictions did Jesus build his life?

He built his life upon the faith that God was his Father. This was the deepest conviction of Jesus' soul. Here is the fountain head of his religion. Men knew something of God ere Jesus came, some had even had glimpses of the truth of the divine fatherhood. But no one had ever made this insight central and normative in conduct until Jesus made it so. He took God's fatherhood seriously.

Men had taken God's power seriously. He is the God to be feared. The storms are his, the thunder and the lightning; the stars he flings out as a boy a handful of marbles. Men had taken God's wisdom seriously. They had seen order in the universe and knew that the Creator of all things was himself a rational being. They had even taken God's righteous character seriously. "Be ye holy for I am holy" was one of his revelations to them. But now Christ comes and, for the first time in history, takes God's love seriously. He started his life early upon his childhood's perception of God's loving care, and built his conduct through all the years upon that conviction.

Nothing could destroy that faith in God's loving fatherhood. He knew himself, obscurely born, possessing no rank nor insignia of power, a common man among the sons of men—he knew himself to be the child of the Father in heaven. He based his life upon the conviction that this Father cared for him personally, that he was not lost in the crowd of men, but that the very hairs of his head were numbered. In every experience of his life, therefore, he could be sure his Father had a share. Out of this conviction of God's fatherliness grew his habit of prayer. If God was sharing his child's life he would surely hear his child's prayer. Therefore his prayer was unlike the prayers one would hear in that time. He asked in a simple way for simple goods believing neither that God heard on account of much speaking nor that he must be placated with offerings. God, to Jesus, was "Closer * * * than breathing, Nearer than hands or feet."

The second conviction upon which Jesus staked his life's goods was that every event of his daily life would be significant of the Father's will. The religion of Jesus' own soul, unlike some of the Christian religions, was not treasured in a compartment by itself, but belonged intrinsically to the whole of his experience. There was no interest or activity that lay outside the religious sphere. Religion and life were, to him, identical. Every event of life he regarded religiously; that is, he conceived it as a disclosure of the Father's will and as indicative, therefore, of his further duty.

In this view of life's daily experiences every thing commonplace became luminous. All the artificial distinctions between men became absurd to him. There was no place for envy and covetousness of another's lot when he was vividly aware that God was speaking to him, through these common experiences of his at school, at home, in shop and street, on hillside and in temple, alone or with his twelve or surrounded by the multitude. Common things were linked together in a progressive design by the gradually unfolding purpose of God. So he moved onward step by step, now and then at pivotal crises halting to make special inquiry of his Father and receiving the reassuring word, "Thou art my beloved Son; I am well pleased in thee; thou hast read aright the meanings which I have spelled into thy circumstances; go forward and fear not."

The third affirmation upon which Jesus built his personal religion was that the Father's will was satisfied by loving service to fellowmen, nothing more and nothing less.

This was a brave risk to take in Jesus' day. It is a brave risk to take in our day. It is taking the world a long time to learn that the only way to reach God is through God's children. Even our modern creed tells us that the chief end of man is "to glorify God and to enjoy him forever," as if there were some direct way in which we could glorify God without serving his children. In olden times, before Jesus' day, they thought God loved the smell of burning bull's-flesh and so they made shambles of their temples. But a prophet came that way who told them that the Lord required them to "love mercy, to do justly and to walk humbly before God." Jesus of Nazareth took this teaching seriously. He found men trying to honor God by legal correctness in keeping the Sabbath and he told them that they dishonored God. God is honored by your using the Sabbath for the good of man, not merely by your keeping the Sabbath, he said.

He showed no respect for any form or ordinance or institution that assumed to honor God without performing some service to human life. The practical helpfulness of any such exercise he regarded as the test of its being commanded of God.

Human life was vividly conceived in the mind of Jesus. Man was the one important thing in the universe about which God cared. So Christ saw men, he felt men; he shared their griefs, their weaknesses, their shames, their sins, their aspirations, their blind gropings after the eternal. This vast world of people, children of God, souls born to everlasting life, with infinite capacities of pain and joy and growth, this is what Christ saw. And in the midst of this picture he saw the great God, his Father, moving among the children of men, bearing their burdens, carrying their sorrows, cleansing their sins, guiding their growth. He saw that God cared for men and women and little children and set store by no thing or ceremony or institution or even civilization itself, save as it could be used as an instrument of service to human life. He therefore took God's mission for his own mission, his Father's business became his life-task. No scribe could deflect him from his saving enterprise into an argument on the mere legalities of religion. The scribe thought God was very finical about being worshipped and served in a certain manner. But Jesus saw that love and brotherliness, the forgiving spirit and the coöperating will were the things that pleased God because they furthered God's main purpose of establishing his kingdom among men.

The fourth postulate underlying the religion of Jesus was that it is infinitely better to do God's will and seem to fail than to compromise the right in order to succeed. This conviction was the trouble-maker for the Son of God. It was his clinging to it that brought him to Calvary. At the outset of his ministry he defined this principle and planted it deep in his will. The temptation in the wilderness was simply the suggestion of the devil to realize his mission by investing his vast powers, of which he was now fully conscious, in a partnership with the world. "All these kingdoms I will give thee, if thou wilt only fall down and worship me. Do not be too idealistic. Do not be a purist. You have divine powers within yourself. Use common sense in exercising them. You can become a ruler of men, a Caesar; you can restore the lost glory of Israel. But you must use the politician's ways. The end, the goal, you have set yourself—to save your people—is good, is grand; but take heed and be not over-nice in your choice of means. Be practical. Your dream will not come true unless you compromise your ideal with the actual world that you hope to save."

This was Christ's constant temptation. Put behind him at the opening, it was vanquished at every crisis of his mission. Because the world is spiritual, because the reality in it is personal primarily, and not material or formal or legal, he discerned that an obscure, quiet, unambitious life, lived on the humble level of common humanity, counted for more to the man who lived it and to humanity and to God than a life gathering into its hands great power through a series of compromises with evil. This is what God's heart aches for more than for any other thing: that a common man should live the common life divinely and be conscious of its full value to himself, his fellows and his Father. If a man should live that way from dawn to the end of the day he would set going forces of salvation through the whole spiritual world which at last would level all false distinctions and preferments and establish brotherhood among men.

Therefore Jesus refused political honor, he refused the patronage of the social leaders of his time. The kingdom in which he would establish God's reign was not external like Caesar's. It was a kingdom of truth, that is, of true personal relationship amongst men. It had no external sign or blazonry. No trappings of rulership belonged to it. Its lot was service and its purple was the garment of a meek and quiet spirit. To be a citizen of this kingdom of God, to have a right to the communion of souls because one possesses the spiritual graces that make one at home with simple and sincere people, is the highest boon of life. But the price of citizenship here is purity of heart, hands that are undefiled with compromises and a conscience that cannot be deluded into believing that the purposes of God are ever advanced by doing any kind of wrong.

This is the religion of Jesus, the son of man. It is not a philosophy. It has no metaphysics in it. Its contents are not the stuff that creeds are made of. It is religion pure and essential. More than that, it is life, the one life that ever was and ever will be worth living.

THE TREND OF EVENTS

By Alva W. Taylor

"BETTER AN INSPIRATION OF OXYGEN THAN ALCOHOL."

Prof. Simon N. Patten of the University of Pennsylvania effectively answers Prof. Munsterberg of Harvard who recently defended liquor drinking in an article for McClure's Magazine, in a short, aphoristic article in Charities and the Commons for November 21. Prof. Munsterberg epitomized his case by saying, "Better is America inspired than America sober" and contended that drinking relieved the depression and monotony of life for masses and inspired them. Of course he did not defend drunkenness but drinking. Here are some of Prof. Patten's epigrams and arguments:

"If patient, plodding, everyday life cannot be harmonized with the courage and hopefulness of our best moments, there is an eternal discord that no argument or compromise can efface."

"Nothing is so tragic as the wasting of heroic endeavor in hopeless causes."

"Situations change with lightning-like rapidity; arguments die only of old age and are never so perfect as in the defense of a lost cause."

"I grant that inspiration is a nobler end than sobriety but at the same time I affirm that an inspiration of oxygen is better than an inspiration of alcohol."

"Why not then put days in the country instead of hours in the saloons?" "The rule of alcohol is broken when health is sought by expanding lungs, instead of drugging stomachs."

He argues that misery and suffering is mainly due to depletion and depression. Depletion is the running down of the human system and demands, not stimulation, but nourishment. Depression is due to the presence of something that has not been properly transformed and demands not stimulation but a better matabolism, more air in the lungs. The need is for stimulus, not stimulation. "The one is a physical tonic and the other a psychic motive." We need to go in nature's ways. "Civilization would advance more rapidly if we waited to see what nature is doing before we act."

NOT A "WAVE" NOR EVEN A "TIDE," BUT A CURRENT.

No day seems so poor as to bring no news of a temperance victory. Defeats must be expected, battles lost, but National Superintendent Baker coined the phrase that maks a battle-cry in saying: "This is not a battle but a war." Some time ago we read that the Kaiser had become a teetotaller, then that the King of England had ordered that his toast could be drunk in water instead of wine, then President-Elect Taft gets on the "water-wagon" and President Eliot reverses his attitude. Switzerland abolishes the making of absinthe by a huge majority in a referendum vote and Russia enacts more stringent laws for governmental control. The latest news is from Canada where Saskatchewan votes in favor of a local option law and Manitoba goes one-half "dry." New Zealand adds nine new electorates to the six that had already become "no-license" and the convening of the legislatures will doubtless bring new victories.

YUAN SHI KAI DEPOSED.

News comes from China that the powerful Yuan Shi Kai has been deposed and that his discharge was attended by danger to his person, which he escaped by claiming the protection of the British Consulate at Tienstin. He has been the chief minister of the Chinese court since the return of the Dowager Empress to power, and has been steadily for reform. The world was shocked at his summary dismissal and wondered if it could mean that the new regent, Prince Chun, was turning reactionary. The daughter of Kang Yui Wei, who is a pupil of Barnard College, suggests an explanation that all may well hope is the true one. She says that when her father, who was the inspirer of the Emperor's reform edicts, gathered the statesmen about him who were to make the New China all were pledged to secrecy but that Yuan told all to the Dowager. She immediately called together the conservative elder statesmen, deposed the Emperor and out of that reaction resulted the Boxer outbreak. For this betrayal of the late Emperor, Prince Chun, who is the late Emperor's brother, has sought to punish him. Yuan reaped as his reward his high position and the old Empress, seeing a great light, by his help inaugurated reforms in a less precipitous manner. Regent Chun, says the great reformer's daughter, and his advisor are reformers and she predicts that her father, on whose head the Dowager put a price, will soon be recalled from his well-known hiding place and will assist in making the New China, the father of which he really is.

TEACHING TO LIVE AND TO GET A LIVING.

Industrial education is coming into favor. Germany has almost universally adopted it. About a year ago a number of educators, public spirited manufacturers and progressive labor leaders met in Chicago and organized a Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education. A committee of ten was appointed to investigate and report plans. In the second meeting recently held in Atlanta, this committee formulated a number of suggestions rather than presenting any cut-and-dried schemes. They suggested that a department of Industrial Education be established at Washington to serve as a clearing house of ideas, to encourage the development of industrial schools, and to render practical aid to all efforts in that line. They also recommended that the effort be to establish industrial education in the present public schools without adding more to the curriculum but by substituting it for some less needed studies. The plan would be to give general instruction in the grammar grades and allow election of specific lines in the high schools. This would provide for the years of life between the grades and the time when the boys can take up practical work. The high school, with its academic course, does not appeal to many and they are left to idle for two or three years at the time when idleness is prolific as the devil's work shop. The compulsory education laws and the child labor laws too often leave this critical age in forcible idleness; the lad cannot go to work and he is not willing to go to high school. The industrial school appeals to him. Indeed, there is never any trouble about attendance, discipline or devotion to the task in the manual training classes, for it is creative and fits the demands of the boy nature. Here is a clue to true education in following the lines of interest. The Committee further would encourage teaching of rudiments of agriculture in the rural schools and the extension of industrial night schools in the cities for workers. To these night schools the ambitious and efficient young workers come to learn the science of their craft and to progress in its art.

REDEEMING THE TRUANT.

Good pedagogy studies the nature of the child and creates a discipline for his benefit instead of putting all children through a sort of mill of academic lore. China has done the latter successfully for centuries, but America lives for the future rather than the past. Yet even we cling to medieval "classics" as if they were God-given and inspired for the sake of education. The modern truant school has to deal with an extreme case and in its efforts to devise adequate remedy proves a good rule for all cases. It finds the "incorrigible" truant a boy of positive character, and in all but few cases, that that positive cast, which makes it possible for him to be bad in spite of coercive measures, is a splendid asset for good once it is put in the right current of habit. To do this it keeps him busy at an interesting task; it finds his natural creative instincts and directs them to the construction of useful objects; it trains him as a workman and a citizen, not merely to become one at some future date. Here again industrial education comes to the fore. It is not impossible that "system" is responsible for many of these truants. They possess too much individuality to conform. The oft repeated formula for the best education, viz., "Mark Hopkins on the other end of a log," is lost in modern system. There is a strong suspicion that Germany is pedagogically crystallizing in the shell of a system. We ought to put as much thought on the good boy as the bad one and we should perhaps have fewer bad ones.

PROGRESS IN THE CONQUEST OF THE WORLD.

The past year has been one of notable triumphs in the world-wide conquest of Christian missions. Statistics are usually considered dry enough but we could arouse in ourselves the most feverish interest in a column of figures that meant a new-found fortune for us. These figures ought to be very interesting to Christians because they are clothed with the romance of missionary adventure, the tragedy of missionary sacrifice, and are dramatic with a calling together of the peoples of the earth as are none other that the times present.

The increase in Protestant church members at home last year was one and one-half per cent; that of the missions on foreign fields, twelve per cent. The 141,000 ministers at home can report a gain of two apiece to the home churches, while the missionaries, if their wives are not counted, can report a gain of eleven for each worker. In all there were 165,000 added to the churches on mission fields last year and the total Christian body there now amounts to 4,300,000, about one-half of whom are admitted to the inner fellowship of the churches.

There are now engaged in this work 19,900 white missionaries and nearly 100,000 natives are employed in all capacities as assistants. This is a mighty army and it is doubtful if the world ever saw so many devoted souls enlisted in a task requiring an equal amount of unselfish consecration. They have established 41,600 stations and places of work, teach 1,300,000 pupils in their schools, care for multitudes in their hospitals, run printing presses, translate books, preach to millions, and in their multifarious work do all things for all men.

The total income for this stupenduous task was last year $29,700,000, of which nearly $5,000,000 was contributed on the field. When a comparison is made between the income of these mission Christians and that of ours at home it will be seen that their liberality makes ours look beggarly.

America sends 6,600 missioners and gives $10,000,000 to the cause. Great Britain sends 8,300 to the field and gives $9,265,000. Continental Europe sends 2,300 and gives $1,650,000. America is more prolific in money and Britain in men. Britain gave a few thousands last year less than the year before but sent thirty per cent more men. America contributed $600,000 of the total increase of three-quarters of a million in income and increased her year's quota of new workers by 15 per cent.

The following table shows the contributions of the great Christian bodies of the United States and Canada:

M. E. (North)	$2,487,000	Bap. (South)	435,000
Presby. (North)	1,643,000	Disciples of Christ	413,000
Congregationalist	1,102,000	Presby. (South)	364,000
Bap. (North)	1,050,000	M. E. (Canadian)	321,000
Episcopalian	781,000	Christ. & Miss. Alliance	258,000
M. E. (South)	540,000	Presby. (Canadian)	234,000
United Presby.	484,000

The great British Societies contributed as follows:

Church Missionary Society	$2,175,000
Wesleyan Methodist	1,745,000
Society for Propagation of Gospel	1,063,000
United Free Church of Scotland	1,044,000
London Missionary Society	977,000
Chinese Inland Mission	478,000
Baptist Society	470,000

The contribution of the great religious bodies of America and Great Britain were as follows:

Methodist	$5,629,000	Baptist	2,582,000
Presbyterian	4,950,000
Episcopal	4,523,000	Congregationalist	2,079,000

The missionary host is distributed as follows:

India	5,800	Mohammedan Lands	1,450
Africa	4,800	Japan and Korea	1,350
All Americas	2,950	Oceania	600
China	2,750	Europe	300

Each minister at home would have 600 souls to his care were parishes made so none overlapped. On the foreign field there are 600,000 to every white missionary. Twenty thousand is a great host of workers but 1,200,000,000 is a multitude like unto the sands of the sea for numbers. This is the most far reaching enterprise in an epoch that will be known by its world-movements. The harvest is ready; the sicklers are few.

"We're Coming Up To Pittsburg."

BY L. O. THOMPSON.

We're coming up to Pittsburg a great and mighty throng;
We're coming up united a hundred thousand strong.

We're coming up from Nashville, from Cincinnati, too;
From Lexington, St. Louis, from Chicago not a few.

Take down that ugly scare-crow and let this clamor cease;
We're coming up to Pittsburg and coming up in peace.

We're coming up to Pittsburg this our centennial year.
We're coming up united, "All hail and do not fear."

We want to hear our Willett, our Lord and Garrison.
Dan Somer, Bell, Dowling and Rowe, (all we still are one.)

Take down that ugly scare-crow and bid this wrangling cease;
We're coming up to Pittsburg and coming up in peace.

We're coming up to Pittsburg, from the islands of the sea.
We are a mighty people and have a mighty plea.

We're coming up in triumph, with songs of victory;
To pay a fitting tribute to the ones that set us free.

Take down that ugly scare-crow, and bid the clamor cease;
We're coming up to Pittsburg and coming up in peace.

We're coming up to Pittsburg, and spread a merry feast;
We're coming up united and in the name of Christ.

Our plea is Christian union, thus let it ever be;
We've broke the bands that bound us and are a people free.

Take down that ugly scare-crow and bid this clamor cease;
We're coming up to Pittsburg and coming up in peace.
Londonville, O.

The Good God and a Sad World

The biggest question the soul asks is probably that concerning the relation of God the Creator to the evil of his universe. Given a good God, how shall we justify him for making a world with any evil in it at all? How can we defend him in the presence of suffering and injustice and death? We are not responsible for being here. We cannot save ourselves from the pain of living. Some may be able to add up the joys of life in one column and the griefs and pains of life in another and prove that there is more joy in living than grief—and thus justify God.

But not all of us can reckon in this mathematical way with our experience. And besides, if we could, who would dare to say that in the cases of some the balance would not be on the other side? And if there be so much as one soul whom God has made and whose lot brings more loss than gain, then what of the justice of God?

The problem gets especial point in the searching crises of personal experience, as when a dear one on whom we leaned falls on death, or a little child, the knotting place of all our hopes, is taken away, or a business project fails, carrying our all with it—then the heart asks, Why? and often cannot find an answer.

A great cateclysm of nature involving in its ruin the lives of thousands of our fellows starts the question in the universal soul. Certainly such an event as the Sicilian earthquake cannot be traced to human responsibility in any way. Much injustice and suffering man could avoid if he were more thoughtful and temperate and just. But Jesus himself taught us to look elsewhere than in the character of the individual for the causes of certain large classes of woe and pain. "Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents, that he was born blind"—he answered his disciples who after the philosophy of their time and their sacred book traced misfortune to some sin. "Think you that they upon whom the tower in Siloam fell were sinners above all that dwelt at Jerusalem? I tell you nay." Thus he answered the question of the relation of sin and suffering.

Who will say that the dwellers in Sicily were sinners above the dwellers in Calcutta or Chicago? Evidently no such naive explanation is possible. The good are not always protected from suffering; the bad do not always receive in material physical misfortune the just penalties of their sin. We must search elsewhere if we shall have our problem solved.

Certain old Greek philosophers had an interesting way of getting out of the problem. They said the man of self-control would not allow himself to suffer. He would live above the vicissitudes of circumstance and find his satisfactions in philosophic contemplation. He would be neither glad nor sad, but wise. Good fortune or ill, he would take it all in the day's work and let it go at that. He would find neither pleasure nor pain in the senses, but in the mind. Therefore his counsel was to steel the heart against both pleasure and pain. These men were the Stoics of that day, of whom Socrates, though not theoratically one of them, was in his practice a splendid illustration.

The superiority of Jesus, our Master, to the sages who preceeded him is disclosed in his attitude toward pain. He was keenly alive to it. He is the man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Match Jesus' death with Socrates'. The one sitting in cool, balanced reflection and discoursing philosophically on the soul's immortality; the other sweating drops of blood in the garden and falling helpless under the weight of the cross! There was an exquisiteness about Jesus' suffering. His face was more marred than any man's. His fine nature lent itself to a pain more keen than a common soul could have felt. Truly in him the old philosophy of Job's comforters and the Stoics finds its absolute denial.

No doubt it is a hard question we have asked our hearts. Has it ever occurred to us, however, that it is a fictitious problem, a made-up question that theologians have perplexed their heads with and suffering hearts have been broken over? This is an abrupt thing to suggest, perhaps. But it seems to us that there is a point of view which, if we are able to take it, will cause such problems to fade out. They may not be solved but they will be dissolved. There are two or three truths we must bear in mind, truths we have so recently learned that the full force of their bearing has not yet been felt in our vital experience.

The first of these truths is that the world in which we live is an unfinished world. The conception of the world as having been created in six days by a God who thereupon departed into a long Sabbath's rest has such a hold upon our imagination that until we consciously shake it off and substitute for it Jesus' conception our hearts will be caused no end of trouble. Jesus said, God is still working as I am working. The whole world, says Paul, groans and travails together in the birth pangs of the sons of God and the ideal social order. The world has not been made yet. It is in process even now. God has not retired from it to rest, but is in the midst of it to finish and perfect it. It has imperfections in it—moral imperfections, physical imperfections. Natural processes and forces and provisions from primeval and primitive aeons lap over into the present. Wicked men with volcanic passions are no more truly a survival of a prior stage of development than are uncontrolled physical forces which break through the crust of the earth and wreak havoc upon the children of men.

If we are convinced that the world is a growing, unfinished world and if we take this conviction seriously into our heart-life as well as our intellect, we shall find ourselves in possession of a principle by which our experience can be interpreted without danger of falling into the pocket of traditional theodicy. If once we think of God as really in his world, in every point of it, and as actually working all the time to finish and perfect it, we shall have a starting point at least for a simpler interpretation of pain than we can have on the traditional premises.

A further consideration for our hearts is that the world's end and character are not fatally determined but remain to be defined by God and man working and thinking together. This idea, at its first suggestion, may shock our feelings and seem to uproot the motives for conduct. But the longer it is dwelt on the more stimulating it becomes to believe that our conception of the world and our conduct in the world are real factors in defining what kind of a world it shall be. The faith that this is so lays upon us men a responsibility which we cannot feel if we assume, as many do, that things are coming out all right anyhow. The truth is that things are not coming out alright anyhow. They are coming out all right if you and I do our duty, if we have wide vision and firm purpose and make sacrifices. Man shares in the creating as well as the creation. He is co-worker with God. That this glorious fact should be true involves defect in the work. There will be flaws. There will be misfits because of man's clumsiness. There will, therefore, be pain.

But such reflections as these do not quite give our hearts courage to suffer in hope. Where is the guarantee of the worth of such a world? An unfinished world, an unfated world, and therefore a suffering world—how may we be assured that it will be worth the suffering? It is a vast price to pay! The age long heart-ache of man, the wars and bloodshed, the accidents, the hates, the injustice, the crying of women, the bruising of little children, the perennial death with its groans and its tears and its silence—who knows that the world will be worth this sadness when it is finished?

God knows! And he certifies his knowledge to suffering men by suffering with them! He sits not off serenely on a throne removed from us while hosts of angels burn incense to him and chant his glory. He is a dust-covered God, a working God, a burden-bearing God—aye, a heart-broken God. In the struggle of men, his sons, he struggles more than they. In the sorrows of women, his daughters, he suffers more than they. In the earthquake God loses with men, and more than men.

If it pays the great God, whose anguish in creating the world must be infinitely deeper than man's, to bear his suffering for the sake of perfecting the world, then we men have here our guarantee that all the anguish of our human life will work out for us an exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

This is the glory of Jesus, that he disclosed the heart of God to us—a heart of love, of pity, a heart bleeding from the foundation of the world.

Paragraphic Editorials

Professor T. M. Iden, of Emporia Kan., has long been the leader and teacher of a club of young men, called the "Upper Room." It was organized first in Butler College, during his professorship there, and has grown during his stay in Emporia, until it now numbers not only the local membership of about 500, but a world constituency which is devoted and loyal to the interests of the "Upper Room." Indeed it is now proposed to erect a structure for the accommodation of this large class. Professor Iden sends out an annual letter at the close of the year, and no one who receives this message, which for the present year covers twenty-six printed pages, can fail to feel the uplifting power of the words of this consecrated man, who is both brother and father to these young men, now, many of them approaching maturity of life and living wherever energetic and successful Americans find their way throughout the world. We know of no nobler work than this which Professor Iden is accomplishing through the ministry of tne "Upper Room."

We are perhaps overconscious of our virtue in restraining our editorial impulses to write a bit on the theme of believing anything you like so long as you do not say anything to anybody about it. This, we understand, is the twaddling philosophy that has been conjured up from the hard-pressed brain of a certain editor to make an appearance of justifying his employer's recent wanton invasion of the liberty that Christ has given us. If the brethren knew how strong our desire is to "say something" they would canonize us as editorial saints we are sure. But we have started to take the Foreign Missionary collection and while we are helping to pass the sacred plate it is our earnest prayer that we may not be compelled to stop half way down the aisle to attend to the brother who, after an absence of over ten years has come to church today to make a disturbance. Nevertheless, if we restrain our own utterance we feel like giving the statement of Dr. J. H. Garrison to our readers. It has the value of being both pointed and harmless, and if we quote it instead of saying something ourselves we are being perfectly consistent, are we not? in our determination to give our Cincinnati brother the last word in the controversy. Certainly the sullen mutterings of the man in the back pew will not call for any further attention from those who are taking and making the Missionary offering.

Here is what we found in the Christian Evangelist of last week.

"It will not do to say that a man is entitled to liberty of opinion, but he must keep his opinions to himself, for that would often be a great wrong to the public. We must have liberty of speech, as well as of thought, but liberty of speech must be held and exercised subject to unity in faith and charity in all things. In other words, liberty is not to be made a cloak for producing schism. That would be to violate the law of unity, and the law of love. It would be a poor sort of liberty that only allowed a man to think but never tell his brethren the results of his thinking. There are at least two good reasons why he should declare his conclusion on any subject of importance. The first is, if his opinion is right, others ought to have the benefit of it. The second is, if it is wrong, he is entitled to have it corrected by others; and in either case it is through the expression of opinions, even when they differ, that truth is elicited.

That was a revealing moment in our ministerial fellowship in Chicago when after an absence of nearly three months Rev. C. G. Kindred come into the circle again, almost as one raised from the dead. He had believed the ailment from which he suffered was fatal. One chance in a hundred, some doctors had told him, for him to recover. His brother ministers had been led to expect the worst and his congregation with agitated hearts had gathered—one hundred and fifty of them—at the hour of his operation to beseech God's gracious guidance and mercy. Mr. Kindred came back to his congregation two weeks ago and to the minister's meeting last week. He told us of the hour before his operation in which he had been left utterly alone, at his own request, to face God. The Bible was the pillow of his heart in that hour. The seventeenth chapter of John and the second epistle of Peter were especially precious. And heaven seemed near and the gate of it ajar. But God spared him to his family, his church and the city in which he counts for so much. Some had been talking about the sacrifices a Chicago pastor made. But Mr. Kindred said, "I make no sacrifices by being in Chicago. To be loved by my people and by you is a boon so rich as to pass calculation."

Our Lord's Prayer For Unity

By Vernon Stauffer

Let us begin to say it with emphasis and without equivocation, no matter what rebukes it administers, no matter what traditions it overturns, no matter what shibboleths it repudiates, nor what creeds and party standards it flings into the dust: Jesus Christ meant a unity visible and invisible, vital and external, organic and spiritual, outward as well as inward. The world was to see it and to feel it and to be convinced by it. Because of it, where every other appeal failed, the unbelieving world was to respond to the challenge of Jesus: "Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me: or else believe me for the very work's sake." What else can his words mean: "That they may be perfected into one that the world may know that thou didst send me, and lovedst them, even as thou lovedst me"? All too long we have been making our apologies and drawing out our fine distinctions between "spiritual unity" and structural unity;" between "an invisible oneness" and "an incidental non-conformity." The world mocks at apologies, and confesses itself hopelessly muddled over the fine distinctions. With entire appropriateness did Dr. Goodchild represent that skeptical, scoffing world standing, listening to our vociferous affirmations that we are not divided, and answering with Emerson: "What you do speaks so loud that I cannot hear what you say?"

Are the words with which Principal Fairbairn closed his magnificent volume on The Place of Christ in Modern Theology too hard for us to hear?

"It were to affirm no paradox, but rather a position capable of the clearest historical proof [said he], were we to maintain that the higher the theory of the church the meaner the conception of God, or that the growth of high church doctrine is always coincident with the decay of the highest theistic belief. For an absolute or infallible church means a limited God, a God whose working men condition, whose mercies they circumscribe, whose grace they regulate and distribute. Their limitations are imposed on him; his attributes are not transmuted into their energies. They but repeat on a larger scale the sin of Israel—God belongs to their church rather than their church to God. . . . For the more worthily churches think of God, the more will they feel the fallibility of their popes and pastors; the more they are possessed with the faith of his sufficiency, the less will they build on the idea of their own; the more infinitely good and gracious he seems, the less will they be able to claim to be his sole and adequate representatives. The virtue of a church does not differ from the virtue of a man: all are but earthen vessels, even though they be vessels that bear the treasure of the Lord."

From this unworthy, ignoble love of church (I speak not of the body of the Lord) God grant we may be speedily delivered! To the passion of bringing a lost world to faith in Christ, God grant we may be as speedily and effectually committed!

Of the bearing of this divine prayer for unity upon the important and inviting theme of the authority of Christ, all this I pass over in silence, that I may come to the plain and impressive implication of the passage with respect to the office of prayer in bringing about the consumation for which the Master himself prayed. We go back again to that sacred presence-chamber. The heart of the great Master is burdened for the welfare of his kingdom after he shall have passed into the heavens. As nothing else, he fears the danger of schism. Above everything else, he desires that his church may be preserved in perfect unity. And what does he do? Does he talk with his disciples about it, earnestly admonishing them, laying down for them a programme, marking out for them a method? Nay, he meets the great subject with prayer! For him, our Lord and Master, this is the first thing, the most immediate duty, the most practical and effective method by which to attain to the desired result. He has given us an example. Oh, for the fulness of faith, the completeness of devotion, to apprehend its tremendous import! Shall we say it today:

Hushed be the noise and the strife of the schools,
Volume and pamphlet, sermon and speech,
The lips of the wise and the prattle of fools:
Let the Son of man teach!
Who has the key of the future but He?
Who can unravel the knots of the skein?
We have groaned and have travailed and sought to be free:
We have travailed in vain!
Bewildered, dejected, and prone to despair,
To Him, as at first, do we turn and beseech.
Our ears are all open: "Give heed to our prayer!
O Son of man, teach!"

Ah, he will give heed soon enough when we are ready for the lesson. And has not the time now fully come for us to turn to him and let him show us the way to do the thing which we desire but know not how to bring to pass? Despite all the methods we have tried—fraternal conferences, campaigns of union evangelism, the federation of churches, the exchange of pulpits—none will deny that the movement toward unity still waits for the really powerful impulse that shall give it irresistible momentum and speedily carry it forward to a triumphant issue. In view of that which Jesus did in the upper room, it were well worth while for us to consider whether prayer, secret, individual, congregational, universal prayer, is not now church's first great duty and resource. "In the last analysis the source of power of any spiritual movement is God, and the energies of God are released in answer to prayer." More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of. If the whole church, feeling at least in some small sense the necessity of unity as Christ felt it, should give itself to prayer, to prayer as a passion, as an entreaty, as the utter engulfment of the will in the great achievement, prayer that fulfils Coleridge's conception:

> An affirmation and an act
> That bids eternal truth be fact!

who shall say what blessed results might not quickly follow? Where is the ministry of prayer on this behalf magnified as it ought to be? Where are the strong cryings and tears? Where are the ceaseless supplications and the blood-sweat intercessions? It is our shame that we are leaving to the last that which by divine precept and example ought to have come first. Brethren and fathers! The cause of Christian unity drags itself painfully forward today because the church is not possessed by the spirit of prayer on behalf of the great end! In the last analysis, Christian unity will come, as every work of God comes, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord. To have the mind of Christ is to make the solution of the problem immediately inevitable. Somehow, in some way, we must see to it that there is lifted upon the soul of every follower of Christ the vision of that scene in the upper room: the Master in the midst of his disciples, praying with impassioned yearning that all who believe in him may be one that the world may know that God sent him into the world and loves the world even as he is loved of God. Thrilled by that vision the church will enter upon a ministry of supplication and intercession because of which it shall see the travail of its soul, and be satisfied!

The Sin of the Heresy-Hunter

By Harry F. Burns

The sin of the heretic is nonconformity. What shall we say of the heresy-hunter? If nonconformity is a sin, then heresy-hunting, which is an effort to secure conformity of opinion, should be classed with the virtues. But if we concede the right of the individual to think, though his conclusions may not always conform to accepted statements, then heresy-hunting must be placed under a different category.

The distinction between conservatism and heresy-hunting must be borne in mind. The former is the natural attitude of many minds towards change, and is of great value in society. The latter is an attack upon what is with other minds a natural attitude toward life, an attitude which also has its place in social progress. The peculiarity of the heresy-hunter is not that he holds certain views about religious teachings, but that he aggressively attacks those who hold different views.

The heresy-hunter does not hesitate to destory, so far as he can, the reputation of a brother preacher, who may, perchance, differ from him on some of the teachings of the faith. The unbrotherliness of this procedure has been presented in these pages, not many weeks since. It is a denial of the spirit of brotherliness, even between members of the same religious body. It is a sin against the nonconformity brother, but one which he can endure because of the vitality and strength of his faith. Nor will the truth for which he stands be defeated by such treatment. Indeed, if it be the truth, it will grow the more rapidly. But the real sufferer from the attack is the church or college with which the nonconforming brother is associated. This evil against the college or the church is accomplished by the working of the law of suggestion. The method is simple. Here is a picture which fairly describes what has occurred in many churches within the last few years.

One of the most promising young men of one of our colleges, upon his graduation, determines to continue his studies in a "denominational" seminary, or a great university. He wants to preach. But he wants his life to result in the greatest possible service to the cause of Christ. He accordingly resists the temptation to go to work at once, and spends three or four years in further study. Upon graduation from the University he is called to a prominent church. He sets about the work with enthusiasm, and with an earnest desire to render the largest service to his church and the community. He is aware that while he has at much effort acquainted himself with the results of the best scholarship of his day, that his business as a preacher is not to correct people's scientific and philosophical views, but to strengthen their faith, and to build them up in the Christ-life. Because this young man has gone deep into the truths of the religious life, he is able to supply the spiritual hunger of his hearers. He brings forth from his treasure house "things both old and new." Because he has come to understand the truth himself he does not always use the same words which his fathers in the ministry used, and perhaps does not always emphasize the same things which they emphasized. By many of his congregation, the freshness and vigor of his thought and style are especially enjoyed. The young man is attracting people who have not usually attended church. Audiences are increasing, the church is in every way taking on new life, and the discouraged officers begin to take heart again. The church is harmonious and happy. But one day a heresy-hunter strays into the fold. He inquires about the work of the new preacher and is surprised to find everyone so well pleased. Then he suggests to some of his acquaintances in the congregation that the young man is from a school where Higher Criticism is taught, and that the officers of the church should be on their guard, lest this young man be teaching heresy, and especially lest he "poison" the minds of the young.

Our heresy-hunter may have held some large meetings and, in his way, accomplished a good work for the church. On this account his suggestion has greater weight. Next Sunday morning this member who was before in sympathy with the preacher, sits in the pew suspecting the preacher of "Higher Criticism"—a something which he would hardly know how to define, but he knows it has a bad name. He is not in position to be helped by the preacher's work. He will not let the sermon get at him. He looks for the symptoms of heresy. He of course finds what he looks for, before many Sundays have passed. He tells others of his suspicion. Other heresy-hunters are busy with the church membership. Some of the people are reading a religious journal which devotes columns each week to attacks upon Higher Criticism and heretics. The young preacher, it is found, is friendly toward some of these heretics. He feels the estrangement of these members of his flock, but does not know the cause. If he knew, he could not take these people through all the study necessary to settle the questions that have been raised. The suspicious members talk together. The preacher is conscious of the lack of harmony. He tries harder than ever to make the work go, but can not undo what has been done by the heresy-hunter. The tares have been sown, and now can not be rooted up without destroying much of the wheat. He could endure to be misunderstood, and the unbrotherliness of the preacher who caused the trouble; but he can not endure to see the work of the church suffer. He feels that the only way to restore harmony is for him to resign. This he does, at the expense of his reputation. But the church suffers under short pastorates. Who is at fault? Who is the sinner? The sin of the heresy-hunter is not alone against the brother preacher, whose reputation is injured, whose work is hindered, but it is against the church. The church is the greater sufferer. Many changes in pastorates can be traced to the heresy-hunter's door, whose interest in his peculiar point of view is greater than his interest in the church. The sin of the heresy-hunter, then, is not only unbrotherliness, but disloyalty to the church and a dishonor to Christ.

A Plea for the Christian Life

(From Prof. T. M. Iden's "Upper Room" Letter.)

Christianity does not stop with justice, it requires mercy. It says: "Do more, go farther than mere fairness demands, farther than the moral law requires." It calls for something more than fair play and the square deal. It goes two miles when the law requires but one. It gives the cloak also when judgment for the coat only is rendered. It does more than seek to restore, it makes amends. It loves its enemies and returns good for evil. It gives prayer for hatred, and forgiveness for malice and cruelty. It does not ask, "Will it pay to be good? How much will you give me to do right?" It does not say, "I will do as much for you as you will do for me, love you as long as you will return my affection." It does not have the commercial, bargaining spirit. It bears the burdens of the weak. It reserves judgment of others, but examines itself. In lowliness of mind it "esteems others better than itself." In honor it "prefers one another." It serves, even to the extent of being "all things to all men in order that it may win some" to a better life. It denies itself for others' sake. It refrains from meat if the eating of it cause a brother to stumble. It lends a hand. It helps. It does everything through love. Is Christianity a rare thing in the world? You must answer that question for yourself. I hope it is not. A question more to the point is: "Am I myself a living manifestation of its spirit?"

The little plant has grown in 100 years to be a great tree. India, China, Japan, Africa and the Islands of the Sea are seeking shelter in its branches, and they will not be denied.

Abraham's Sacrifice of Isaac

By Rev. David Smith, Author of "In the Days of His Flesh."

Whatever difficulties it may present, the story is sublime. The heroism and pathos of it send a thrill through one's heart, and the man who scoffs at it may have a critical intellect, but he has also a prosaic mind; and he has certainly not a judicial intellect, for he circumscribes the area and excludes facts which are essential to a just verdict. He forgets that the incident occurred nearly 4,000 years ago. Of course, we stumble at the story. It was, according to our notions, a monstrous thing that Abraham attempted. And the main difficulty is that the Lord commanded it. Nowadays, if a man bound his son and lifted a knife to slay him, he would be arrested as a murderous criminal; and, if he pleaded that he had done it at the command of God, he would be accounted a lunatic. Yet this is precisely what Abraham did. The difficulty disappears if we grasp the principle of the progressiveness of Revelation. This is an essential factor in the case, and it is unjudicial to leave it out. Abraham lived at the very dawn of Revelation, and many things were then believed and practised which are now shocking to the moral sense developed by centuries of divine discipline. Human sacrifice was a religious institution, and it persisted long; it was hardly eradicated from the Roman Empire. His first-born son was a man's most precious possession, and was accounted the most acceptable sacrifice he could offer to his God. It was nothing unusual, nothing abhorrent to the moral sense of his generation, that Abraham did when he bound Isaac and laid him on the altar. And what suggested the sacrifice? It may be said that the Lord commanded it; but then the Lord does not speak, nor did He speak then, by a voice from Heaven. He speaks to men through their experience. And it was through his experience that He spoke to Abraham. After the birth of Isaac Abraham had, in deference to Sarah and in the interests of domestic peace, perpetuated a cruel wrong, not merely removing Hagar and Ishmael from his tent, but turning them adrift, like wandered beasts, to perish in the desert. When he had watched them wandering away and disappearing over the horizon, he would heave a sigh of relief. It had been a painful business, but it was ended, and he had seen the last of it. And, indeed, he never saw the wanderers again, but his sin haunted him like a malignant ghost; and now, when Isaac is some six years of age, as we gather, his remorse becomes intolerable and demands expiation. Abraham had expelled Ishmael to make room for Isaac, and now there is no fitting atonement but the sacrifice of Isaac. It is thus that men are ever haunted by their sin. The prize which they have sinned to gain becomes a thing accursed, and they would gladly surrender it to get back the peace which they have forfeited. This is the pathos of the story. It shows us a man haunted by his sin and endeavoring to shake it off, to cut, as it were, the poison out of his flesh at the cost of sore and cruel anguish. It was a brave sacrifice. The promise hung on Isaac, and his death was, according to all human reckoning, the forfeiture of the splendid future whereof God had spoken. Yet Abraham would put himself right with God at all costs, even a cost like that; and he clung, with a grand defiance of reason, to the faith that God would find a way of fulfilling His promise (cf. Heb. xi. 17-19). The incident taught him two truths which constituted a far advance in the progress of Revelation: (1) He learned that the Lord did not desire human sacrifices—the truth which the Prophet Micah proclaimed with indignant emphasis in after days (vi. 7-8). (2) He learned the true and only expiation. He would have atoned for his cruelty to Ishmael by slaying Isaac, but this would have been simply a second wrong and a further mutilation of his life. The only possible atonement was not the death of Isaac, but the service of his consecrated life. This is Sacrifice—not death but consecration, the taking of our broken lives to the altar and the glory of God. What the arrested sacrifice on Moriah suggested, the finished Sacrifice on Calvary proclaims. Christ has reckoned with the past, and He bids us leave it with Him and neither mourn over it or attempt vainly to undo it, but consecrate ourselves forthwith to the service of God and live henceforward to His glory.—British Weekly.

Book Review

Acts, by George Holley Gilbert, New York. The Macmillan Co., 1908, pp. 262, $ .75 net.

This is one of the first volumes of a new set of commentaries, called, "The Bible for Home and School," edited by Shailer Mathews. Its appearance is timely, for the International Sunday-school Lessons for the entire year are found in the Books of Acts. Among the commentaries from which one has now to choose are the small and useful "Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges," which however lacks up-to-dateness in a number of respects, chiefly its use of the authorized texts, and its conformity to a scheme of commentation now rather outgrown. The International Critical Commentary is for this generation the most complete and satisfactory, but its volume on Acts has not yet appeared. Then there is the "Expositor's Bible," which is by no means of uniform quality, and whose two volumes on the Book of Acts by Professor Stokes are hardly to be compared with the stronger books of the series.

Professor Gilbert has put into remarkably small compass the essential features of the Book of Acts. In the introduction he discusses the character of the work, the author and date of composition, and the historical value of the book, adding a list of the best works on the subject, and a table of approximate dates for the apostolic age. The commentary is full enough to serve the purpose of any teacher or student, and it has the unusual merit of considering the more difficult rather than the merely obvious features of the text. Full justice is done to recent criticism of the Book of Acts, and the reasons for accepting the Lucan authorship and the general trustworthiness of the work as a background for the Epistles of Paul are presented. Appendices upon such important topics as the Holy Spirit in Acts, Speaking with Tongues, the community of goods at Jerusalem, etc., are included at the end of the volume.

On the whole, Professor Gilbert's little commentary is the most serviceable work now available for the average student of the Book of Acts.

A. McLean's New Book Free

Our proposal to give a copy of A. McLean's new book on "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher" with each new subscription of $1.50 has proved so attractive that we have decided to continue it beyond the date (January 2), which we had set for its expiration. During January the offer will hold good. Ministers may have the paper (new subscription), and the book for $1.20.

YOUR OWN PAPER FREE

FOR A LITTLE WORK.

Any minister (who is not in arrears to us) can have his subscription date set ahead one year by sending us 2 New Yearly Subscriptions with $3.00. This applies to ministers who are not now subscribers as well as to those who are.

BALANCING THE BOOKS.

Every good business man strives to have his accounts square by the end of the year. In doing so he should no more overlook his standing with the Lord than with the grocer or the landlord. Among the affairs of God's Kingdom he should be equally careful to see that each has received its just consideration. What have you done for Ministerial Relief in the year 1908? What has your church done?

For us it is not only the end of the year but the end of a hundred years. It is only for the last few of these that the work of Ministerial Relief has been organized. There are a few churches of Christ that have faithfully made an offering to it every one of these years. The great majority have not yet given the work even one recognition. Are you willing to let the century close and the Centennial celebration be held with such an unequal record against your congregation?

While we have been neglecting this holy work, one after another of those who should have been cheered and helped by its ministry have been called away from our ungrateful disregard. Let us praise God that many of them yet remain with us, and let us gladly make such an offering this year as will not only justify our affection and relieve their distress, but will be a worthy Centennial memorial of those to whom we can no longer minister in the flesh.

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

The City and the Country

THE CITY

The Correspondent:—"After my brief visit to your mighty metropolis I am back again to my quiet and restful country home. The change suits me. Although I was raised in the city I could not now be induced to take up my abode again there. It may be that because I am growing old I have become wedded to the accustomed and to the quiet; but I think the real reason is quite different and deeper.

The city with its vast numbers, with its ceaseless noise and bustle, with its gigantic sky-scrapers, with its superlative alertness and extreme inquietude in business, with its dress and pomp, overwhelms me with astonishment.

I could be astonished and still enjoy it.

But in looking closer to the life of the city I find myself greatly perplexed. There is dark mystery hanging over its throng ceaselessly moving to and fro. Their faces are anxious faces. Their nerves are strained. Where did they all come from? I suppose they have gathered to this seething center from every country and clime—I suppose ten thousand mothers have wept over these who have broken the old home ties. 'How do they all live?' has been asked countless times; but to me it is still unanswered. To me there is a mystery about every building and every face. There are the mansions of the rich, the clubs and many other exclusive places that I may not enter. But for that matter every place where breathing people live is fraught with the mystery of tragedy and comedy.

Mystery and Injustice of the City.

The friends in the country live in the open. We can somewhat measure their souls; but in the city the people are protected from us by convention, and then their number is so great, that, do the best we may to explore, we are always entering the region of mystery. Although I grant I am greedy to know the motives and movements of my kind, yes, I have a sort of a Sherlock Homes eagerness to unravel human complications and perplexities; yet I could endure the mystery of the city. Again the injustice of the city is everywhere apparent. The palace and the ash barrel with an orphan boy in it; the ten-dollar meal with the rarest wine and the dirty morsel snatched from a refuse can; the seal skins and the rummage-sale garment; the thousands made in an hour and the pittance only made in a year; the large profits of a few and the no profits of the many, these are contrasts the injustice of which are apparent to kindergarten students of economics and Christianity's doctrine of brotherhood. The poor people surprise me with their patience. However, I could endure even the injustice of the city. It is the immorality of the teaming centers that most oppresses me. Life here is cheap. Physical life is eaten up by the mills of men that grind quick and mercilessly; but the life of the soul seems cheaper. It is bartered away for death. In the seven thousand saloons in Chicago is written the text that wise men discovered to be true thousands of years before it was a text, 'the soul that sinneth it shall die.' And if there be a text more terrible in its threatenings of awful punishment to the sinner it is written in the unnumbered brothels of the city.

Do not misunderstand me. Distorting as the revolting sin of a great city is to me I could endure the sin, be it as loathsome as can be imagined. What then, you ask, is it about the city I could not endure? Perhaps you are saying, "If he could endure the noise, the business, the hurry, the injustice and the sin he surely ought to endure anything. It is this that would drive me wild—my own helplessness.

I could endure the noise and hurry—if I could calm it even a little.

I could endure the injustice if by any judicial or frantic procedure of my own I could in the least ease oppression's hand.

I could even be in the midst of sin all day and every day if I could replace profanity by reverence, drunkenness with sobriety or immorality with purity.

But the irresponsiveness of the city would kill me. How long would John have cried in the desert without success? Unlike thousands of city workers Job was finally successful. I repeat I could not endure my own helplessness amidst the vast and crying need of the city.

Hence I live and rest and enjoy and serve in my happy country neighborhood."

THE COUNTRY.

It was my good fortune to grow up with the flowers, the weeds, the birds and the bumble bees of the country. With palpitating heart have I gone many a time into "the backwoods" after the cows at night. As I watched the "gap" in the old rail fence I learned the music of the insects and the bees. The fence corner in the "back-field" was my first pew and the whispering winds my first preacher. The motes in the air were fairy angels. The humming-bird and the roses were messengers of the eternally good and the eternally beautiful. I did not go to "Sunday" School in my early days. How we cramp God! It is sinful to be ever confining Him by our creeds and terms and organizations. We attended the universe's school with its flowers and birds and stars and plantings and harvests and brooks. Under the splendid hard maples, in the old barn, beside the creek with banks of meadows, among the kindly sheep, on some large boulder we read the words of the God who made all things that are.

A Ten Mile Walk in the Country.

But I must check memory. Today I live in the city and like it right well; of course I must get a fresh breath of country once in a while to keep a proper proportion. Today I have walked about ten miles in the country. Please notice that I walked and that by choice. I was offered a ride. Credit me with refusing. It was zero weather too. I wore a derby and no ear covering. The clear beautiful snow carpeted the earth. It was terribly quiet. Both men and mice kept to their shelter. The only sound, positively the only sound, that came to my ear for miles was the mournful singing of the telephone wires. I never liked that sad sighing. I had gone almost three miles before I saw a living thing, and it was in an open country, then two crows flapped their wings. They were in no way inspiring. However, they gave some diversion to my thoughts. I wondered how they had survived the day before when it was 26 below zero. I wished some naturalist was with me who could enlighten me. How often I wish some wise man near me to answer my perplexities. Sometimes, however, wise men are disappointing. I still wonder what those crows did during that extremely cold weather and more what they thought. But I err, our Bible professor at Drake used to solemnly address us, "Animals do not think, with them it is instinct, not thougnt." We were all satisfied. The crows were the only living things I saw in my walk save a rabbit, and a few people towards its end. The quiet of the place felt uncanny. I would have hailed with delight a Halsted Street car with its motley crowd. I almost imagined myself on some planet alone, cut off from all social concourse. On the white snow I saw muskrat tracks; but these were only suggestive of memories of things long since passed.

Beside a Lonely Church.

As I traveled my planet alone I passed a church which from its high place looked most lonely. A church unoccupied, to me, is always a place to avoid. Why is it? Perhaps because it belongs to everybody and therefore to nobody. Perhaps because it scarcely expresses the life that is homelike and of the fire side. Perhaps because the church suggests the spirit world, ghost land. I do not know. However, all about this church was the neighborhood's city of the dead. The loved ones from every home were there; and the snows were over them. The wires continually sang their monotonous dirge and the sable crows flapped solemnly by.

I hastened not away from the cold white monuments, I paused to wonder if the dead, should they be like us, would prefer their graves in the country or in the city? Vain to thus wonder! The dead live in a city where is no loneliness and where there is no sin.

I passed from the quiet of the cemetery to the not less quiet of the road beyond.

I come to my destination, a farm house. Here again I felt as if I were in a planet alone, almost alone. My friends to whom I came were of a foreign tongue. It would not have been better if they had been of foreign souls, not interested in the things of my deepest thought and feeling.

Country People Do Not Play Enough.

I shall not attempt to answer "The correspondent." I am simply trying to say that it is the lack of fellowship that keeps many from the country. Of course I know that my picture does the country an injustice; but having had just the above experience I give it to set forth a very patent truth.

My country friends, speaking now soberly, do not usually have fellowship sufficient for their own good. They do not play enough. City people usually take more recreation; and enjoy much more society. If they do their serious work well and if they are not overcome by the tragedies all about them they must. Country women age far too quickly. They need more opportunity and more time for the feminine foibles (Is there a better word?) than they and especially their husbands think necessary.

My space is gone and lo, I have not touched on the more directly moral phases. But can I bring "The Correspondent" to time by unsettling his despair as to his influence upon the city by asking one simple question:—

Which is the harder headed, less subject to easy influence, the farmer or the average clerk or stenographer? I like the country and country people.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Meaning of the Silence

I wrote concerning Prof. J. W. McGarvey recently in these columns as follows:

"Does he realize what a menace to free, scholarly inquiry, and what a gag to free speech among the Disciples, his department of Biblical Criticism has been for more than eighteen years, all because of the reign of fear established by the easy use of the word "infidel"? To which he replies as follows:

> "No, I don't realize this. The class to whom he refers, though few in number, have made so much noise for more than eighteen years, that I thought maybe they had the courage of their convictions. If the most of them have been scared into profound silence, it would have been well had Bro. Gates followed their example. A man who can not defend his belief, had better keep still about it. And if a man is so near being an infidel that to call him one will hurt him, silence is good policy. During all these years I recollect no one who has called me an infidel, and I have not known the day when to call me one would have hurt me. A believer ought to be so well known as such, that the charge of infidelity would always prove a boomerang to the man who prefers it."

The foregoing quotation affords interesting subject matter for reflection. I will make the various sentences texts for a few observations:

1. Bro. McGarvey thinks it would have been well if I had kept silence with the rest of them. That may possibly be; it may be that I have not carefully counted the cost of taking issue with Lexington. I lay no claim to great courage or to great fitness to speak. Perhaps I am being led as a lamb to the slaughter. I do not mean to go to martyrdom for the cause of free faith and free speech if I can help it. But the opportunity was offered to speak some things uppermost in my heart, and I find that I have stumbled into saying some things a few of my brethren think ought to be said. I can only entreat that Lexington deal as gently and mercifully with me as my great temerity derserves.

"It Might Have Been."

What a different history the department of Biblical Criticism might have made for the reading of posterity if it had been characterized during the last eighteen years by all the geniality of personal nature possessed by its editor. If those myriads of pages sent forth to the brotherhood had borne the spirit of openness to new truth, faith in the equal sincerity and loyalty to the truth of other teachers and inquirers, and sympathy with the desire and effort of young men to find the truth, they would have been like leaves of healing for the brotherhood. But how does it stand after eighteen years of ceaseless writing? The new light and truth that have been fought have marched quietly and steadily on to victory in the brotherhood; suspicion and enmity have been created among those who ought to be brethren; and at the first hundred years of their history, the Disciples, largely as a consequence of the department of Biblical Criticism and the paper that has carried it, have been threatened by an open breach in their ranks. Good and earnest men who would not refuse to hazard their lives for Christ, have been named as faithless to him and marked for avoidance.

The aim of the department of Biblical Criticism was to prevent the spread of the new ideas; it has resulted in preventing the spread of good will and unity among brethren, and has actually propagated the ideas it proscribed. Such is the ill-fate that overtakes every effort to prevent the progress and growth of the truth by appointing authoritative bounds beyond which it cannot pass.

Why the Silence.

But why this silence of our teachers and students? Because they have not had the courage of their convictions? Have they feared the superior insight and knowledge of Prof. McGarvey? Have they avoided matching swords with him because of his greater strength and skill?

The most exasperating thing to Lexington has been the way the "flocks of fledgling critics" have gone on believing their "infidel ideas," and making converts to them, in spite of her knock-down-and-drag-out arguments against them. Lexington has so often inquired: Why do they not turn and defend their teachings. The department of Biblical Criticism is open to them. Then she reasoned: Silence is confession of guilt.

No, that is not the correct explanation of the silence. Silence may be confession of guilt sometimes, but in this case silence was confession of despair—the despair of Jesus when he was silent before the judgment seat of Caiaphas and of Pilate and the crowd that cried, "Crucify him!" "Crucify him!" He had no arguments to oppose to the settled convictions and the fixed determinations of his enemies to stop his teaching. He did not know—he was not skilled in the use of their arms. If they had been earnest, humble seekers after the truth, as he was, he could have responded to them. They were not seeking the truth, but his life; they took what they were seeking.

Civilized and Uncivilized Warfare.

Brother McGarvey, we have felt all along that you were not seeking the truth; you acted as if you had already found it and there was but one thing left for you to do, and that was to punish the holding and the utterance of opinions opposed to yours by all the implements of torture in your possession. We could not engage in intellectual combat with you because our consciences would not let us use your methods of warfare. You know that civilization has outlawed some ancient methods of carrying on war. Civilized nations no longer tolerate the maxim: "Everything is fair in war." The conscience of the civilized world no longer sanctions the slaying of non-combatants in the enemies' territory. The missionary societies and colleges are the non-combatants of the Disciples. They should not be made to suffer in a theological conflict any more than the women and children in civil warfare. Where they are likely to be made to suffer by a conflict, it should not be started without long reflection and wide consultation with the brotherhood. The poisoning of wells and streams of water on which the enemy depends is no longer tolerated in conflict between civilized nations. The officers and members of churches, and the trustees and supporters of colleges, on whom pastors and teachers depend for support should not be poisoned against them in theological conflict.

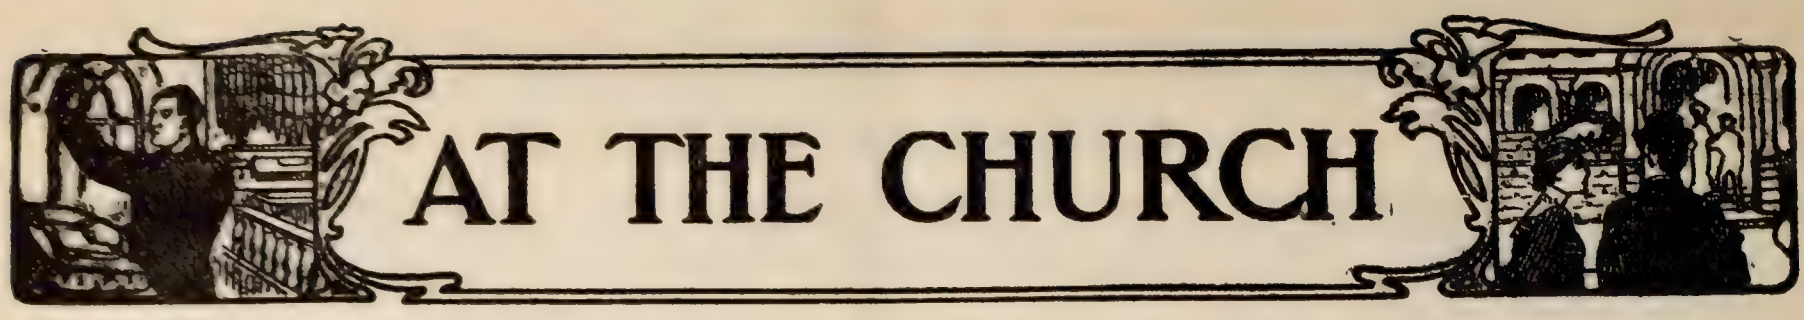
The teachers and preachers among the Disciples have kept silence, not because they did not have courage, the courage of their convictions, but because poorly clad wives and unfed little children did not have courage; and because officers and trustees of colleges did not have courage. They would have been very glad to risk their ideas in the conflict, but they did not think it fair to be asked to risk their homes, their work, and the vested interests of the brotherhood, along with their ideas. It was not fair to expect them to risk so much for difference of opinion; and it was not human to threaten so much. Why the silence? The methods of the contest were not fair.The use of aspersion and innuendo are ruled out of discussion among brethren in most Christian circles. No self-respecting Christian man will enter into contest with a disputant who persistently twists disagreement with his opinions into disloyalty to Christ and infidelity.

2. Prof. McGarvey says that during all these years no one has called him an infidel. He ought to be very grateful for the kindliness with which his brethren have treated him. But he ought also to do unto others as they have done to him. That would have been a square deal and a golden rule of action even in an editor. For an editor ought to be subject to the same principles of action as ordinary mortals.

Boomerangs.

Prof. McGarvey further says that "a believer ought to be so well known as such, that the charge of infidelity would always prove a boomerang to the man who prefers it."

This is a wise observation, and a correct representation of Prof. McGarvey's own case. His arraignments of the faith of his brethren have proved to be boomerangs to him. If he had been the only one to suffer from the recoiling boomerangs, we could forget the sufferings of his victims and the wounds of the brethren.



Let it be taken for granted that he intended to hunt only the immediate object of his attack. Is it not a rather complacent attitude for one man to take toward another man, to hold him responsible for being hurt when he is shot at? Prof. McGarvey's attitude is precisely the attitude of a man who should take his rifle and point it at his neighbor saying, I want to see if you are completely covered with a steel armor. If you are protected with armor as you ought to be this bullet will not hurt you; but even if it does penetrate a soft spot in your armor and injure you, then you can get damages from me in the courts.

What a delightful neighbor such a man would be! Any morning you came out of your house he would be likely to take a shot at you, and suavely say to you: Why dont' you defend yourself? There are plenty of revolvers and the courts are open. Any man who can not defend himself had better stay in the house!

How long would a community suffer such a man to run at large? Most men would feel that they had a right to be safe from assault in the public streets in time of peace. Yet it is possible for a single man to terrorize a whole community of peaceable citizens. Not every man could or would do it. Not every one is so gifted. It requires a peculiar but not very enviable order of talent to do it.

I trust that I do not overdraw the facts in the case when I say that Prof. McGarvey

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Peter and John at the Temple*

The closing verses of the second chapter of Acts form an interesting commentary upon the first Christian community. The believers in Jesus were a company more than three thousand in number. Organization was not thought of as yet. The first passion of these followers of the Master was testimony to his name and to the wonders of his work. Signs were wrought by the apostles in demonstration of the power of the new life which had come into the world. All the believers were united in spirit. So generous and universal was their sense of comradship that in recognition of the need in which many of their brethren stood they freely committed their possessions to a common fund, from which all might secure the needed help. There was no communism in the technical sense of the word, for their fund was entirely voluntary. No obligation save that of brotherhod was laid upon them to contribute to this central treasury, but many of them gave conspicuously of their possessions, and some disposed of all they had in this good way. They met daily, having abandoned nearly all other interests than those which centered in the name of Jesus. Their Christian recognition of one another, both in the ordinary meals and in the Lord's Supper, which probably was observed daily at first, made them of one heart and soul. It was a time of great gladness and power, and daily additions were received by the Christian community.

Peter and John.

Among those who were conspicuous in this work was the apostle Peter. The words of Jesus at the time of his great confession had designated him as the spokesman of the movement. None of the disciples had any authority save as witnesses to the truth, and in this capacity Peter was always first and foremost, his temperament being admirably adapted to the work. With him, as an associate and prominent member of the group of twelve, was John; and a third, James, his brother, had not yet witnessed to the faith by his early martyrdom. These three are the only members of the apostolic group whose names are mentioned in the book of Acts, after the calling of the roll in chapter two; and it will be remembered that these were the three disciples whom Jesus admitted into most intimate companionship with himself, at least on three notable occasions. It is in connection with Peter and John that the present lesson is recorded.

Jewish Christians.

The first disciples were Jews. As yet no Gentiles had entered the community of believers. Indeed, perhaps the thought of Gentile Christians had not yet occurred to the early Christians. Certainly on the day of Pentecost when Peter quoted Joel to the effect that the Divine Spirit was to be poured out on "all flesh," naturally the apostle and the prophet had in mind no others than the chosen people. As Jews they observed all the regular practices of their nation. They did not for a moment consider it necessary to leave off the observance of the ordinary feasts, fasts, sacrifices, and other ceremonies of Judaism. They seem to have regarded Christianity as in no sense an attack on Judaism but only an extension of the privileges which they had hitherto enjoyed. Peter and John, therfore, and probably other members of the group of disciples, went up to the temple from their homes in the city of Jerusalem at the appointed daily hour, 3:00 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Beggar at the Gate.

At the door of the temple, that gate "Beautiful" which was probably situated at the entrance to the court of the women, they saw a man, one of the beggars accustomed to sit in the gates of the temple begging. In the East beggary is practiced so continually that mendicants came to be among the recognized features of almost every public place. A lame man was there who demanded of these two Jews the customary trifling gratuity with which the passer-by salves his conscience at the importunity of a beggar. Where there is so much poverty and the practice of beggary is tolerated so generally, it becomes the custom to give a trifling amount to almost every one who asks, and the refinements f civilization have subdivided the money of the East until one can seem to be fairly generous without actually giving away more than he wishes to spare. This beggar became the object of earnest scrutiny by Peter. If he was to do him any good he wished it to be the greatest possible. The apostle demanded of the beggar his full attention. Fixing upon him his penetrating gaze, he said: "Look upon us." Then while the beggar held them in absorbing regard, Peter said: "I have no gold to give you, but what is much better I bestow in the name of Jesus the Messiah of Nazareth: walk." Then seizing him by the right hand, he lifted him to his feet, and the man, instantly aware of a new strength within him, leaped up and in the utter joy of the discovery walked and leaped about the court, lifting up his voice in praise to God. Such unwonted action on the part of a familiar figure like that of the beggar brought the crowd together in astonishment at what had taken place.

Peter and the People.

This was precisely the opportunity Peter and John wished. They withdrew to a place where greater space could be found. That was in Solomon's porch, the great cloister on the east side of the temple aria, where Jesus sometimes taught. Here Peter addressed himself to the interested multitude. It was no marvel that this man had been healed of his ailment. It was to be expected since a Servant of God had recently lived among them. Jesus had been glorified in spite of the denial of him before Pilate when he might have been released if only they in mob violence had not demanded his death. Rather than have him saved they had chosen the murderer Barabbas, but this was a verdict which God had reversed. The Prince of Life had been raised from the dead, and of this fact the apostles were witnesses.

Peter's Demand.

By faith in his name this poor man had received soundness of limb; everything depended upon that faith. Had that man doubted or refused the profered aid, nothing could have been done for him. But all things were possible to him who believes. And now behold the result: the man is perfectly sound in the presence of all beholders.

Then Peter turned at once to the need of the people themselves for repentance and amendment. They were guilty of the death of their Messiah, but in ignorance they had done it, led on by evil rulers. Yet their Scriptures were full of prophecies looking forward to this divine confirmation. Here, of course, Peter speaks with the freedom of one who is addressing an audience. The prophets had spoken of better times; few of them perhaps had spoken of the Messiah, yet this was the forward look of the Old Testament as a whole. If Peter seems to exaggerate the fact when he says that all the prophets had declared that Christ should suffer, he is justified by the tendency of the Old Testament. Then he came to the heart of his message: they must repent and turn to God that their sins might be removed and that the blessings so long promised of the Lord might arrive. Jesus had gone away, but he would soon return, and with him would come those times of beauty and of blessedness of which the prophets had spoken.

The Return of Jesus.

It is quite likely that Peter connected the good time to come with the return of Jesus for his personal ministry in the world. And whether he meant a visible return or that coming in the spirit which is the promise of the Lord himself and of the apostolic writers, is immaterial. The first preachers of the Gospel laid stress upon the return of Jesus. We cannot do better than to follow their example, understanding that return in its largest sense. It is still the message of the Gospel to insist, as did Peter, that the forward look of the Old Testament is toward Christianity, and that in his coming, both in spirit and visibly, the world is healed of its sin and of its diseases. Christianity is accomplishing today by the regular processes of its teaching and its employment of the healing powers of nature, those same wonderful if not equally speedy cures wrought by the followers of Jesus in early days. But this is of small moment as compared with spiritual and moral healing. The man who awakens from his life of sin to righteousness and begins the embodiment of the ideals and passions of Jesus for holiness and purity is the most marvelous of miracles, and is the living personification of the divine power of the Man of Nazareth.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

I. RESPONSIBILITY. The officers of the school are the representatives of the church. The proper administration of the school depends upon them. If any one of them fail, the efficiency of the school is, to that extent, lessened. The officer who is irregular in his attendance, who comes late, or who is listless in the performance of his duties, has no place in the modern Sunday School. He is filling the shoes of a better mn, and if he cannot mend his ways, he should resign, or if necessary, be asked to resign.

II. NUMBER. The number of officers will, of course, vary according to the size and need of the school. No offices should be be created for their own sake merely, nor for the otherwise laudable design of bringing so-and-so into the Sunday-school. Every office should stand for a specific and necessary duty. At the same time, there should be enough officers for the work so that no one shall be over-burdened.

III. ELECTION. None of the officers of the school should be elected by popular vote. In some schools the Superintendent is appointed by the church, and appoints all the other officers. It seems better, however, for the Official Board, or other governing body of the church, to appoint not only the Superintendent, but the assistant Superintendent, Secretary and Treasurer, giving them ex-officio, a place on the Sunday-school Board, and for this latter board to appoint all the other officers of the school.

IV. DUTIES IN GENERAL. Duties of officers are defined by their responsibilities, which are both spiritual and temporal. On the one hand, however, they should be men of prayer and bible knowledge. On the other hand, they should "magnify their office," giving to it such study and attention as they give to their daily business. No officer can expect to "make good" who does not keep in touch with the latest developments in Sunday-school work. He should be a member of the Teacher Training Class. He should attend Sunday-school conventions and institutes and read at least the best books that have to do with his work. Above all, he must be able and willing to give much thought during the week to the proper administration of his office. This is imperative. The failure of most Sunday-school workers lies right here.

V. THE PASTOR. The Pastor bears the same relation to the school that he does to the church at large, namely, that of general oversight and spiritual watch-care. Unless under special circumstances he should not be superintendent, nor should he teach any of the classes. He should be free to go from class to class, keeping in touch with their work, and getting personally acquainted with every scholar in the school. Nothing can fill the place of this personal touch of the minister with the young people of his church. He should also know what is being taught by every teacher, and be brave enough to correct serious error wherever he finds it. Some ministers conduct a Catechumens' or Young Communicants' Class, for the purpose of training young people for church membership. This should be in some way connected with the work of the school. Even where such is impossible, the pastor has golden opportunities for urging the young people to give themselves to Christ. The wise pastor will hold a children's service at stated intervals, and by frequent references from the pulpit, keep the work of the school constantly before the church.

VI. SUPERINTENDENT. The Superintendent is the administrative head of the school. He is responsible for its discipline and general efficiency. His specific duties are to open and close the school with appropriate exercises; supervise the work of each department, and when necessary, suggest changes in the teaching methods; visit the classes regularly during the study-period; preside at all Board and Faculty meetings, and direct all the officers to carry out his plans. Of all the officers he should be the best informed in Sunday-school work. He should attend every available Sunday-school convention and institute, and keep in touch with the latest literature of his subject. The man who is too busy for these things, is too busy to be a Sunday-school Superintendent. Only the specially gifted Superintendent should give "talks" from the platform. The Assistant Superintendent should aid the Superintendent in his regular work, and fill his place in his absence. He should also have some specific duties to perform, which may be suggested by the requirements of every individual school. In some schools he is assigned the task of communicating with the teachers each week and securing substitutes for the absent ones. In no case should he be allowed to feel that his office is a synecure.

VII. DEPARTMENTAL SUPERINTENDFNT. The duties of the Departmental Superintendent in relation to his department are identical with those of the General Superintendent in relation to the school at large. In addition to these, however, he should be equipped to teach the lesson, and drill the department as a whole on missions, temperance, bible work, etc. A knowledge of black-board work is here desirable. The success and esprit de corps of all the departments up to the senior, depend largely on this superintendent.

THE PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

Our Fellowships

Topic, Jan. 20. Mt. 18:19; Rom. 1:8-12; 2 Tim. 2:11, 12; Ps. 133:1-3.

Our fellowships are sources of Strength.

We who have declaimed the sentiment, "Liberty and Union, One and Inseparable," ought to have at least a partial understanding of the strength of political fellowship. We ought to be able to read with sympathy the last paragraph of Mr. Lincoln's first inaugural: "I am loath to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection. The mystic cords of memory, stretching from every battle-field and patriotic grave to every living heart and hearthstone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of union when again touched, as they surely will be, by the better angels of our nature." Great tasks have been accomplished by the reunited nation. Great tasks await the united church of God. If two or three can prevail in prayer, what will be the power of the united church on its knees asking for the triumph of the kingdom of justice and mercy? Evangelism, temperance, the care of the dependent classes, prison reform, justice to the child, the redemption of cities from the spoilsman, religious education, all demand the united action of Christian people. In many churches some of these important matters are never mentioned because the preachers have been trained in the art of theological warfare and not in the art of winning men to the love of God and of their fellowmen. The united church will be strong because it will put the emphasis where it belongs.

Mutual Benefits.

Paul longed to be with the disciples at Rome that he might both confer and receive benefits. A great orator once said that he gave back to the people what he got from them as he looked into their faces. Great preachers owe as much to their hearers as the hearers owe to them. The time-server's complaint that he is not appreciated is an announcement that he is not receiving the spiritual stimulus which contact with people gives to the true man. Those who serve best are blest beyond all others. But they must really serve. Sunday exhaustion comes from running a treadmill as well as from expending spiritual energy. An organization is good if it is a channel for the stream of human sympathy. For our own profit we must refuse to run church treadmills just to keep up appearances. There is too much joy to come from the best of life, too much growth for the one bestowing, for a sensible man to be satisfied with anything short of purest fellowship of giving and receiving. There is no salvation outside of fellowship. We smile at the presumptuous sectary who says there is no hope for people outside of his sheep-pen, but we dare not mock him who says we cannot be saved apart from the fellowship of those who love God and their brothers. Spiritual death is the portion of him who separates himself from his fellows. We live only as others live, by our strength. The misanthropist is dead. Frowning, sulky, sullen men and women are nigh to death. They are not entering joyously into the life of the world. They think of what the world owes them and not of what they owe the world and therefore they have not their hearts open for the world's gifts.

A Common Destiny.

"If we died with him, we shall also live with him." Like Peter, we would linger on the mount of transfiguration. The valleys below have difficulties we would shun. But the fact remains that the Lord lived in the valley and that he is still to be found there by those who do his will. Would we have fellowship with him? Then we must share his suffering. "Then to side with truth is noble when we share her wretched crust." Oh, we like to be in the big church whether it is true to the Master or not. We will wink at injustice in order to escape the discomfort of being in a minority. By entering into fellowship of unworthy men we choose their destiny for ourselves. "If we deny him, he will also deny us." "Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ." "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." It is only as we do the work of God that we have fellowship with him and have a part in his life. We cannot live cowardly, cringing, selfish lives and at the same time enjoy the destiny of God's elect. The joy of the new life in Christ is for his people in this world and in that which is to come.

Home and the Children

The Doll Family

See the chubby little maiden,
Lap so full and heavy-laden
With her toys.
Hear her laugh and hear her scold
At her dollies, young and old,
Girls and boys.

Such a funny zig-zag row,
Winding up with Jimmy Crow,
Quite jet black.
Some are minus arms and legs,
Some have only wooden pegs
And crooked back.

But she makes them toe the mark,
As old Noah in the ark,
Two and two;
They must walk beside each other,
And not try to choose another,
Nor say boo.

Then she gives them sugar candy,
Calls them cracker jack and dandy
If they're good.
Next she takes them all to town,
Gets them each a pretty gown,
And a hood.

When they got all they required,
They came home so very tired
From the store
That they fell down in a heap—
Dolls and mother—fast asleep,
On the floor!

CANDID.

When the minister, who was a bachelor, had been helped to Mrs. Porter's biscuits for the third time, he looked across the table at Rhoda, staring at him with round, wondering eyes. "I don't often have such a good supper as this, my dear," he said in his most propitiatory tone, and Rhoda dimpled. "We don't always," she said in her clear little voice. "I'm awful glad you came."

What Happened to the Parlor Clock

By Clara L. Brower.

"Oh, dear," said the Parlor Clock, "I am so tired of keeping up this endless ticking all the time. I don't see the use of it."

"Well," ticked the Kitchen Clock, "I get tired too and sometimes I am ready to stop, but some one winds me up and that puts new life into me and I go on."

"That's just the trouble," complained the Parlor Clock, "when I think I am going to get a little rest and quiet I have to go on. It isn't half so nice as when I stood quietly on the shelf in the store and every one stopped and talked of how handsome I was."

"Ever so many do that now," said the Kitchen Clock, "I hear them tell how fine you are, and I sometimes wish I too were handsome but I was very much admired once when I was young," and a faint sigh seemed to come from the old clock.

"Well, you were never as handsome as me, that's certain," replied the Parlor Clock unfeelingly, "but still I'm tired. I don't see how you have run all these years. It would not be so bad if I didn't have to run nights too. What is the use of keeping at work when its dark and no one to see or hear. And during the day sometimes there will be hours when no one hears me strike my beautiful chime. I think it is a great waste. I am sure I shall wear out much sooner with this useless work."

"That is true," said the Kitchen Clock, "I don't see the use of all this work at night and when I am alone, any more than you, but it seems to be what I was made for and so I shall keep on day and night as long as I am able."

"I have an idea," said the Parlor Clock suddenly. "I am going to stop running when I am alone! Some one must end this useless effort and I will begin."

"Oh don't, don't" cried the Kitchen Clock, frightened at the thought. "I am sure no good will come of it. We must do our duty whether anyone sees us or not."

"Yes," continued the Parlor Clock firmly, "some one must begin a new period in the history of clocks. I will be the first one to set the example, all will soon follow," and the onyx clock gave a joyful tick but the old clock struck the hour of seven with a melancholy sound for one usually so cheerful and urged its companion to go on in the good way it had followed for so many years.

"It's no use for you to talk, my mind is made up. I shall not waste my strength working when no one is about. I believe I will stop now, when I hear some one coming I'll begin again." Then all was quiet in the room for a while though the Kitchen Clock ticked louder than ever, trying to make up for the silence of the Parlor Clock.

"Mamma," cried Fred, rushing in, "may I go round to Will's and see his white mice before school?"

"Run and look at the clock, and if there is time you may," answered his mother.

"The guilty clock started and was ticking busily when Fred came into the room. "Oh, yes," he shouted, "a whole half hour and it's only a block and I'll go on to school with Will." So away he ran and the Parlor Clock said complacently, "You see I am right and how much pleasure I have given Fred. I am sure this will be a great success. You had better rest, too. Norah's down cellar, she doesn't pay any attention to you."

"But," protested the Kitchen Clock, "you have made him late for school. I am fully twenty minutes ahead of you."

"You are such a croaker," fretted the proud Clock, "one cannot please everybody," and then it was silent again.

"Have you any errands this morning?" inquired the master of the house to the mistress in the hall.

"If you will you may go to the greenhouse and order a pot of hyacinths sent to poor Miss Marah. She is sick and lonely these days."

"I must not miss the ten o'clock train for I have an important engagement in the city," began the master, "but—yes," looking at the Parlor Clock, "I have plenty of time." And the gentleman went away to do the kindly deed. "I am afraid you have made trouble this time," called the Kitchen Clock, "for you are way behind me now and I have heard it was very important to be at the train on time."

"Nonsense," replied the Parlor Clock confidentially, "I rode on the cars when I came from the city and had to wait a long time for them. Anyway you forget that poor woman has some flowers she would not have had if I had not given more time."

"Perhaps you are all right. I trust so," said the honest friend hopefully.

"Well, do rest yourself and see how nice it is," urged the Parlor Clock. But the Kitchen Clock would not listen and ticked away steadily all day and the hours wore away until evening when the family all gathered in the parlor. "Mamma," said Fred, "will you please write an excuse for

The Children's Pulpit

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER.

THE SNOWFLAKE

A snowflake came tumbling down from above, from nobody knows where, and after bobbing around on the ground as if it didn't feel very much at home in its new big world finally sank down beside a plank in the walk and went sound asleep. The next morning the sun came out warm and clear. A fairy ray stole shining down upon the snowflake, and before it could rub its sleepy eyes and wake up, it was changed from a baby snowflake into a dancing drop of water. It ran around on the ground as restless as a small boy, and finally, looking up at the clouds, cried out, "Mama, Mama, what'll I do next?"

Then the little drop of water went running on down the valley and became a creek, which rippled and bubbled and ran in frolicsome curves with all the joy of youth But finally this same creek grew into a great river, straight, steady, big and strong, which moved on to the sea.

Every boy and girl was once a baby, as new and sleepy in this big world as a snowflake. And these same boys and girls are now as restless as water drops, seeking what to do and where to go. Soon they will be young people, as full of life and joyous as the creek. But best of all, boys and girls will some day be men and women, big, strong and steady, helping to carry the burdens of others, as the rivers carry ships. So let us remember while we are boys and girls that this is what we are living for—to help others. Then some day the beautiful fairy, "Growth," will say, "See, I have made rivers from water drops, and men and women from boys and girls."

CHICAGO

THE REDEMPTIVE WORK OF THE JUVENILE COURT. O. F. JORDAN VISITS THIS SPLENDID INSTITUTION, DESCRIBES HIS OBSERVATIONS AND ASKS A PERTINENT QUESTION.

The subject of boys is one that is interesting to all classes of people. Whether it be a day-school teacher, or whether it be a Sunday-school teacher, at home or on the street, the "Boy Problem" which Forbush handles scientifically, is always full of human interest. The other day we determined to go where the boy problem was acute and watch a master in the art of handling boys at his daily task. We set out for the Juvenile Court, which is held in the Detention Home on Ewing street.

This building is located around the corner from Hull House. One goes down Halsted street past the Greek stores with the Greek signs advertising the wares of that section in the language of Xenophon. We shall hope that Xenophon and Demosthenes did not live in such abandon of filth as appears in the modern Athens of our commonwealth. Ewing street crosses Halsted and its small houses and dirty streets would attract attention to the student of social problems were these features not outclassed in interest by the Detention Home and the Juvenile Court.

In Presence of Delinquent Boys.

Once in the court-room we handed a professional card to an officer and were assigned a seat with the lawyers within the railing. In here was a chair which is reserved for "his reverence," the Roman Catholic father, who is always there when any cases appear involving the disposition of homeless children. Lately a new chair has been added, and now Mr. Colby in the interests of the Federated Protestant church, watches out for the welfare of the Protestant children.

As we took our seat, we looked out on a court-room filled with women and children, almost all boys. One did not need to be told that he was in the presence of the delinquent boys of Chicago. The faces told the story. They ran in ages from six to sixteen, if one might make a guess. On this particular day, the attorney for the board of education was making a statement of the cases of delinquency that had appeared in the school room and on the school grounds. In the course of that day, perhaps fifty boys against whom the school board had complaints, were gathered into court to have their cases investigated by the judge in charge. A German father is called into court and his young hopeful put on a chair where the judge might be able to see him. The German insisted that the boy was good at home but admitted that the boy made another boy, nicknamed "The Chinaman," laugh at times, and that he had manufactured various paper missiles with which to bombard students who set a dangerous precedent of studying. He complained that the school teachers had not a severe discipline and explained his views in some such language as this: "Your honor, did you efer go to what's you call'em, a sircuss?" His honor smiled and admitted the gentle impeachment. "Did you see how when a hund, a dog I vas to say, do wrong, they w'ip 'im? In von veek, ven die dog do wrong some more, dey w'ip 'im again. Pretty soon, die dog vas good already, and he need not to be w'ipped some more. Dot vas die way to make good boys. Die lehrer, die teacher, I vas to say, should w'ip the boys. Den dey vould all be good already." The judge explained that the training of boys and dogs might be different and said he was going to give this particular boy the chance of the parental school where a different view of education prevailed from that of the zealous German. The boy lacked but six months of fourteen and in the next six months he could under the law attend the parental school at St. Charles. He was ordered sent to St. Charles, as the judge said, to give him the last chance he would get for a proper view of life.

The Boys' Welfare at a Premium.

Pretty soon an American woman, a widow, came into court with her boy who was a persistent truant. She had placed him in the school of her faith, the Sacred Heart school let us say, but she complained that the Sister took no interest in him and she had removed him from this place to the public school. She claimed that she had to keep the boy out some to carry laundry while she turned it out. When the judge told her the boy must be sent to the parental school, she wept and asked who would carry her washing when it was done. The judge asked if her only interest in the boy was to have laundry carried. Then he told her that the court was set to give the boys a chance and that adults would have to do the best they could. The unitiated would probably have decided that case differently. The pity for a widow who had to wash for a living would probably induce a jury of ordinary citizens to rule in her favor and keep the boy out of school. The social expert, however, would place the interest of the child above that of the adult. He would say the child had a right to his education and his chance in life even at the expense of a widowed mother for only thus might we hope to avoid producing the criminal and the incompetent.

On other days, larger juvenile questions than these must be settled. Boys sometimes commit crimes against property. In a town where the juvenile court is not yet well known, a group of boys bought liquor from a saloon that sold it to them illegally. Under the spur of this liquor, they burglarized a gas meter in the back of a store, taking out the coins. The zealous prosecutor found the boys who had broken into the gas meter but was unable to secure any evidence against the saloonist, though it was offered by citizens. Only when threatened with newspaper notoriety would he consent to having these boys sent to a parental school rather than to a penal institution like the one at Pontiac. In Chicago, public sentiment gives the boys all the chance that can be given them. The theory of the police and officials of the city is that it is not necessary for society to get revenge, but only that boys shall be reclaimed from the error of their ways.

Legal Formality Laid Aside.

In the old days, boys were herded together with common criminals in the public jail. Here they were taught that they had done their crime clumsily and experts showed them how to do it without being caught. They were taught vices hitherto unknown to them. They found the idleness of the prison life not half so terrifying as they had fancied. In fact, in days gone by, the county jail was the most important school of crime in the entire community.

Under the juvenile court act, the judge lays aside much of the formality of the law court. A lawyer of the older order appeared in the juvenile court while we were there and pleaded technicality. The judge insisted that the facts should be arrived at in spite of rules. The lawyer insisted. The shrewd judge allowed the constitutional privilege and then threw the lawyer into a legal predicament where he was glad to forego his privilege and allowed the investigation to proceed unhampered by the technicalities of court procedure. The judge sometimes gives the boys fatherly talks. He exhorted one boy to go to the Catholic church every Sunday. He liberated another only on the promise that he would attend Sunday-school. More than once did he appeal to a boy to make his mother happy by good conduct. We opine that the judge gives more religious advice than any clergyman in the city.

Another interesting feature of the court-room was the probation officers. There are men and women who donate their time in part, or in full, to watching over wards of the court. A boy taken in petty crime is often sent home but placed under the supervision of the probation officer. This officer investigates the condition of the home and every other element of his environment and does the work of god-father or god-mother to him. These servants of the court have no salary. Their services will come to be recognized in such a way that they will be paid. It is certainly as worthy a cause as the raising of the salaries of our aldermen.

Is the Judge a Rival of the Evangelist?

Since we have gone home from the juvenile court, we can see that row of delinquent boys in our dreams. In our waking thoughts some mighty solemn questions have presented themselves. Is the church losing the last remnant of her once glorious calling? Once she did healing, but the doctor came and she lost that function. Once she furnished the courts of justice but now these pertain to the state. Once she had exclusive control of education. Now the state furnishes primary schools that have driven the church out of that work. The church fell back on the church college but this is driven from the field by the state university. If there was any function that the church had always supposed was exclusive, it was the saving of souls. But here comes a juvenile court with a judge who pleads for the better life, and hopes to lead boys into it, not through ordinance or dogma but through new environment and through the discovery of a boy's own soul and capacity. If the judge is now the rival of the evangelist and the pastor, of what more use are the ministers? Do they cumber the ground?

But let us remember that even the judge must come from somewhere. Whence came his fraternity, his human feeling? From what source is his insight into the problems of souls? The judge himself is a Christian in ideals and perhaps a church-member as well. If Christianity cannot reach all the delinquents through her own machinery, it is her glory to create the men who shall do it in her behalf. If we truly long for the day when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, we shall rejoice ever that Christianity has become so full that it has overflowed its containing vessel and is rapidly filling home and state as well.

CHURCH NOTES

Dr. Gates preached last Sunday at Morocco, Ind.

Rev. G. W. Thomas has had four confessions at the West End Church in his meeting.

Dr. Willett is making a trip East, visiting a number of important places. He will preach at Yale University on Sunday, January 24. On January 21, he will speak at a men's ban-

The March Offering—Centennial Echoes

Voices from every quarter indicate the great interest in the March Offering for Foreign Missions, March 7th. We could fill pages of Centennial sentiments like the following. If you have not ordered March Offering supplies, please do so today. Address F. M. Rains, Sec., Cincinnati, O.

As a personal Centennial endeavor I will try to get an offering from a non-contributing church. Jos. Armistead, Eminence, Ky.

Our most worthy commemoration of the publication of the "Declaration and Address" will be in realizing to the full our Centennial aim in Missions. Roy O. Youtz, Burlington Jct., Mo.

God's clock is striking in the passing of the year and the century. Whether it toll for our decline or ring the peals of progress and victory, depends upon us. God calls to glorious action. W. W. Sniff, Paris, Ill.

We expect this church to be a Living-link. W. S. Lockhart, Fayetteville, Ark.

By God's help I must encourage at least one congregation to become a Living-link in 1909. The Lord gave to the churches a missionary conscience. W. H. Book, Columbus, Ind.

A Centennial without an increase of interest and offerings to Foreign Missions will be a sore disappointment and a cause for shame. E. M. Flinn, Lewiston, Idaho.

A crowning glory of our movement must be its consuming missionary activity. Without that we have only a name to live. Vernon Stauffer, Angola, Ind.

The pulpit should give the same emphasis to Missions as the apostles did. Neglecting to do so is to invite failure. Randolph Cook, Enid, Okla.

The little plant has grown in one hundred years to be a great tree. India, China, Japan, Africa and the Islands of the Sea are seeking shelter in its branches, and they will not be denied. A. F. Sanderson, Houston, Tex.

This year the number of Living-link churches should double. The foreign work is the greatest enterprise of the church. A. C. Parker, Midland, Tex.

Missions is the heart of our plea. C. C. Smith, Orrville, O.

The evangelization of the world is close to the heart of God. Any ambition which falls short of that is unworthy a Bible people. Our Centennial aim ought to be "Every member a giver to Missions." Geo. L. Peters, Joplin, Mo.

I would to God our churches were apostolic in missionary zeal! It would mean the half of them Living-links by October, 1909. W. C. Crider, Fortuna, Calif.

I trust that our missionary interest may reach a high mark both in material and spiritual achievement during the Centennial year. J. E. Moyer, Allendale, Ill.

We have too long regarded ourselves as a young and feeble people. It is high time that, with a century's growth and history behind us, we should realize that we must take a larger part in the world's evangelization. J. H. Wright, Lovington, Ill.

The best possible celebration of this or any other notable occasion in the history of our churches is a larger and more intelligent effort to spread the gospel everywhere. H. D. Smith, Hopkinsville, Ky.

May we in this Centennial year, understand as never before, the real purpose of our plea: union in order that the world may be evangelized. J. H. MacNeill, Winchester, Ky.

May the deeds of 1909 prove to the whole world that we have meant the words of earlier years. Chas. S. Medbury, Des Moines, Ia.

A hundred years of fruitful history looks down upon us, one hundred years of progress lives in us; not to use this vantage to give the gospel to all the world would be a crime against God and humanity. J. E. Stuart, Washington, D. C.

Carrying on our organized Missions is putting the Golden Rule into practice in the surest and most Christ-like way in this Centennial year. F. M. McHale, Richland Center, Wis.

Our church building has just been burned, but we shall not cut down our foreign missionary offering. P. E. Hawkins, Hartford, Kans.

I am going to do my best to make this Centennial year the banner year for this church in our foreign missionary offering. L. L. Shaw, Raton, New Mexico.

An ounce of offering is worth a pound of talk. Jesse W. Grubbs, Lexington, Ky.

Another hundred years and the ends of the earth will be reached with the gospel, if the Foreign Society is supported as it can and should be. Wm. C. Maupin, Johnson City, Tenn.

Missions is the test of a church's sincerity; it is the pulse beat of Christianity. May the pulse of the Disciples of Christ be normal for the Centennial. M. H. Garrard, La Porte, Ind.

The whole world is open and ready for the gospel. More Living-link churches and individuals in the great foreign work. More support from our great brotherhood so that more workers may be sent. E. M. Johnson, Kearney, Nebr.

I expect to raise the largest offering for Foreign Missions next March that I have ever sent to your office. L. A. Chapman, Elmwood, Nebr.

Since we began to support our own missionary in India we have raised more money for local work and done it easier than ever before in the same length of time. The best possible stimulus to the work at home is to become a Living-link in the foreign work. We know it from experience. J. W. Holsapple, Hillsboro, Tex.

No pretext nor any circumstances whatsoever should keep any disciple of the risen Lord from doing his full missionary duty in this strategic year of our history. H. O. Pritchard, Bethany, Nebr.

Few know the joys of being a co-worker with God for the salvation of the world. They get no joy out of Missions because they put nothing into the work. (He gave $10,000). L. F. Lascelle, Danville, Ill.

The noblest monument we can raise for our Centennial is a great missionary offering. E. F. Randall, Tonawanda, N. Y.

The biggest thing of the twentieth century is Foreign Missions. It is the glory of the church that our Centennial year preëminently emphasizes this. Bruce Brown, Valparaiso, Ind.

We ought to be satisfied with nothing less than one-half million for Foreign Missions this Centennial year. I assure you of my heartiest co-operation. Wm. P. Shamhart, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

If we do the Lord's will as expressed in the commission, the offerings for the evangelization of the world this year will make that of other years look as a mere pittance. J. F. Smith, Loraine, Ill.

The aims of the Foreign Society ought to be easily surpassed this Centennial year. The nations will judge us by our zeal for world-wide Missions. V. G. Hostetter, Fostoria, O.

May those who are Christians only, have the spirit of obedience only, and "Go into all the world." D. J. Howe, Nickerson, Kans.

WHAT HAPPENED TO THE CLOCK.

me? I was late this morning. Will had gone when I got to the house and I was more than fifteen minutes late. Our clock must be slow."

"Something must be wrong with the clock," said the master of the house, looking up from his paper, "I was late for the train and missed my appointment and fear I may lose the sale of that property. Why! its way behind time."

"Yes," said the mistress, "I found it out this afternoon. It has run by fits and starts all day. I was late for my committee meeting and was so sorry!"

"We will have to take it back to be regulated," said the master. "We cannot have such a time as this. We might better have no clock or bring the old Kitchen Clock into the parlor. That has been faithful for a dozen years."

Then the Parlor Clock grew frightened and ticked very fast and tried to tell all about it, but no one understood and the master opened the glass door and turned the hand around and the clock became so excited trying to explain how it was only resting awhile that it struck seventeen all at once, but it only created a laugh. Next morning it was taken down, packed in a box and nailed up tight, and away it went to the clock store.

"Good-bye," said the Kitchen Clock, sadly, "I'm real sorry for you."

"Good-bye," wailed the Parlor Clock. "If I come back I will never let you get ahead of me again, and I'll try to do my duty day and night, whether any one sees me or not."—The Advance.

has terrorized the entire company of teachers and college presidents among the Disciples for a decade or more except those who have been his theological pals.

Perhaps Prof. McGarvey does not realize that his boomerangs have returned upon him. Perhaps he does not know what dread and amazement at himself he has produced in the brotherhood. He has moved in an admiring circle that has deceived him; a circle that has grown steadily smaller as the years have passed. It ought to have grown larger, and would have grown larger but for the method of his warfare upon his brethren. He could have propagated the same ideas and opposed the same teaching, and had been held in universal esteem, if he had only done it in a different spirit and with different methods. I know what I am talking about when I say that the rising generation of teachers and ministers among the Disciples hold him as the theological bete noire of the brotherhood. He need not deceive himself into thinking that "the class to whom I refer, is few in numbers." They are a rapidly increasing company, and are making the future of the Disciples.

It seems difficult for Prof McGarvey to see himself as others see him. His close friends and admirers have not been perfectly frank with him. If he stands in doubt of the injury he has done himself in the esteem of his own brethren, perhaps the contemplation of the following words from an eminent preacher and writer among the Disciples, equal in age, and abilities, and almost equal in fame, with Prof. McGarvey himself, will help to disillusion him. They are taken from a private letter of recent date.

"McGarvey is a brilliant illustration of the truth of Henry Ward Beecher's observations, that 'old age generally cures men of all their weaknesses except egotism. This, instead of being abated with years, becomes more pronounced and prominent.' The exemplification of this in McGarvey is pitiable."

This is just one of the ways his boomerangs are returning to him. Are the achievements (failures) of the Biblical Criticism department worth what it is costing Prof. McGarvey, to say nothing of what it is costing the brotherhood in peace and goodwill? It looks like the spending of money for that which is not bread.

Summary of Annual Meeting Reports

FREMONT, NEBRASKA

Our annual meeting was held on New Year's day. All reports showed a good year for the church in Fremont. Church treasurer reported about $2,150 raised for all purposes, and all debts paid and a small balance on hand. The different departments had fine reports, and each a balance in treasury to begin with this year. We are hopeful for the future. I. H. Fuller.

EMPORIA, KANSAS

The annual report of the departments of the First Church in Emporia, Kansas, for 1908, showed that 144 persons had been added to the church, of whom 140 united during the evangelistic meetings conducted by Dr. H. O. Breeden, in April, and the remaining 40 at regular services. The minister made 165 addresses, of which 19 were delivered outside of his own pulpit. There were five deaths in the church, and the minister conducted 49 funerals outside his membership. All the ten departments are in excellent condition, and indications point to the best work in the history of the church, in the year just begun. A total of more than seven thousand dollars ($7,000) was consecrated to the Lord, of which $4,300 was for the building fund, and nearly $500 was for missions. The minister, Willis A. Parker, is beginning his tenth year with this excellent church.

FORT WAYNE, INDIANA

The Third Church held its yearly meeting New Year's night. Encouraging reports of the year's work were read. During the year a C. W. B. M. and Training for Service class were organized. The former has grown from 7 to 18 members. The latter numbers over 90. Every offering of the Brotherhood was taken and apportionments reached. A thousand dollar mortgage paid off and the first floor of a building (at a cost of $2,300) built and all provided for, save $1,000. The Bible School has grown from 70 to 212, and is crowding out the walls of our present building. H. E. Stafford, Minister.

KEOKUK, IOWA

The report of the treasurer shows the church to have raised for all purposes $3,-251.01, with the following amounts by departments: C. W. B. M., $368.07; Ladies' Aid, $271.63; King's Daughters, $320.38; Sunday School, $258.49; Y. P. S. C. E., $136.10; Junior Mission Band, $92.09, making a grand total of $4,697.67. The church is out of debt, with a balance of $139.46 in the treasury. The church gave $276.17 to missions.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

On January 1st G. A. Miller began his third year of labor with the Ninth Street Church. The members and friends of the church have shown the minister and his wife every kindness and have greatly aided in lightening the burdens of a great work. Progress has been made along all the lines of church activity. During these two years 166 persons have been received into the fellowship of the church without any outside assistance in the pulpit work. There has been a net gain of 100 to the congregation. Bible School has increased one-third. The church has paid $3,400 on building debt, $1,000 in repairs of building, $800 to missions. Every department is now in most prosperous condition, and is united and harmonious.

AKRON, OHIO.

The year 1908 was the best in the history of the First Church of Christ, and more money was raised for church purposes than any previous year. The reading of the annual reports of all departments of the church at the annual meeting Monday night showed this fact. New officers for the coming year were elected at Monday night's meeting.

Rev. George Darsie, the pastor, is in his fourth year as minister of the church. During his ministry 529 new members were taken into the church. Reverend Darsie delivered 270 sermons and addresses during the year and officiated at 21 weddings.

The total sum raised in the church during 1908 was $12,504.64. Of this amount the church proper raised $9,712.06 and the other organizations $2,792.58. Out of the total sum given by the church and allied organizations $3,855.72 went to home and foreign missions. In addition to this two members of the church gave $600 to support their own foreign missionary.

The Sunday-school now has a total enrollment of 1,050, with 140 on the cradle roll. The average attendance during 1908 was 640, the largest in the history of the school. During the present year the school will make an effort to boost the enrollment to 1,900. The slogan adopted by the Sunday-school for this year is "1,900 in 1909."

DAVENPORT, IOWA.

The annual meeting of The First Christian Church was a great success in every respect. Never in the history of the church was there as much unity and enthusiasm. Over 200 members were present and everybody was rejoicing over the past year's successes and were particularly happy. Through the able leadership of our beloved pastor, Brother Perkins, the work of the past year has advanced steadily on every line and in every department. The church is unified and we are all one and of one mind.

In the Treasurer's report, $4,537.67 had been raised. All outstanding bills paid leaving a balance in the Treasury for the coming year. Every society reported showing gains and all having a cash balance on hand. Accessions to the church since Brother Perkins commenced his work the 1st of last February, 114. Seventy-three by Baptism. Net increase, ninety-eight. Sunday-school average for the year, 145, against 132 in 1907. Endeavor Society has 104 members. Largest in the three cities by far. All of these 104 at work. Our Sunday evening Endeavor meetings fill the annex of the church and meetings have the old time endeavor ring. G. W. Muckley will be with us Sunday evening to enlighten us on "Centennial Aims for Church Extension."

Another Training Class has been organized with a membership of about twenty-five. This class will be led by one of the elders, S. P. Willett. Total amount of money raised of all departments for missions, $826.41. Over 100 subscriptions were cheerfully made for 1909. Take it all in all it has been a great year for the Davenport Church.

We were certainly very fortunate in securing Brother Perkins as our pastor. He is a great leader. He is strong in every department of the work. E. R. Moore.

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., reports 108 additions during the year with total receipts of $8,834.50. The church's contribution to missionary and benevolent purposes was $2,377.87. This is a splendid record for the historic church and reflects great credit in the pastor, F. W. Burnham.

Mr. Burnham's pastoral report shows a multitude of activities in which he has labored.

DECATUR, ILLINOIS.

O. W. Lawrence, of Decatur, Ill., reports his great church there as having 366 additions in 1908—224 baptisms, net gain 306. Money raised in all departments $6200, for missions $875. Imposing as these figures are, we know that a much more significant element in the year's ministry is the spiritual influence and uplift of the church through the gracious personalities of Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence.

CHAMPAIGN, ILLINOIS.

University Place Church of Champaign and Urbana, Ill., where Stephen E. Fisher ministers, has the custom of an "Annual" on the afternoon and evening of New Year's Day. This year the attendance was the best in the history of the special day, so also were the reports. The business session was held at 3:30 and reports and election of officers; then followed the annual dinner, after which the evening was given over to social features. Notable among the details of the clerk's summary of reports is the fact that there has been added to the membership 356 during the year; raised for all purposes, $10,-079.17; reduced the indebtedness to $5,000, with plans to care for all this by the time of the Centennial convention; maintained the living link in the person of Mrs. Lulu M. Burner in Buenos Ayres through C. W. B. M. Made substantial gains in Bible School work; maintains five thriving classes in Training for service; established two mission Bible Schools in centers for future churches in Champaign and Urbana, one of these housed during the year; held five evangelistic campaigns with their own workers, the minister doing the preaching; one of these at the church with 245 additions; three of them in the missions in tent and tabernacle and one of them a missionary meeting for the little church at Ogden, Ill., resulting in forty added to the church. The present net resident membership of the congregation is 1,130. It is needless to say the church begins the new year with great joy, and its outlook is of the brightest, situated as it is in the midst of the 4000 students of the University of Illinois, the church has peculiar opportunities both at home and abroad. No special evangelistic campaign has been planned for this year; there are additions at practically all services, ten last Sunday with which to begin the new year. The slogan with which the year's work is being undertaken by pastor and church board is "A Deepening of the Spiritual Life all along the line."

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

The annual meeting of the Portland Avenue Church of Christ, Minneapolis, Minn., of which P. J. Rice is pastor, was held on New Year's Eve. A picnic supper was served in the early evening and followed by reports and routine business. The church has suffered by the removal, during the past year, of many families, but has gained a number of excellent workers so that its strength is not depleted. The financial report was especially gratifying. For the first time in its history the church and all its auxiliaries were declared to be absolutely out of debt, and in the woman's treasuries a neat balance was shown. During the two and one-half years of the present pastorate, 100 members have been added and all of whom remain faithful. The church has been repaired at a total cost of about $1,500, and a previous debt of $1,000 has been cleared away. The church and its departments give approximately $1,000 annually to the various missionary enterprises.

WITH THE WORKERS

Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Varney are in a meeting at Hartford, Mich.

C. T. Runyan will hold a meeting at Hennessy, Okla., during January.

J. N. Nicholson, after a successful pastorate at Milton, Iowa, goes to Moulton.

W. S. Lockhart is in a meeting with the church at Dixon, Ill. W. Lintti is leading the singing.

C. E. Polson has closed his work at Exira, Iowa, and begun work with the church at Akron, Iowa.

The church at Rockwell City, Iowa, is looking forward to the coming of its new pastor, G. W. Coffman.

R. H. Miller gave an illustrated lecture at Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., Jan. 14. B. S. Ferrall is the pastor.

Roger L. Clark began work with the church at Maysville, Ky., a few weeks ago, under very encouraging conditions.

The C. W. B. M. of the Church at Fairfield, Iowa, where G. W. Burch is the pastor, reports a C. W. B. M. Day offering of $168.55.

W. H. Zenor closed his work with the church at Montieth, Iowa, with the close of the year 1908. He had served the church two years.

T. L. Lowe changes his address from Union City, Ind., to 460 W. Fourth Ave., Columbus, Ohio, where he goes to take charge of the Fourth Avenue Church.

Good reports have come to the editor's desk regarding the work of T. L. Noblitt, at Guthrie, Okla. There have been more than 100 additions during the last year.

Geo. A. Miller is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on, "The Apostolic Age," at the Ninth Street Christian Church, Washington, D. C. The meetings are well attended.

The church at Augusta, Ill., under the leadership of H. M. Garn, is in a meeting, assisted by Geo. F. Chowder, of Youngstown, Ill. Mr. Garn is doing excellent work with this church.

There are about 200 members in our church at Grand Junction, Colo., where A. B. Elliott of Iowa has just begun his ministry. The city has a population of 10,000,—a fine opportunity for service.

The Law School of Transylvania University is giving its students the privilege of the trial of actual cases at the bar under the direction of the members of the faculty, who are active practitioners at the local bar.

"The Church at Work" is the significant title of the weekly paper of the First Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb., where H. H. Harmon is the enterprising pastor. This church presented its pastor and his wife with a beautiful set of china at Christmas.

The first Sunday in January was observed as "Family Day" by the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y. An effort was made to secure the attendance of all the members of the families represented in the church.

C. L. Organ, who was for three years State Bible School and Endeavor Superintendent for Iowa, has resigned that he may again give his time to Evangelistic work, in which he has always been very successful. Mr. Organ writes appreciatively of the men composing the State Board with which he has worked during these years.

James Mailley has resigned his pastorate at Colorado Springs, Colo., and will devote his time to lecturing.

The church at Lehigh, Iowa, loses its pastor, J. A. Saum, who has accepted the work at Pocahontas, Iowa.

The Capitol Hill Church, Des Moines, is in a meeting, led by John L. Brandt, of St. Louis. J. M. Van Horn is the pastor.

J. L. Wilkinson, of Indiana, has been heartily welcomed to the church at Canon City, Colo., where he began work in December.

Prof. R. G. Sears is interesting the students at Oklahoma Christian University in the study of Hebrew, and has at present a very large class.

The Lyob Street Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., where E. B. Barnes is minister, observed C. W. B. M. day by making an offering of $800.00.

Miss Bertha Denney, the daughter of B. S. Denney, Iowa's beloved state secretary, was married on Christmas Eve to Chas. L. Coffman, of Spokane, Wash. Mr. Coffman is a successful young business man in Spokane, where he and Mrs. Coffman will make their home.

Dean A. M. Haggard of the Bible College, Drake University, on Dec. 20th dedicated the new $2500 church at Maloy, Iowa. The membership consists of only forty people, none of whom possess much wealth. Yet, by the most heroic sacrifice they were able to build a beautiful little church and to dedicate it free of debt.

The church at Ionia, Mich., which was organized by Isaac Errett fifty years ago, will hold an anniversary service the last of this month, one feature of which will be a men's banquet, at which an address will be made on "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century." On Sunday there will be read a history of the church and a lecture on the life and work of Isaac Errett. G. W. More is the enterprising pastor.

The First Christian Church, Bloomington, Ill., where Edgar D. Jones is the minister, has adopted the following Centennial aims, for the realization of which they are already enthusiastically at work: 1st. Three young men for the Christian ministry—either in the home or foreign mission field; 2nd. Six hundred dollars for foreign missions; 3rd. Two hundred dollars for state missions—reached; 4th. Two hundred dollars for home missions; 5th. One hundred dollars for ministerial relief; 6th. One hundred dollars for Eureka College on "Educational Day"; 7th. One hundred dollars for church extension; 8th. One hundred average attendance Christian Endeavor meetings; 9th. One hundred average attendance at mid-week prayer-meeting; 10th. Four hundred average attendance at Bible school; 11th. Close year, October 1, 1909, with all bills paid and money in the treasury; 12th. Send at least twelve delegates to the Pittsburg Convention.

H. F. Lutz has recently held a meeting with the Calhoun Street Church, Baltimore.

C. J. Tanner has recently held a meeting at Hiram College with sixteen accessions to the church.

The church at Nevada, Iowa, where B. F. Shoemaker is minister, is in the midst of a building enterprise.

H. D. Williams has begun work at Kalamazoo, and feels most hopeful for the future growth of the church.

The church at Lawton, Okla., besides making a $200.00 improvement in its property, has liquidated a debt of $1,000.00.

B. L. Allen closes his work at Kingfisher March first and begins service as financial agent of Christian University.

A. L. Ward, Boulder, Colo., is preaching a series of Sunday evening sermons on "Elements of Strength in the Early Church."

The church at Long Beach, California, where F. M. Rogers is the new minister, has introduced the Duplex Envelope System for the missionary and current expense offerings.

Oliver W. Stewart continues to push the Prohibition interests with his accustomed vigor. He has just addressed a meeting at Christian Temple, Baltimore, where Peter Ainslie is pastor.

Chas. Reign Scoville is in a meeting with the Central Church, Des Moines. The Church is expecting results surpassing any that have yet been attained by any single body of people in Des Moines.

David C. Peters, pastor at Trinidad, Colo., has accepted a call to the church at Fayette, Idaho, and will begin work with them about the first of March. The Colorado churches thus suffer the loss of one of their best pastors.

The church at Logan, Iowa, where Lew C. Harris is the minister closed a very successful meeting Dec. 22, 1908. They were assisted by General Evangelist C. L. Organ. The churches at Woodbine and Missouri Valley sent delegations to the meetings.

Three important meetings are to be held at the University Church, North Waco, Texas, during the month of January: The Ministerial Institute, January 26-30, Tuesday to Saturday; the South Texas Missionary Rally, January 30 to February 1, Saturday afternoon to Monday afternoon; the Texas Christian Lectureship, February 1 to 4, Monday evening to Thursday evening.

"None of our people can afford to be without at least one of our church papers in this Centennial Year," is the word of the Bulletin of the First Christian Church, Long Beach, California. Mrs. H. W. Johnson, Supt. of Literature for the Woman's Missionary Society also acts as agent for the papers.

The Highland Christian Church, Denver, Colo., recently celebrated its twentieth anniversary with a four-day service. Only nine of the charter members were present to respond to their names at roll-call, five others by letter. The present membership is 400. In these twenty years the church has been served by J. C. Anganier, John L. Brandt, W. A. Harp, Melvin Putman, Grant K. Lewis, H. A. Davis, and J. E. Pickett, who has been with the church for nearly eight years, during which time 422 members have been received. The church is determined that the next twenty years' effort shall in every way surpass the past.

WITH THE WORKERS

A. W. Taylor is in a meeting with the church at Normal, Ill., where Roy McColley is the pastor.

The church at Alliance, Ohio, is rejoicing over having paid its mortgage and having all debts paid.

H. R. Murphy, pastor of the Christian Church at Effingham, Kan., has been elected president of the ministerial association for the year.

By request of the church at Washburn, Ill., Rachester Irwin will remain with them until Spring or such a time as they can secure a suitable successor.

Lewis R. Hotaling is at work enthusiastically at Hoopeston, Ill., and reports frequent additions to the church, and a very encouraging outlook.

The church at Mason City, Iowa, where G. E. Roberts is the enterprising pastor, will begin a meeting in February under the leadership of W. F. Shearer.

The address of the Ohio Christian Missionary Society, H. Newton Miller, Corresponding Sec'y, has been changed from 300 Beckman Bldg. to 864 Rose Bldg., Cleveland Ohio.

L. O. Lehman, Rantoul, Ill., has accepted a call to the church at Gibson City, Ill., where he begins work February 1st. We commend the action of the Gibson City church in sending a committee to Rantoul to hear Mr. Lehman, when he did not know of their presence, thus saving the unnatural situation of a "Trial Sermon."

Under the title, "A Kentucky Ideal of a Century Ago," Hon. Z. F. Smith, the Kentucky historian, contributes an illuminating article to "The Register of the State Historical Society," which gives an account of the founding and growth of Transylvania University, the oldest institution of higher learning west of the Alleghenies.

Another example of the benefits to be derived from federated work among the churches is to be seen in the following announcement: The Home Missions Council, consisting of the Home Mission Boards of the evangelical denominations throughout the United States, is planning for an extensive publicity campaign, which will be conducted in two series, the first being as follows: Brooklyn, January 25 and 26; Hartford, January 26 and 27; Buffalo, January 27 and 28; Cleveland, January 28 and 29; Pittsburg, January 31 and February 1; Baltimore, February 1 and 2; Atlanta, February 3 and 4; Philadelphia, Feb. 9 and 10. The second series will be in the Central West as follows: Cincinnati, March 21 and 22; Nashville, March 22 and 23; St. Louis, March 23 and 24; Kansas City, March 24 and 25; Omaha, March 25 and 26; Minneapolis, March 28 and 29; Chicago, March 29 and 30. A two days' conference will be held in each city, beginning with the afternoon of the first day and closing with the afternoon of the second day. The following subjects will be discussed: "Today's Outstanding Problems of Home Missions;" "The Unity of the Church in its Mission to America;" "A Christianized America—for Nation Building;" "A Christianized America—for World Redemption;" "The Backward People;" "Our Expanding Frontiers;" "The Immigrating and Emigrating Peoples;" "The Church and Its Resources—the Men and the Means;" "City Evangelization;" "The Church and the Labor Movement." It will not be the primary purpose of this campaign to raise money, but to present to the churches of America the importance of the home mission enterprise, particularly as it has developed in recent years.

The church at Oswego, Kan., is to hold a meeting during February. They will be led by Edward Clutter.

W. T. Barbe and the church at Rockville, Ind., are in a meeting assisted by Chas. E. Shultz.

Clarence L. DePew held a Bible school rally at Clayton, Ill., Jan. 10th.

Rolla G. Sears, minister, and Oscar Ingold, evangelist, have been in a successful meeting at Billings, Okla.

Christian Union is being cultivated at Alma, Kan., where R. R. Atkins, pastor of the Christian Church, recently occupied the pulpit of the Congregational Church.

His Double Marriage FREE

OR, THE DEATH-BED COMPACT, By ELLIS CAMPBELL

"Give me the Name of Wife to be buried in?"

Critics pronounce this story one of the greatest love stories ever written When we say free, we mean free, and the book is yours if you will send us five cents to prepay postage, etc. This is not part of a story, it is complete in itself from beginning to end. There are twenty-three chapters embellished with seventeen line drawings. We want you to have a copy free to show you the kind of stories we print in Woman's Home Journal, that handsome ladies' magazine. Woman's Home Journal is a big 20 to 32 page, 4 column magazine, that prints such stories as "Her Strange Marriage! or Wedded to One and Loved Another," Booth Tarkington's "Conquest of Canaan," "The Fatal Ace," by the author of "Rags and Riches," Mary E. Wilkins' "A New England Nun," Herbert Myrick's "A Swim for Life," and Libbie Sprague Phillips' "The Stolen Name of Wife." Besides the special articles, editorials, serials and short stories, there are departments edited for every member of the home; The Family Garden, Good Cooking, Poultry, On Sunday Afternoon, Jottings from Women, How to Live, Embroidery, Practical Fashions, &c., &c. Just now considerable space is being devoted to "Motherhood and Babyhood" Articles, offering helps and hints to young mothers, &c. Each issue is embellished with a new and striking original cover. The type is clear and readable; like the story "His Double Marriage," the magazine is entirely different from the ordinary run of publications. The regular subscription price is 25 cents a year, but if you send your subscription in reply to this advertisement, we will also send you the complete story, "His Double Marriage." This offer gives you the magazine at our special club rate of 20 cents a year and 5 cents for the book, 25 cents in all. Here is a synopsis of the story: Goeffery Berris, an Englishman, while in Africa marries an adventuress by the name of Alicia. Later it is discovered that instead of being heir to his uncle's estate Berris is expected to marry Leila Merron, who has been left the estate, and thus come into a fortune. Leila thinking herself on her death-bed sends for Geoffery and asks him to marry her. But why tell the plot? The book is free. Send 5 cents to pay postage and 20 cents for a year's subscription, 25 cents in all. Either offer separately, if you desire. Satisfaction guaranteed. Send today.

WITH THE WORKERS

H. G. Bennett is in a meeting at Nanton, Alberta, Canada.

A. W. Conner and his helpers are in a meeting at Worthington, Ind.

The church at LaPorte, Ind., is being assisted in a meeting by C. M. Hughes, singing evangelist.

Clarence Yeuell is in England, visiting relatives and supplying the churches at Liverpool and Southport.

J. D. Garrison, minister at Somerset, Pa., received a check for $40.00 as a Christmas present from his church.

B. D. Adams, returned missionary from India, has been supplying the pulpit of the church at Rochester, Minn.

On Jan. 1st, J. T. Alsup, formerly pastor at New Hampton, Mo., began work in his new field at Metropolis, Ill.

The church at Newkirk, Okla., has just held a very successful meeting, led by W. E. Brickett and wife F. D. Wharton is the minister.

John Young, after six years of successful work at Lodi, California, has closed his work and become pastor of the church at Hollister, California.

There are now 100 members of the training class for preachers and missionaries taught by Bruce Brown at Valparaiso University, Valparaiso, Ind.

The church at Chillicothe, Mo., is to begin a meeting Jan. 21st. They will be assisted by Louis Cupp, pastor of the Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, Mo.

The church at Belding, Mich., W. Winters, pastor, will hold a meeting the last of this month. They have called to their assistance Evangelist W. A. Ward.

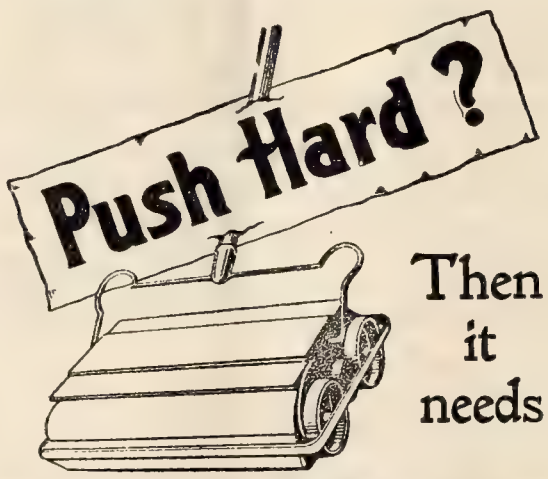
H. D. C. Maclachlan is enthusiastically leading the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., in co-operation with the interdenominational Evangelistic Campaign, with the Chapman-Alexander people.

Frederick F. Grim, Corresponding Secretary for New Mexico, recently held a meeting in San Juan County, which resulted in the organization of twenty-three members. This is a new and very promising country.

The King Hill Church, St. Joseph, Mo., has received eighty-five new members in the past three months. They recently held a reception for the sixty who were received in a meeting held by J. T. Shreve, the minister.

R. L. Prunty has closed a successful eight years of service with the church at Brookfield, Mo., and will labor with the churches at Labelle, Lewistown and Monticello. He leaves the church at Brookfield in most excellent condition.

J. A. Serena, pastor of the church at East Onondaga Street, Syracuse, N. Y., sends us a very interesting and attractive church calendar. It contains full announcements of Sunday-school lessons, prayer-meeting, and Christian Endeavor topics for the year, besides much other attractive material.



Charles Henry Frick, for two years pastor of the church at Grafton, Pa., was married on Dec. 22nd to Miss Bessie Jackson. Mr. and Mrs. Frick were students together at Hiram College, of which Mr. Frick is a graduate. They will be at home at Wilkesbarre, Pa., where Mr. Frick becomes pastor. The Christian Century extends best wishes.

N. H. Sheppard has just closed a four weeks' meeting with the Linden Avenue Church, South Bend, Ind.

The church at Medford, Ore., is in a great meeting, led by Evangelists Whiston and Logan. The audiences have been so large that the second week the church was compelled to go into a tabernacle. It is to be used for the regular work of the church until a new building can be erected for the old one is entirely outgrown. Mario F. Horn is the capable leader of the church.

Mrs. L. G. Bantz, 5664 Vernon Ave., St. Louis, Mo., well known in the state for her service to the C. W. B. M., together with her husband and parents with whom they lived, on January 3rd suffered the loss of their home by fire. The fine brick house with all of its contents were totally destroyed. On account of the loss of the records, THE ADVANCE, the state C. W. B. M. paper cannot be issued this month. Mrs. Bantz will have the hearty sympathy of many in Missouri and other states.

The last year has been the best in the history of the church at Eureka, Ill., where A. W. Taylor has ministered for six years. There were 170 accessions to the church and $4,000 given for missions and benevolences. During the six years there has been a net increase in the membership of 200, with a decrease of 100 in the non-resident membership, owing to a continued effort to induce those who had removed to take membership with churches where they were living. The Sunday-school has doubled in membership and every department of the church is in the best condition.

WITH THE WORKERS

A. J. McLaughlin, pastor at Barry, Ill., has accepted a call to Burlington, Iowa.

W. B. Hopper will reliquish the work at Pana, Ill., to accept the church at Bethany, near Decatur.

A. B. Cox of Salina, Kans., was ordained Sunday, Jan. 3, and has taken up the work at Tescott, Kans.

The Jacksonville, Ill. church is having a prayer meeting of six or seven hundred, since the great union meeting closed two months ago.

David H. Shields of Salin, Kans., will be one of the preachers who will occupy one of the pulpits in Pittsburgh during the centenial.

W. S. Racey, a member of the present Indiana legislature, is a prominent member of the First Christian Church of Vincennes. He is a deacon in the church.

James A. Beaton, for four years pastor of the First Christian Church in Warsaw, Indiana, has resigned his pastorate. He was led to this because of failing eye-sight.

The church at Alexandria, Ind., will graduate its second class in Teacher Training. The exercises will be held on the evening of January 15. There will be ten graduates.

Geo. A. Miller is teaching a Thursday night Bible class at the Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., which has enrolled 140 members. They study the "History of the Early Christian Church."

The official board of Pontiac, Ill., has extended Allen T. Shaw a unanimous call to continue indefinitely. The Bible-school raised over $350.00 the past year and other departments make good reports.

Miss Edna P. Dale, of Wuhu, China, made an address in Atlanta, Ill., church on January 3. The audience showed its appreciation of Miss Dale by giving thirty-five dollars for missions. Ralph V. Callaway is the pastor.

William Petty was elected to the superintendency of the Peru, Ind., Sunday-school for the seventeenth time. He has served in that capacity from the time that the church was orgnized. The Sunday-school is in a flourishing condition.

The occasion of W. M. Groves leaving Petersburg, Ill., was taken by citizens as an opportunity to express their appreciation of him after a seven year pastorate there. A large union meeting was held in the town. Mr. Groves will devote his time to his work as state representative at Springfield.

After four years of constructive ministry with the First Christian Church of Sioux City, Iowa, in which the membership has been more than doubled and a new building erected, the pastor, John Kendrick Ballou, will terminate his ministry with that church about the first of April. The church does not solicit correspondence tor the pulpit.

W. H. Allen, pastor of the Jackson Street Church, in Muncie, Indiana has been appointed to served on the Metropolitan Police Board of the City of Muncie, by Gov. Hanly. The appointment pleases the Law and Order citizens, but it not much relished by the "liberal element." Mr. Allen is also president of the county Anti-saloon League. No man has done more for high civic ideals in Muncie than he. His appointment by Gov. Hanly is a well deserved honor.

TELEGRAMS.

Des Moines, Iowa, Jan. 10, 11, 1909:—In the midst of zero weather. Forty-six added today, twenty-four at great Men's meeting this afternoon. One hundred and eighty-three added in six days of invitations. A great meeting in down town church in city of ninety thousand, a problem, yet whole city deeply stirred. Shop meeting arranged for every noon hour this week. Ministerial association addressed by Brother Scoville. Colleges arranging special meetings. Brother Scoville at his best and his helpers are invaluable in their assistance when rendered by these friends of Jesus.

Finis Idleman.

The Butte, Montana, Church has called Bro. W. M. Jordan of this place to serve them as pastor. This would take him back within a few miles of his boyhood home, and within less than one hundred miles of two different churches, each of which he has served five years as pastor. He will probably accept, though the Billings Church is very sorry to let him go. Butte is the largest city in the state.

Billings, Mont. O. F. McHargue.

Nine additions to the Central Church today. Five young men baptized at evening service.

Denver, Colo. Wm. Bayard Craig.

The church at Freelandsville, Indiana is without a pastor. Mr. Watts who served the church last year closed his work the first of the year.

The church at Franklin, Indiana, is making arrangements to have C. R. Scoville in a great meeting early in the fall. M. B. Ainsworth, of Danville, Ill., has been called to the pastorate of the Franklin Church. He will commence his work about the first Sunday in February.

We are informed of the sudden death of Rev. H. Genders, pastor at Rome City, Ill., January 5th. Mrs. Genders and her father went with the body to Canada where burial will be made. The church people feel the loss keenly as the pastor and his wife were greatly beloved by them.

R. F. Whiston and C. W. Longman, are conducting fine meetings on the Pacific Coast and will probably remain there until June. Their last meeting at Medford resulted in 127 additions. They are now at Albany with J. J. Evans and will be at McMinnville during February. March, April and May are still open.

C. B. Kessinger has been serving the Sunday-school of the First Christian Church in Vincennes, Ind., as superintendent for twelve years. He was elected to serve again for the coming year. Mr. Kessinger is one of the most prominent lawyers in southern Indiana. He is never too busy to look after his Sunday-school.

P. J. Rice, Minneapolis, Minn., announces the following series of Sunday evening sermons: Jan. 10. "What can we do for our children?" A discussion of child labor, care of orphans, care of delinquents. What can the Home, the Public School and the Church do?, etc. Jan. 17. "What about young women?" A study of women in industry, etc. What can the Church do? Jan. 24. "What About Young Men?" A study of actual conditions surrounding us. Boarding houses, etc. What can the Church do? Jan. 31. "Setting Up a Home." A study of the newlyweds, etc.

Pastor Welton is holding a revival at Ashland, Ill.

J. M. Francis of Mt. Vernon, Ill., has accepted the pulpit at Athens, Ill., and will begin work there at once.

The meeting at Atlantic, Iowa, is beginning with large audiences. E. E. Mack, the new minister, is preaching. Charles E. McVay is soloist and song leader.

A. W. Conner and daughter are in a revival meeting with the church at Worthington, Indiana. D. G. Waterman, of Linton, Ind., is assisting also in the meeting.

J. A. Lord is helping W. H. Book, of the Tabernacle Church, Columbus, Ind., in a revival meeting. J. W. Wilson has charge of the music. A splendid meeting is looked for by the church and the pastor.

Geo. L. Snively closed a meeting at Washington, Pa., Jan. 4th. Eighteen additions the last service, 176 in all. E. A. Cole is pastor. Accompanied by singer Altheide, he began on the 10th with B. T. Wharton at Marshall, Mo.

R. F. Thrapp was called twice last week to a conference with the ministerial association in Springfield in preparation for the revival to be held by Mr. Sunday in February. Mr. Thrapp was chairman of the executive committee in his city for Mr. Sunday's meeting.

A. B. Cox, one of our prominent young men, was ordained by this church, Sunday, Jan. 3, to preach. He came to us from a sister church for whom he had preached about a year. He will give half time to Tescott and to Harmony. This is the eighth young man to enter the ministry from this congregation within the past seven or eight years.

The church at St. John, Washington, has just closed a meeting in which there were seventy accessions to the church, seventy-five per cent of whom were men. A much larger number would have probably been received, had the church been able to accommodate the crowds that came, many of whom could not gain entrance to the church. The Bible school has increased from an attendance of 40 to 130. The church is planning to build a larger house of worship, and to call a strong man as pastor.

ROSY AND PLUMP
Good Health from Right Food.

"It's not a new food to me," remarked a Va. man, in speaking of Grape-Nuts.

"About twelve months ago my wife was in very bad health, could not keep anything on her stomach. The Doctor recommended milk half water but it was not sufficiently nourishing.

"A friend of mine told me one day to try Grape-Nuts and cream. The result was really marvelous. My wife soon regained her usual strength and today is as rosy and plump as when a girl of sixteen.

"These are plain facts and nothing I could say in praise of Grape-Nuts would exaggerate in the least, the value of this great food."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

WITH THE WORKERS

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA AND ARIZONA.

Our treasury is greatly in need of funds. Pastors are urged to call loudly and urgently from the pulpit for help for our Home Missionaries. We plead for the payment of the Long Beach convention pledges at once. Send checks payable to the order of the Secretary.

E. W. Thornton is back from the East, a flaming fire-brand in the Sunday-school field. Look out for a conflagration in Los Angeles and vicinity. His first work will be with the great Sunday-school of Magnolia Avenue, where S. J. Chapman is superintendent and Jesse P. McKnight pastor.

Willis S. Myers recently took three weeks from his strenuous city pastorate and held a great meeting at Escondido, with a dead church revived, twenty-two added to the membership, and funds for pastorate support pledged.

The sounding of the hammer and the driving of the plane has been heard in the land in spite of the off year in finance. On Dec. 6th a $2,000 chapel was dedicated at Oceanside, where Oscar Sweeney ministers, Grant K. Lewis officiating; on Dec. 13th, at Holtville, where C. J. Upton takes care of the flock, a $4,000 house was consecrated, R. P. Sheperd being master of ceremonies. Eugene Burr and his thriving congregation at Sawtelle have pushed out the walls and doubled the capacity of their house of worship, which was re-dedicated on Jan. 3rd at the hands of C. C. Chapman; and on Jan. 10th the services of the same Master-dedicator will be required at Huntington Beach, where T. L. Young preaches the word in a new $4,000 edifice.

That intrepid evangelist, John T. Stivers, has just closed a great meeting at Oxnard, with sixty-one additions to the church. This truly wonderful meeting places another long-time mission point safely across the line of self support and makes it by far the largest and most influential church in this great sugar-beet town. The man behind the evangelist, and whose wise leadership makes such a meeting possible is Pastor E. N. Phillips. Our prayers follow the evangelist to the Capitol City of Arizona where he is already in a good meeting with the Central Church where Lawrence Williams is pastor. Roland S. Davidson and wife have recently joined this successful evangelist as personal workers.

The Missionary Boards of the West Coast States have negotiated with Berry Bros. for the purchase of the Pacific Christian, and will assume control March first. J. R. Perkins, pastor at Fresno, will become managing editor. H. Elliott Ward is among the churches canvassing for money. May the brethren be glad to see him and speed him on his way with joy!

Mrs. Princess C. Long is again among her own rejoicing a multitude of friends and the churches with her gift of song. At this writing she is singing with O. P. Spiegel in a meeting of weeks at the Broadway Church, Los Angeles. She is here for service and can be addressed at Long Beach.

Clark H. Marsh closes a happy and successful three years' ministry with the church at Monrovia with the old year. He joins the globe-trotters and leaves for Japan immediately, where he will be occupied for a time in teaching. With his wits sharpened and his heart enlarged by experiences abroad we hope to have him again in our fellowship of California preachers. Chas. T. Radford, son of B. J. Radford of Eureka becomes pastor at Monrovia and is already in the field.

Prof. B. P. Stout, singer and personal worker, has just closed a successful meeting with Oscar Sweeney and the Oceanside Church. The Secretary did much of the preaching; twenty-two souls came out on the Lord's side, greatly strengthening our little church, which now has a membership of fifty. Prof. Stout is a wise personal worker as well as a most gifted singer and has had wide experience in meetings with the great evangelists of the land. Although a Baptist, his work is highly satisfactory to our churches as Brethren Spiegel, Utter, Coulter, Brandt, Smither, Trundle, Martin and others with whom he has served, will attest. We commend him to our churches.

Leander Lane is supplying the work at South Figueroa Boulevard, Los Angeles, recently resigned by E. H. Kellar.

Miss Zonettee Vance, of Deoghur, India, Missionary with the C. W. B. M., is home on a leave of absence and will sojourn in Southern California for a time, and at Long Beach, where she has a number of personal friends. We are glad to welcome, also, to our genial, health-giving clime, another returned missionary in the person of Dr. Olivia Baldwin, who is now at San Diego.

Walter G. Menzies and wife, of Ratn, India, will spend the last week in January and all of February among our churches in Southern California. Everywhere they will be heard with delight and profit. They will be the chief speakers at all the district C. W. B. M. conventions now about to assemble. These missionary meetings mean so much to all our churches that we here publish the schedule, urging all our pastors and brethren, as well as sisters, to attend:

Pasadena—Jan. 28th. Ontario—Jan. 29th.
Redlands—Feb. 5th. San Diego—Feb. 9th.
Orange—Feb. 12th.
Magnolia, L. A.—Feb. 16th.
El Centro—Feb. 19th.
Santa Barbara—Feb. 26th.

I. H. Hazel, of Imperial, became the new pastor at Boyle Heights, L. A.

F. W. Emerson's work at Redlands begins with seventeen added the first month.

W. H. Martin, of Whittier, delivered the first of the series of Centennial Addresses, which will make this year's "preachers' meetings" memorable, at the December meeting. His subject was, "Our Origins," and the address was most thoughtful, eliciting much discussion. At the January meeting W. E. Crabtree has the address on "Thomas Campbell and His Compeers." These meetings are largely attended by both men and women. A. C. Smither and his great church make ideal host and hostesses for this all day meeting without which our delightful fellowship and great work could not be done. P. C. McFarlane, the Secretary of the National Men's Organized work is to visit our section the last week in January. He will meet with a royal welcome. The Men's Social Union of Los Angeles is planning a great gathering of men to meet him on the afternoon and evening of Friday, Jan. 29th. Let the men in all our churches of Los Angeles and environs respond at sound of the bugle call!

Grant K. Lewis, Secretary.

ILLINOIS CENTENNIAL AIMS.

The first aim is an evangelist in each district. There are eight districts and we now have four evangelists. These are in the third, fifth, seventh and eighth districts.

The second aim is fifty thousand dollars in the Permanent Fund. This amount and more is already secured but not yet available. A "Friend" just bought the second annuity bond of $300 on which we pay six per cent. and Bro. Redding Boosenbark of Cambridge who recently died remembered us with a good sum to go into the Permanent Fund as a memorial gift.

The third aim is twenty-five Living-Link churches to our society. It takes $200 from a church to make it a Living-Link. The following churches and ministers are now Illinois Links: Arcola, John I. Gunn; Carthage, W. W. Denham; DeLand, W. T. McConnell; Normal, W. G. McColley; Quincy, Clyde Darsie; First Church, Springfield, F. W. Burnham; First Church, Bloomington, Edgar D. Jones; Camp Point, H. J. Reyuolds. Tazewell county, Mackinaw, J. W. Street; Minier, Harry Walston; Armington, J. C. Lappin and Concord, A. A. Burr.

We are now at the middle of the missionary year and it will take unusual energy to reach our aim in regard to the Links.

The usual number of contributing churches for the past few years is 350 but we ought to go to 450 this year. But it cannot be done by giving State missions the last consideration.

If any church fails to support state and district missions this year the whole service fails so far as that church is concerned.

This is to ask once more that the churches that have not yet contributed will kindly do so.

J. Fred Jones, Field Sec.
W. D. Deweese, Office Sec.
Bloomington, Ill.

THREE OF A KIND

Dropped Coffee, Picked Up Postum, and Health.

The harmful action of caffeine—the drug in coffee and tea—is the same in all cases, it is only a matter of degree.

One person may suffer more in the way of heart palpitation, sour stomach, nervousness, or insomnia, than another, but the poison is there all the time, if one continues to drink coffee or tea.

A Penn. lady and two friends learned the truth about coffee in the same way. The lady writes:—

"About four years ago I had an attack of nervous prostration and a great deal of trouble with my heart. Sometimes feared I was dying, and my doctor seemed unable to find out the cause of my trouble.

"I would frequently wake at night with these attacks and the doctor said there was some constant irritation of the nerves, and he began to think some organic disease was at work.

"One day I was told of a case very similar to mine, and that the woman could find no relief until she stopped using coffee. I did not like the idea of giving up coffee, for I was very fond of it.

"Having read frequently of Postum, I determined to try it. It certainly made a great change in me. Those spells left me entirely.

"My most intimate friend was afflicted as I was. In fact the similarity of our afflictions drew us together in the first place. When she saw the great change Postum had made in me she tried it and was benefited as I was.

"The beneficial effects of Postum on us two induced a neighbor to follow our example and so we are three of a kind who can't say enough in praise of Postum."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full o. human interest.

THE HOLIDAY MONTH AND KENTUCKY MISSIONS.

R. B. Baker added four in Laurel and Clay counties. He finds it difficult to supply the churches with preachers.

Jellico enjoyed the services of R. G. Sherrer all the month and everything moves well.

Twenty-five added at Latonia under preaching of Harvout and Runyon. Many of these additions at regular services. A great loss is sustained in the removal of Dr. Sullivan to Covington.

Two added at Paintsville and A. Sanders thinks that the outlook is good for continued success.

Eleven added by the labors of G. H. Thomas in the second division of the London district.

J. W. Masters reports eighteen added. He is now in Leslie county where we have not a church building. Has found twenty-three people at the county seat who have been members of the church and hopes to organize a congregation and build a house. He reports that we have no house in three other counties—Perry, Letcher and Knott. Some brethren in each county. That is a vast territory—unevangelized—so far as we are concerned.

J. K. Reid closes his work with the Munfordville congregation. Three added. It is proposed by the church not to have regular preaching for a while and to have a strong man for a meeting in the spring.

J. B. Flinchum was sick most of the month. He hopes to be able soon to wage a vigorous campaign in Breathitt county.

J. B. Lockhart and the South Louisville mission are planning a revival in January. The work is responding to the earnest efforts he is making.

W. J. Cocke was sick a part of the month, but was able to be some where every Sunday. He held no meeting. He is now in Trigg county engaged in evangelistic work.

W. J. Hudspeth was at work twenty days of the month. Five added. He was at four points during the month and raised $10.25 for Kentucky Missions.

D. G. Combs preached thirty-seven sermons and added 102 in various ways. With unfailing vigor he continues to preach the gospel in many needy communities in Eastern Kentucky.

Jackson is without a preacher since C. M. Summers closed his work there.

W. F. Smith is leading the religious forces at Morehead with good results.

H. H. Thompson continues to do good work in Pike county. He is planning the most active campaign he has made in that field.

Lebanon House is approaching completion. It is expected that W. J. Cocke shall dedicate it and hold a meeting.

Bromley and L. A. Kohler continue with good outlook the work at Bromley.

Bardstown and J. B. Briney continue to work together during the new year and with continued hope for this hard field.

W. L. Lacy is continued as evangelist in the District of Morgan, Wolf, etc., with plans for the best year's work in their history.

Z. Ball is unceasing in labors in Jackson county and some contiguous fields.

H. W. Elliott reports a good month for the work. $1,628.00 received. We have made an increase over the corresponding months of last year—since the Convention—of about $1,000. Our load is heavier. We urge prompt remittance of all collections. We need them now very much.

CHICAGO

quet at Ionia, Mich. This is the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the church and is Dr. Willett's home church. On January 24, Sunday evening services, Dr. Willett will preach in New York, at the West 56th Street church. On Monday night, January 25, he will speak for the Disciples' Association in New York. On Tuesday morning, January 26, he will speak at the Friend's College, in Philadelphia.

The Monroe Street C. W. B. M. held an evening program, Saturday evening, January 9. The occasion was significant in that the papers were read by members of a neighboring Baptist society. Mrs. Estelle L. Russell furnished beautiful music through a chorus of her vocal pupils. A reception with refreshments followed the exercises.

The rally of the Foreign society held in the Jackson Boulevard Church last Monday was a great success. The crowds were large and the addresses of high order. Stephen J. Corey presided and the returned missionaries who spoke were Dr. Dye, Dr. Layton, H. P. Shaw and M. P. Adams. The local preachers making addresses were A. T. Campbell, Guy Sarvis and O. F. Jordan.

At the dinner hour the King's Daughters of the church served a fine turkey dinner. The dining room was full to overflowing, with three hundred present, we should estimate.

The work of Secretary Corey is unique, and of a fine religious tone. He redeems the missionary addresses from the sickly sentimentality that characterizes some of that work, and puts into it a fine religious tone. His idea of using stereopticon pictures and moving pictures was unique and successful in point of getting a crowd and in educational effect. A crowd filling the church was at the evening service.

On Wednesday, Jan. 13, at 4 p. m., in Haskell Assembly Hall at the Uuiversity of Chicago, will begin the series of Haskell lectures on The Religion of Persia, to be given by Prof A. V. Williams Jackson of Columbia University, New York. These lectures, six in number, will be in part illustrated with the stereopticon, and should be of much interest to the general public. A hearty invitation is extended to all members of this congregation to attend the series.

Beautify Your Complexion

Drive Away Liver Spots, Blotches, Pimples And Make Your Skin Clear and White.

Trial Package Sent Free.

If you want a beautiful complexion, free from liver spots, pimples and freckles and other discolorations, purify your blood.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers cleanse and clear the blood, remove all poisonous and irritating influences and permit it to flow gently and uniformly all through the veins. These little wafers are famous for their beautifying effects and every lady may use them with perfect freedom.

They do their good work remarkably fast owing to the wonderful power of the ingredients which they contain. Here they are: Calcium Sulphide, Quassia, Eucalyptus, Golden Seal and an alterative and laxative. Ask your doctor what he thinks of these as blood purifiers. He prescribes them many times every year.

The popularity of Stuart's Calcium Wafers is great and growing constantly every year. They do a wonderful work with apparently little effort and do not necessitate suffering and expense as so many complexion cures occasion.

You may enjoy a fair complexion if you will use these little wafers. They are taken after each meal and go into your blood, just like food. They do your entire system a great good. They help your intestines and relieve constipation, thereby giving the system the power to remove and exclude poisonous gases and fluids which filter through the intestines into the system and contaminate it.

Don't despair if your complexion is muddy. Write today for a free trial package of Stuart's Calcium Wafers or go to your druggist and buy a box. Price 50c. Simply write your name and address and a trial package will be sent you by mail without cost. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 175 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

MISSION AND BENEVOLENT NOTES.

Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts of $500 each on the Annuity Plan; one from a friend in Virginia and one from a friend in Texas. There is a steady growth in the Annuity Fund of the Fereign Society.

The churches are now beginning an active campaign of preparation for the March offering for fereign missions the first Sunday in March. There is a wide-spread feeling that the churches will make a great record this year. Already a number are considering the Living-Link step.

Pres. A. McLean and Sec. Stephen J. Corey of the Foreign Society, are again holding foreign mission rallies with the aid of moving picture scenes on the mission fields. Two missionaries are with each. They are doing great things in awakening missionary interest and creating a missionary conscience. The attendance upon these rallies is large and enthusiastic.

The National Benevolent Association has just received an annuity of $6,300 from a friend in Missouri. This good man is preparing to close up his business so as to be in readiness to "go Home." He said, "I want to remember my Lord and I do not know how better to do it than by helping to provide for some of the "least of these my brethren." Another man and wife are about to give $5,000 for the work in behalf of the aged, indigent brethren.

The Texas brethren and the National Benevolent Association have decided to raise a sum sufficient for the erection of a Home for the Aged in Dallas. This is to be one of Texas' Centennial gifts. What more fitting testimonial could be made of our gratitude to God for one hundred years of blessing.

After twenty years of residence at 915 Aubert avenue, St. Louis, Mo., the Christian Orphans' Home has removed to its new home 2949 Euclid avenue, St. Louis. This is a beautiful building costing about $80,000 of which amount Robt. Stockton gave $50,000. The home was badly needed. Mr. Stockton required the Benevolent Association to furnish $30,000. This with the furnishing has taxed the resources of the Association. There is an indebtedness. All the friends of the orphans are invited to help clear this beautiful Centennial Home from indebtedness.

The C. W. B. M. and The National Benevolent Association will again unite in observing Easter. In the absence of a calendar of days giving each interest of the church the recognition due it, this seems the best that can be done. The churches, Bible-schools, Junior societies and Mission Bands will make a joint Easter offering for the Christlike ministry of feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and sheltering the homeless children of all lands. They are to make their own division of the offering, sending a portion to the Benevolent Association for orphans in our homeland. Easter supplies should be ordered at once. All should have fellowship in this holiest of ministries. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Wanted: An Idea Big Enough For Our Men

Our men are looking for a name. They have advertized to give twenty-five dollars for the most satisfactory one proposed.

A good name is a good thing. It will be worth more than the prize they offer for it. As a handle helps a tool, so a good name will help our men's movement.

But a much more serious consideration for the infant organization is: What shall it live for? What end shall it accomplish? What goal shall it seek?

The men's movement is well under way in other churches. It would be advisable for the Disciples of Christ in organizing their's to take advantage of the experience of others. Thus our slight tardiness in taking up the work might be atoned for by the excellence of our organization.

The weakness of the men's club in the local church is that it has no idea big enough for men to work for.

The ordinary men's club has ideas—many of them. But these ideas are not organized together by a single idea that is big enough and worth enough to appeal strongly and constantly to men.

Is not this the history of the men's club in your church: The proposal for the men to have an organization of their own met with instant popularity: a goodly company turned out at the first meeting: perhaps a banquet was served and paid for by some devoted member of the church who wished to avoid the necessity of charging the guests, or it may have been the pastor who stood this expense: speeches were made, songs were sung, the men "limbered up" and told stories: the pastor was toasted, the coming revival was talked up, a shot was taken at the saloon in the next block, some hard blows were given the alderman of the ward or the city administration which were applauded with cries of "hit 'em again": the company broke up with a feeling of acquaintance, of fellowship, which they had never been able to realize in a mixed social gathering: the sense of power, too, was awakened, the feeling that this company of Christian men could almost work miracles if it worked together in organized fellowship: the next meeting was held pursuant to adjournment: not half as many were present: there was no banquet this time, only coffee and doughnuts: the pastor hadn't been buttonholing men for ten days previous: the officers elected at the banquet had not taken their positions seriously and had not "worked up" the attendance: the evening passed with a little desultory entertainment: the pastor exhorted a bit: and the meeting adjourned: four weeks later, just before the sermon, the usher brought a notice down the aisle to the pastor from the president of the men's club saying that next Tuesday evening was the regular time for that organization to meet and inviting all men to come: a half dozen came, talked a bit and went home: the names of the officers of the club appear in the monthly paper of the church, and being men of prestige in the community, the casual attendant is impressed with the formidableness of the enterprise—but the men's club lives only as a memory in the minds of those who attended that first banquet. Why should such an auspicious beginning prove so abortive?

The reason is not that the men were not in earnest, but that they were not given an idea big, clear and worthy enough to command their allegiance.

They were brought together for a good time or for fellowship or to promote a specific enterprise like a revival; but they never had a big enough conception of their business to keep them working at it after the banquet was over and the novelty was worn off. Perhaps the assumption upon which most efforts to organize men have proceeded is either that men are hungering for fellowship, that they want somewhere to spend their evenings in good companionship or that they ache for something to do, some task to work at. This task is usually some practical matter about the church, the financing of a building enterprise or a revival, or it may be to clean up the community morally by ousting a saloon or widening prohibition territory or wiping out a nuisance of some sort.

Over against these considerations we are now saying that men must have an idea to work for and to work out.

Why do we say an idea, and not a task? Is not man a worker primarily? We answer, no. He is primarily an idealist. No man is just aching to work for its own sake. He wants to work because the doing of that work fits into an ideal scheme of his life. The work must mean something to him.

Likewise the church man will do church work, will support his men's organization, if he feels that it is necessary to the working out of an idea that has already gripped him. If your men's club is organized for doing a task the task will soon be done and your men's club with it. But if it is organized on account of an idea, a vision, possessing the minds of its members, there will be not one task, but many, that will follow in the wake of this idea as means to the end devoutly wished for. No organization comes to much which is principally for work. It must become idealized in order to be worth while.

In our observation the men's clubs have not become idealized. Some of them approach it in those denominations which have set up their sectarian principles as ends for which the men are to strive.

Nor will men long support a club that bases itself on mere good-fellowship. Men tire of their social clubs, there is no ideal worth to them. No big ends are being wrought out through them.

The fine, rich fellowships of life are rooted in co-operative service for some idea.

Masculine fellowship in the church does not need to be planned for. Like happiness, if you seek it you miss it. But let our men get hold of a big idea and feel that they are responsible for its working out and you will be astonished at the fellowship they develop in the process.

That was the way Jesus got men. He did not coax and coddle them with promises of ease and indulgence. Neither did he bluntly point them to a task to do. He opened their minds, he made them see, he gave them an idea that burned in their consciousness and they left all and worked for it and found such fellowship in the doing that the world pointed to them and marveled, "how those Christians love one another."

The next step in the organizing of our men is to agree upon an idea that is worth while and to enlist our men in it. From the very start our men's clubs should take on this ideal character. They are not interested in merely adding another organization to the already overloaded congregation unless the organization can be pointed directly at some goal. But they will respond with might and enthusiasm if we can suggest to them an end that is worthy their enthusiasm.

What the men's movement needs is some idea corresponding to the idea of our plea for union which shall possess the men as our plea possesses the whole brotherhood. It is this conviction of a plea, of a big idea worthy to command us, that has made the Disciples the mighty brotherhood we are, and marks us as unique among our Christian brethren. Is there any idea like this, big enough for the men? We believe Mr. Macfarlane would give more than a twenty-five dollar prize for such an idea. Not in the hope of a reward, but out of our deep concern for the great cause we would suggest an idea that is worthy. Our suggestion may seem too obvious to need consideration. But the longer it is thought on the more pertinent and satisfying it will appear.

Here is an idea big enough and worth enough for our men's movement to make it their motive and goal: THE UNION OF ALL CHRISTIANS OF ALL SECTS UPON THE LORD JESUS CHRIST ALONE.

But that is the plea of our whole brotherhood, some one objects? Precisely so. And our reason for suggesting it as the idea that is to be made vividly conscious to our men is that this plea of our brotherhood will not be realized until our men take it to heart and go about doing it. The time is ripe for doing as well as preaching the plea. The preachers have been doing their part and have almost finished it. The call is now for doers.

Our laymen in our local churches are in a position to actualize Christian union through their organization more in the next ten years than our preachers and editors and colleges can do in fifty years.

THE TREND OF EVENTS

By Alva W. Taylor

ALL THE WORLD'S AKIN

We may curse the "Dago" when he seeks his living in our neighborhood or honestly deplore his intrusion in such great numbers upon our shores but our hearts turn to him and we brush away the sympathizing tear that we may more adequately show our sympathy with that which his great need demands. The national government votes an unprecedented sum, the states vie with one another to aid, the cities become veritable depots for collecting funds and, all-told, more than two millions of dollars has been sent with another million in fair way to come. The Red Cross has handled already over eight hundred thousand dollars and not only prove its efficiency but again defied all provincial and national boundaries and marked the way of fellow-help as the golden road to world-wide unity. It is probable that a quarter of a million lost their lives. The world has seen few such calamities.

PUNISHMENT OR REFORMATION

Judge Cleland was elected to the new municipal court bench in Chicago and, being both a good Christian and a social student, he used his legal right to the utmost to suspend sentence on good behavior and found that out of over 1300 cases, only 10% failed to live up to their chance. It did great good, demonstrated its economy to the city, proved that reformation is better than social revenge (otherwise called punishment), aroused the wrath of legal dogmatists and the envy of some on the bench, and resulted in the Judge being transferred from a criminal to a chancery court. Now an Adult Probation Law will be urged before the legislature and if social good proves mightier than legal tradition, Judge Cleland's sacrifice will not be in vain, for whereas he may have strained the law in the name of mercy, he will have constrained all courts to a custom of mercy.

FOR THE COMMONWEAL

The principal subjects for sober legislation in the various state assemblies this winter are for the social welfare. There will be the usual amount of political jockeying, and Illinois bids fair to lead all competitors in that line, but most of the state legislatures are immaculate as compared with those of ten year ago, and sober efforts for the weal of the common folk get a chance. The most progressive of the middle-western states will be concerned with Employer's Liability, Industrial Safety and Temperance laws, while in the trans-Missouri states Mr. Bryan's Bank Deposit Guarantee idea will be considered, and in the South, temperance will have the center of the stage. Oklahoma's success with this insurance of depositors will force consideration in Kansas, Colorado and Nebraska. The Tennessee House has already passed a state-wide prohibition law and both Texas and Arkansas are expected to submit the proposition to a popular referendum. The fact that 30,000 die annually in the peaceful pursuits of industry while 2,000,000 are wounded, ought to make Industrial Safety and Employer's Liability laws a question as burning as a war issue. Many of the states will consider schemes to elect U. S. Senators by popular vote and in Ohio particularly the effort to obtain the Initiative and referendum will be vigorous. All these are measures for the common weal and challenge the interest of all who believe government exists for social welfare.

HOW THE RAILROADS FARED

We have heard much of the pitiful conditions of the railroads the past year and of how "adverse" legislation was making paupers of them. That ever-warning cry, "the workmen's wages," has sounded out to deter legislatures and those executives who have insisted that public servants such as our common carriers, owe allegiance to that same public whom they serve. The Interstate Commerce Commission rudely brushes the tear from our eyes in revealing the true state of railway earnings. They show in that the two years before the last were exceptional in railroad prosperity and that while there was a falling off the past year, there was yet a great increase over the average of previous years. In other words, that we must not judge the state of railway finance by taking the most plethoric years of their life as an irreducible minimum. They were less crowded with business last year and accidents were cut in two. It may be questioned by Christians whether or not some hundreds of lives saved and countless maimed and injured are not a slight recompense for reduced dividends, and also whether shorter hours and greater safety is not some compensation though trains must go a little slower, be a little less luxurious and earnings be so reduced that stock-watering is no longer a considerable source for railroad millions. People who are content to earn their bread by the sweat of their brow cannot really see the objection urged against putting the whole railroad business on a basis of actual investment and most of them will say a devout "amen" to the revolutionary demand of the Commission that when Mr. Harriman assumes control of both the Southern and the Union Pacific, two great competing transcontinental lines, he "can no longer claim the protection (of secrecy) which as a private citizen engaged in a strictly private pursuit he might insist upon." The reason it gives is that "if this gentleman is allowed to accumulate from the manipulation of these public agencies, vast sums of money which must finally come from the body of the people, we think he is so far a trustee of the people that he cannot object to stating the manner in which these accumulations have been made."

CHRISTIAN UNION ON THE MISSION FIELD

The "regions beyond" are leading the world in actual Christian Union. They are not prejudiced by our traditions and cradled in our creeds. The missionaries, howsoever sectarian when they go, are soon so overwhelmed with the need before them that they become one that the world may believe Christ was sent.

One of the most notable of late achievements is the founding of Chentu Union University in Western China by seven missions there, viz.: American Baptist, Canadian Baptist, Methodist, Friends (of England), London Missionary Society (Congregational), Church Missionary Society (Episcopalian), and the Chinese Inland Mission (Interdenominational). Both Western and Northern China have educational Unions. In Peking is the Union College of Theology and in Nanking the Disciple and Presbyterian colleges have united and it is expected the Methodist will soon join in the merger. In Calcutta the two great Presbyterian bodies of Scotland have united their schools under the name of Calcutta Christian College and going a step further have merged the work of all their missions in that city. Will it not follow as the day the dawn that the churches at home will follow? Everywhere the schools tend to get together and this means the education of a native ministry knowing more and more the one church of Christ only, and as they have in their hands the evangelization of the next generation and will mould the transition period from the missionary to the independent and self-supporting native church they will make of it the one church.

This is already illustrated in Japan where the churches of the Congregational and Presbyterian missions tend to get together as soon as they become self-supporting and the Kumai or Independent Movement is for one church of Christ in Japan. There the Presbyterian missions of all bodies have united under the title, Church of Christ in Japan. In Korea they have done likewise and also in North India while in South India the various Presbyterian bodies first united and the Congregational missions of the London Society and the American Board had merged interests and now these have joined in a union of the unions as the United Church of South India. In Japan the American and English missions are united and the various Methodist bodies have both joined forces and elected a native bishop.

The general movement received its greatest impetus in the great Shanghai Conference in celebration of the Morrison Centenary. It published to the world that they were "one in Christ," resolved to form both National and Provinsial councils many of the latter of which are already organized, engaged to try to prevent trenching upon one another's fields, and asked all the churches of China to pray every Lord's day for the unity of the church. What men pray for devoutly they soon attain. In India the Anglicans have met with all others in a General Missionary Conference. Japan has a Standing Committee of Co-operating Christian Missions, and it is planning for a jubilee celebration of missionary effort there this year. In Korea the Presbyterian and Methodist bodies have a General Council planning to create one church for all Korea which Dr. Dennis says is "the most unreserved approach toward a practical answer to our Lord's prayer for unity which has been presented in the annals of modern church history."

The Y. M. C. A. is a powerful factor for unity in the foreign field for it stands as a living realization of its working basis, organized as it is for Christ and the deed rather than for the Christ of a creed. It has eighty secretaries on the foreign field and ten thousand studying missions at home.

Robert Speer sounded a ringing note at the recent Federal Council of Churches in Philadelphia, when he said, "I believe it is far more important that the Presbyterians of Japan should relate themselves to the Methodists of Japan, than that either of these bodies should retain any connection whatever with any ecclesiastical organization in the United States."

Forty Years

With the close of 1908 Dr. J. H. Garrison completed forty years of service as an editor among the Disciples of Christ. This is an event of unusual character. In our times journalism is not sufficiently definite as a profession to enlist the life-long services of a large group of men. Most men, however expert in editing or publishing, especially in the field of a religious journalism, are more or less loosely attached to that task, and spend only a part of their lives in active relation to the paper. But Dr. Garrison has consistently maintained his place and has grown in the esteem and affection of the Disciples through all these years.

It is not too much to say that the Disciples of Christ have produced three men who successfully led the brotherhood toward the larger things of the Kingdom of God. These men have been Alexander Campbell, Isaac Errett, and J. H. Garrison. Each of these men has been chiefly an editor. It is not to be forgotten that their services rendered in other ways have been notable. Alexander Campbell was a debater and a preacher of great power and was for many years a college instructor. Isaac Errett was perhaps one of the most effective public speakers the Disciples have ever known. Dr. Garrison has been in great demand as a preacher during the whole period of his public work. And yet it is as editors that these three men have made their influence felt upon the lives of the Disciples of Christ.

If any one thinks that the course of religious journalism is smooth and easy it is highly probable that Dr. Garrison could disillusion such a dreamer. There were stormy days in the early times of the Christian-Evangelist. The great success and the wide-spread influence to which that journal has come in later years has been the result of the strong and vigorous purpose of its editor. Dr. Garrison has always maintained a mind open to the enlarging truth of the Kingdom of God. He has set his face to the future while maintaining the assured verities of our faith. If at times some of us have felt that his attitude was lacking in boldness and that he was hampered by elements of conservatism that threatened to diminish the value of the Evangelist as a strong and virile journal, we have also to remember that he has been as vigorously assailed by those who felt that he was radical and rash. Perhaps his success as a true leader of the Disciples has been in no small degree owing to his ability to sense an average opinion and to express that opinion in pleasing and brotherly fashion.

Dr. Garrison has led the Disciples past a number of side-paths into which they might easily have been diverted. He has kept to the open highway of New Testament teaching and has assisted in the formation of the right sort of sentiment not only by his weekly utterances through the columns of the Christian-Evangelist, but in those small volumes which he has dropped from time to time in the progress of his work. Among these such titles as, "Alone with God," "Helps to Faith," and "The Heavenward Way" are familiar. He has also edited two volumes, "The Faith Re-stated" and The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century," which have consisted of papers contributed by others.

During the past year a great deal of uneasiness has been felt by hosts of his friends owing to his long continued illness, with the suffering which it caused him. But it has been a joy of late to see him once more at his place, refreshed and apparently as vigorous as ever. No tolerance could be given for a moment to the suggestion that his work is approaching its end. Rather is he in position to render the most valuable service of his life in these days of reconstruction. We have had occasion to differ with Dr. Garrison at times over methods and interpretations, but never for a moment has there been any failure on our part to recognize his loyalty to the Scriptures and the Christ of whom they speak. We hope that these relations may continue for many years to come and that the Christian-Evangelist may continue to be a leading force in the brotherhood of the Disciples.

Religious Education and Social Duty

There is to be held in this city during February another of the great conventions of the Religious Education Association. These conventions have done more to bring together workers in the different fields of religious education and moral betterment than any other single force in the history of American Christianity.

The Convention returns to Chicago after an interval of six years. It was in this city that the first Convention was held, and great as was that gathering it is hoped that the approaching one may be of even greater significance. The sessions are to be held February 9, 10, and 11 in Orchestra Hall, in other nearby halls, and in churches in the vicinity of 22nd St. and Michigan Ave. The central theme of the Convention will be "Religious Education and Social Duty," and some of the most notable names in education and religious work will be upon the programme. Among others there will be President Francis G. Peabody, President Eliot of Harvard, President C. S. Mitchell, Professor Geo. A. Coe, President King, Miss Jane Addams, Professor Charles R. Henderson and Bishop Lawrence.

The principal sessions are to be held in the Theodore Thomas Orchestra Hall on Michigan Avenue, and the departmental sessions will meet in neighboring halls and churches. While the open meetings will be of interest because of the greatness of the themes discussed, such as the "Social Consciousness and the Religious Life," the "Annual Survey" of progress in religious education, the "Ethics of Industrialism," the "Reaction of Modern Life upon Religious Development," and "Religious Training in the Modern World," the departmental meetings will be of almost equally interesting character.

These departments include Universities and Colleges, secondary schools, fraternal organizations, correspondence associations, young people's societies, the home, the Sunday-school, public libraries, art and music, and churches and pastors. Chicago has entertained nearly four hundred conventions during the past year, but not one of them has been of greater moment to the city and country than will be this approaching gathering.

Many ministers and teachers from among the Disciples will be present. All who can possibly arrange to attend the Convention should do so. As far as possible the visiting delegates will be accommodated either in private homes or in hotels at special rates. The Lexington Hotel at Michigan Ave. and 22d St. will be the hotel headquarters. All delegates will be registered there upon arrival. Most of the departmental meetings will be convenient to this hotel.

Those who are desirous of securing information regarding entertainment, programme, or any other features of the Convention may do so by addressing the Religious Education Association, 72 East Madison Street, Chicago. On request, bulletin of programme and arrangements will be sent to any inquirer.

The Pioneers and Foreign Missions

As we turn our eyes toward the March Offering for Foreign Missions this Centennial year, it is altogether fitting that we recall the attitude and temper of the pioneers of the Restoration on the absorbing question of the world's evangelization. The following excerpts are only samples of many of the same tenor that might be quoted. A consuming passion for the spread of the gospel among all men took complete possession of them. If our people should lose that temper, it will be the beginning of the end with us. This fact should be continually emphasized in all our churches.

"Let all Christians, therefore, unite in prayer, that God would send forth faithful laborers into his harvest; that the word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified; that his Spirit may be poured out upon his ministers and people; that through them he may 'reprove the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment.' That he would collect and unite into one his scattered flock, that the whole world may believe in Christ the Savior of sinners."

Barton W. Stone.

"The diffusive benevolence of Christianity is nowhere more strikingly exemplified than in the establishment of Foreign Missions.

"This missionary enterprise is, by universal concession, as well as by the oracles of God, the grand work of the age; the grand duty, privilege, and honor of the church of the nineteenth century.

"We shall do more at home by doing something abroad. If the apostles had continued in Jerusalem until all its citizens were converted, they never would have planted a church in Samaria nor anywhere else."

Alexander Campbell.

"Christs's soldiers are like him. They love one another as he loved them. His mission was to save a lost and ruined world, and in obedience to his mandate, it is their delight to lift his banner to the heavens and bear it to the earth's remotest bounds. They ask no furlough until Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hands to God and all the Islands of the Sea rejoice.

John T. Johnson.

"What a splendid field for holy enterprise was laid open to the apostles when Jesus said to them: 'Go ye into all the world, proclaim the glad tidings to the whole creation.' Before his death and while they aided him in his personal mission, the commandment was 'Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into any city of Samaritans, enter ye not'; but now, having consummated his mission, and arisen from the dead, the sphere of their mission was to be extended to the utmost bounds of the habitable world. 'Go ye into all the world!' Great was the field, and we do not read that these illustrious ministers, who alone enjoyed the distinction of being ambassadors instead of Christ, ever addressed to angels or demons the word of reconciliation. Their mission was glorious and extensive, but it was limited to the children of men, and like their Master, they discovered no desire to transcend the limits to which, in his instructions, he had restricted them."

Walter Scott.

Let us remind ourselves that our plea is essentially a missionary movement. Our slogan for the March Offering should be: An offering from every church; a gift from every member. Please order March Offering Supplies today. Do it now lest you forget.

Remember March 7th!

The Foreign Society is just in receipt of another Annuity gift, amounting to $2,000, from a friend of the work. This friend formerly gave $10,000. This gift swells his benefaction to $12,000. He is a consecrated, level-headed, business man, with a high appreciation of the safety and value of the Annuity Fund of the Foreign Society. All the indications point to a large increase in the number and the amount of Annuity gifts for Foreign Missions for this Centennial year. Two friends are considering a gift of $5,000 each.

Dr. Royal J. Dye reports fifty more baptisms at Bolenge, Africa. Some of these came as far as 250 miles up the main Bosira River, and others came as far as 200 miles. The great need for the work in the Congo is a steamer, to enable the missionaries to go from point to point. A new station has been granted our Foreign Society by the State authorities at Longa, 100 miles beyond Bolenge, up the Bosira River.

The articles by Burris A. Jenkins and Vernon Stauffer printed in our last two issues, were portions of their respective papers at the Triangular Congress of the Baptists, Free Baptists and Disciples in Chicago in November. They are typical of the temper of the speeches at that significant gathering and should whet the appetite of our readers to possess the published "Proceedings" of the Congress which form a volume of rare interest. This book is just off the press. The contents are as follows:

I. Does the New Testament Contemplate the Church as an Institution?—Prof. John A. Logan, Rev. A. W. Fortune, Rev. W. B. Wallace, Prof. Shirley J. Case.

II. Addresses of Welcome—President Harry Pratt Judson, Rt. Rev. Samuel Fallows.

Response—Rev. John L. Jackson.

III. What are the Legitimate Limits of Free Speech in a Republic?—Hon. Wallace Heckman, Prof. James Q. Dealey, Rev. Bayard Craig, Rev. C. D. Case.

IV. The Doctrine of Atonement in Terms of Modern Thought—Rev. B. A. Jenkins, Rev. Frederick Lent, Prof. Leroy Waterman, Prof. Allan Hoben.

V. What Definite Steps Should be Immediately Taken in the Organic Union of Baptists, Free Baptists, and Disciples of Christ?—Rev. I. J. Spencer, Rev. L. A. Crandall.

VI. Is Psycho-Therapeutics a Function of the Church?—Rev. Robert, MacDonald, Rev. J. Stanley Durkee, Rev. Allan B. Philputt, Rev. Rufus P. Johnston.

VII. Christ's Prayer for Unity—Rev. A. W. Jefferson, Rev. Vernon Stauffer, Rev Henry M. Sanders.

VIII. Closing Words—President's closing address, Rev. W. C. Bitting, Prof. Errett Gates.

Proceedings of the Baptist Congress at Chicago, 1908. The University of Chicago Press, postpaid 59 cents.

The students and faculties of the University of Chicago as well as many others very greatly enjoyed last week the presence and utterance of Professor A. Williams Jackson, Ph. D., of Columbia University, who delivered a course of six lectures on the Religion of Persia. These lectures began with a general statement regarding Persia and its ancient books. The second lecture was devoted to Zoroaster, one of the great religious teachers of the east. The remainder of the lectures were given to Zoroastrianism, Mithraism, Manichaeism, and Mazdakism. These lectures were particularly interesting as bearing not only upon the relations of Israel to the ancient Persian faith, but also as noting the influence of certain of these doctrines upon the early church, notable in the case of Manichaeism. Professor Jackson is probably the greatest American authority on the religion of Persia, and his scholarly and yet popular presentation of his theme greatly pleased and instructed his hearers.

The fifth annual conference on Child Labor, under the auspices of the National Child Labor Committee is being held in Chicago this week, the day sessions at the Auditorium Hotel and evening sessions at Orchestra Hall. Prominet workers in this field of social service from many parts of the country are on the program, and such themes as The Child and the Law, Child Labor in the Ohio Valley, Child Labor and the Public Welfare, The Federal Children's Bureau, and Types of Working Children. are being discussed.

The contribution on Yuan Shih Kai, by Dr. Paul Wakefield, will be read with interest by all who have gained so much as a taste of things Oriental in the past few years. Dr. Wakefield was a missionary in China until a year ago and had occasion to study Chinese conditions at close range. Since coming home he has kept in touch with doings in that land through regular reading of Chinese newspapers. He suggests three available books, "China and America Today," by Arthur Smith; "The Coming Struggle in Eastern Asia," by Putnam Weale, and 'Tomorrow in the Orient," by Douglas Storey.

Next week it is our purpose to send the Christian Century for the fourth time to all the ministers of the Brotherhood. The Department of Biblical Problems will contain a communication from Z. T. Sweeney, which we have been saving for this issue that it and Professor Willett's response might be read as widely as possible. This we know will gratify the group of brethren who have collaborated with Mr. Sweeney in preparing his contribution and who have shown through correspondence with us and in the columns of a contemporary paper that they were a bit fearful their literary effort would go to the waste-basket. We confess to being somewhat puzzled, however, in spite of our firm purpose to risk our Biblical Problems Editor in a further encounter with the giant. The Christian Standard insists in one issue that a man's opinions on matters of philosophy may be what he wills, but let him hold them in private. If he speaks, let him speak only of his faith and not of his opinions. But Mr. Sweeney insists on Mr. Willett's pronouncement of opinion. The Standard taunts him because he has not yet published his opinion in reply to Mr. Sweeney. Doesn't this look like baiting a man to do what you know is wrong for him to do? Really our Biblical Problems Editor would like to obey the Standard, but if he obeys the Standard of January 16, he falls under condemnation of the Standard of January 9! It is a hard position! Anyhow, Mr. Sweeney's communication will be responded to next week.

Professor J. W. McGarvey in a recent number of the Christian Standard complains of a statement made in the Christian Century last fall that he held a doubtful opinion of the canonicity of the Song of Solomon. We received a denial of this position from Prof. McGarvey. We wrote him that before correction was made in the Century concerning his present views, we would like the privilege of looking up his public utterances on the question and asked him where we might find such utterances. This information he refused to give and continued to demand the correction in the Century. Press of other duties has made us slow in publishing what Prof. McGarvey really said. This we do now, quoting from his "Guide to Bible Study," in the Bethany Reading Course, a series of books for young people of the Christian Endeavor Society, on page 76:

"The title which the short poem assigns itself is 'The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's.' If there be any book in the Bible which found a place in it by a mistake or a misjudgment of those who put the inspired book together, it must be this; for it is so totally unlike all the rest that it is difficult to see what connection it can have with the general design of the whole. Many interpreters have affected to find in it a parabolic meaning, and even a foreshadowing of the love of the Church for Christ; while others have regarded it as nothing more than a love song with a very obscure connection of thought. According to either view, it has afforded little edification to the great majority of Bible readers; and unless some significance can be found in it hereafter which has not yet been pointed out, it will continue to be but little read, and of but little practical value."

Below this statement is a note by Dr. Willett who worked with Professor McGarvey on the book stating his view of the matter, and expressing a belief that the book had a useful message for the present age.

We have four good things to congratulate our readers on this week. First, that we are about to begin a superb serial story by Harold Bindloss entitled "Winston of the Prairies." Mr. Bindloss is the author of the "Cattle Baron's Daughter." Second, we have "annexed" Rev. Burris A. Jenkins, of Kansas City, to our contributorial staff. He is only giving a bit of an appetizer this week. The title under which his article will appear "The Gate of the West," gives him room to write significant news from Kansas City, or to make a contribution to any subject he is prompted to undertake. Third, Rev. Richard W. Gentry, of Chicago, one of our younger writers, will begin to write suggesively on the Christian Endeavor topic, keeping company with Professors Jones and Willett in their articles on prayer-meeting and Sunday-school. Fourth, Mr. Nicholas Vachel Lindsay has put into our keeping certain literary treasures such as the Outlook is now printing from his pen. These we shall purvey to our readers as fast as space will allow. Certainly the character of material going into the Christian Century promises to make it not only a reflector but a leader of sentiment and taste among the Disciples of Christ. That it shall be this, at any rate, is our desire and prayer.

Yuan Shih Kai

By Paul Wakefield, M. D.

There was strife in the Royal Palace. The "Son of Heaven" (Kuang Su) had gained control of affairs and put into effect numerous reform measures, setting aside the "Customs of the Ancients," and threatening the whole corrupt political machine at Pekin. The ministers were in terror. Should the Emperor go further, they would probably be ousted, or executed. Appeal was made to the Head Eunuch, (the most crafty politician) to save them. Alas, he was madly trying to save himself! The Empress was powerless. The army was out of her hand. But the Empress, above everything else, was a politician, and won every fight of any account she went into. So—we shall see.

In the Province of Chili, there was an ambitious young military officer named Yuan Shih Kai, who very strangely had used the military tax coming into his hand honestly, to build up his army. It seemed a foolish thing to do, but Yuan Shih Kai saw far. In a few years, by aid of German officers and foreign guns, he had built up a small army of really efficient fighting men. A small army, yet, without doubt, his army could withstand the Imperial thousands.

In the crisis, the Empress and Emperor as well, rushed to our petty oficer of Chili, and from that day till the death of the Empress, Yuan Shih Kai ruled China.

There have been many books written upon the choice of Yuan Shih Kai. No one but Yuan can solve the puzzle. That is the way with Chinese puzzles. There is no solution. Your house servant will tell you he can tell what a foreigner will do in a given case. No Chinaman would be so foolish as to attempt to guess what a Chinaman will do!

However, the case is like this: Yuan Shih Kai, the ardent reform military man, chose to aid the Empress who was ever reactionary, and placed the reform Emperor in such position that he gave up his title and virtually became state prisoner. The best explanation of this action I have seen is this: The Emperor while a reformer, was not a wise or tactful man. He was going too fast, too far, and was in danger of wrecking all reform, Yuan may have felt he could not hold the Emperor in check. The Emperor moreover, who was then in control, was apt to hold highest place, putting Yuan under him. Soon His Highness might be able to utterly oust him. On the other hand, the Empress in her dire need must have Yuan, or perish. She must pay any price to get his aid. By taking her side, Yuan Shih Kai could and did, name the terms. He became the ruler, and from the day he chose this course, Yuan Shih Kai has ruled China. A treaty to be signed, a contract to be let, must be taken to Tien

Tsin to be read, signed and sealed by His Excellence Yuan, now a viceroy.

He pushed reforms. Not so madly as did Emperor Kuang Su, but with much more force. He was opposed bitterly by the old order, but he pushed and the Empress backed him up. Every trick was played. One example—Civil Service based upon western learning was introduced. This meant death to the old ring. They fought madly. Finally there began to be an agitation throughout all the Empire for the revival of Confucianism, a patriotic appeal for things Chinese.

At the climax of the excitement a memorial was presented to the Throne, asking that Confucious be made a god! This would mean reaction. This would mean a return to the classics, and an utter sweeping away of all reform. The prejudice of the people, the excitement of the agitation, gave the Reactionaries, so skillfully worked up, great force. No political campaign was ever better managed. A misstep meant the utter destruction of Yuan. He made no misstep. Calling to the scholars of the Empire, he bade them give witness that in all his teachings, Confucius claimed the honor of being an ordinary man. Further, he distinctly forbade his disciples paying him any special honor. They should honor their ancestors, not him. Then turning upon the Reactionaries, he denounced them as ignorant, the greatest of Chinese crimes, and therefore utterly unworthy of place or honor, and demanded and obtained their immediate removal for so insulting the memory of Confucius.

From that day no one has questioned Yuan's power. He became the idol of the Chinese, he being Chinaman not Manchu. Until, an evil day, a bond issue was sold for building a railway, to the English, when Chinese capitalists wanted to own the road themselves. For the Chinese see plainly, they must own and control their railroads, mines and factories, or become slaves to other nations.

We who do not know the history of Christian commerce and finance in the Orient cannot understand how foreign powers and foreign business methods are hated! Maybe it will be enough to tell you that Yuan, the Chinaman, the hero, became Yuan the outcast, the traitor. College boys, who formerly made him their hero, spoke of him as the hope of China, now look the other way when his name is mentioned, and if you are lucky enough to have a real friend among them, he will tell you in a voice you will not misunderstand that when the time comes, and the opportunity, Yuan Shih Kai will die!

But we must remember Yuan has been hard pressed before this. When ordered to proceed against the foreign army at the time of the Boxer trouble, he "proceeded" a mile a day. Thus he obeyed the Empress and was wisely cautious, and he who has befriended the foreigner, has tremendous backing not only from England, but from every country including the United States.

It would at present be very unwise and unsafe for Yuan to die, and he has a way of keeping very quiet until he chooses to act. With the Reactionaries who sought the godship of Confucius he said nothing and made no move for weeks. They, to all appearances, had him killed, when suddenly they found they had put the ropes around their own heads and Yuan sprung the trap so quickly that all the hangmen were hanged, and he stepped forth with power he never held before, capturing the applause and approval of those who came to rejoice in his death.

So, it will be well to wait and watch. As long as Yuan Shih Kai lives and thinks, he will be worth watching. It is the fascination of a Chinese puzzle that "presently we shall see what we shall see!"

Spiritual Dangers of the Minister

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

II. DOGMATISM

Another spiritual danger of the minister is dogmatism. Dogmatism is a disease of truth. It is truth stall-fed and apoplectic. It is the theoretic side of prejudice. It is found in all callings that have to do with truth. Even science has its dogmatists. Rousseau complained truly enough that if scientific men have perhaps fewer prejudices than other people, they make up for this by holding all the more tenaciously to those they do have. Even liberalism may grow dogmatic when it gets prosperous.

Of all callings, however, that of the minister is, perhaps, most exposed to this danger. It needs a large supply of grace to wholly withstand it. For, to begin with, there is a sense in which the true minister must be dogmatic. His peculiar relation to truth on the one hand and to life on the other, demands it. This may be brought out by the contrast between the preacher and the scientist. Both are the servants of truth; but the scientist seeks truth for truth's sake, the preacher seeks it for life's sake. The scientist is concerned with facts, the preacher with values. The scientist is a man with a question, the preacher is a man with a message. The scientist deals in experiments, the preacher in results. The scientist moves in the realm of opinion, the preacher in that of conviction. To this extent the preacher must be a dogmatist. The truth he declares is that of inner experience, not outer experiment; and he who would be a prophet to his generation, may have no clouds of doubt drifting across the face of his sun. He must be able to say: "I know in whom I have believed."

Moreover, the needs of his people demand a certain dogmatism. Men do not come to church to hear arguments, or criticism, or apologetics, but to have the truth of spiritual experience applied to their daily lives. The man who is in the grip of a horrible temptation, has no time to listen to nicely balanced arguments as to how God answers prayer. He must be told God does answer it, and be sent away to pray. The man whose loved one has just been laid away in the cold earth, does not want immortality discussed: he needs to have it asserted as the immutable truth of God. The hungry need bread, not the chemical formula of foodstuffs. The thirsty need water, not a learned elucidation of H2 O. Faith is not aroused by argument, still less by criticism, but by live coals from off the altar of conviction.

Thus far every true preacher must be dogmatic. Yet he must not be a dogmatist. And he becomes a dogmatist whenever he strikes the note of infallibility in matters that belong to the region of inquiry and research, rather than of personal conviction. Just here lies the subtility of his temptation. The dividing line between conviction and dogmatism is so thin that most of us glide over it insensibly. From the spiritual fact we easily pass to the theological theory and give each the same note of infallibility. We demand the same certainty for our theory of the atonement that we have for the fact of it. We want to be omniscient. We want to play the eavesdropper in the councils of eternity. We want to make everybody subscribe to the infallible system. We want to compel all men to see through our spectacles and call our special refraction of the light the very sun itself. Thus we place opinion on the throne of conviction and become dogmatists.

Now the sin of dogmatism is three-fold. To begin with, it is the suicide of truth. It is an enlargement of the head, just as fanaticism is an enlargement of the heart. Men do not grow bigger by putting on more clothes; neither does truth become larger by the accretions of dogma. I once saw in a hymn book the statement that the theology of John Wesley was embalmed in its pages. That was an unwitting criticism of dogma. Dogma is "embalmed" truth. The dogmatist is the undertaker, and the spirit of infallibility the embalming fluid.

Dogma easily becomes blasphemy.

There comes a time when it straightjackets even God. It is related in the Talmud that there arose a dispute in heaven, between God and the angels about leprosy. The soul of a Rabbi was called in to settle it and decided on the side of the angels.

Deeper than the hurt to truth, is the hurt to sincerity. It is hard for the dogmatist to be intellectually sincere. The intellectually sincere man stands ready to overthrow any system at the call of a single verified fact. But the dogmatist makes puppets of all his facts. He is a wire-puller. Since the truth must be such-and-such, a little twisting of facts or changing of emphasis matters very little. The result is a lowering of the whole intellectual tone. The truth lover becomes a partisan. The end justifies the means. True, this is not done consciously, but it is the very unconsciousness of the thing that constitutes its greatest danger. "Ye know not what spirit ye are of," was one of Christ's severest rebukes to His diciples.

But the most serious indictment of the dogmatic spirit, and that which constitutes it most literally a spiritual danger, is that it is the enemy of love. It arms truth against love. It is anti-social. The evangelist is social He has a passion for souls. He craves company. He must people heaven, but the dogmatist is not social. At heart he does not care for the conversion of others: he only cares that he shall be left in possession of the logical field. Heaven may be a desert for all he cares. He would depopulate the universe, if necessary, to vindicate his system. He would "make a solitude and call it"—truth. Even helpless infancy would not be spared, as the dogma of infant damnation shows.

Persecution is the logic of dogmatism. Intolerance, vindictiveness, insincerity become virtues in that loveless world. "Faith need not be kept with heretics." Crusades are more religious than missions; polemics than evangelism; uncharitableness than the "love that thinketh no evil."

Let us, therefore, beware how we divorce love from truth. "If I have all knowledge, and have not love, I am nothing." What God has joined together let no man put asunder.

An Introduction.

Harry was walking with another boy, when he was joined by a friend, a year or so older and inclined to manners.

"Introduce me, Harry," the new-comer whispered pompously.

Harry twisted, reddened, and at last turned to his companion with: "Jim, have you ever seen Gilbert Spencer?"

"No," the other boy answered.

"Well," Harry blurted out, reddening still more, and jerking one thumb over his shoulder towards the new-comer, "that's him."—January Lippincott's.

Past History a Lesson for the Hour

By Clark Braden

From 1865 to 1872 an earnest controversy over the question, "What measures, what actions have Scriptural authority?" agitated our Brotherhood. In a convention in DeSoto, southern Illinois, in the summer of 1866, the writer criticized what was the almost universal position of our Brotherhood. For more than a year there was earnest discussion. "The Herald of the Truth," Jacob Creath and others insisted that the writer be deposed from the presidency of Southern Illinois College, for heresy, and Creath presented charges against the writer to the congregation in Carbondale, insisting that the writer be expelled for heresy. In 1870, in the Ministerial Association in Abingdon, the writer presented his views. They were violently assailed, the writer bitterly denounced. In the American Christian Review B. Franklin dubbed the writer "the Beecher of the Reformation," and declared that not one-third of the pulpits in Illinois would hear to him.

The heresy of the writer was the claim that Scriptural authority should not be demanded for everything connected with religion. Scriptural authority should be demanded only for what the Scriptures clearly taught as matters of religious faith, worship, practice, duty. No Scriptural authority should be demanded for mere opinions, methods, aids, means, instrumentalities, expedients, used in living religious faith, worship, practice, duty. I know that it will be doubted that such position was ever regarded as a monstrous heresy, but years of bitter experience taught the writer that it was so regarded. In a Ministerial Association in Normal, in 1877, the writer enumerated the heresies so violently assailed in Abingdon in 1870, and challenged all former assailants present to specify one that they would assail, one that they were not then advocating. It was amusing to see the almost silly attempted smile with which the challenge was met in profound silence by former assailants.

In 1871, in a debate with R. N. Davies, in State Line, Indiana, the writer stated that we understand and believe that the Bible teaches certain things like all others; that we preach and teach what we believe the Bible teaches like all others; that we invite persons to unite with us because they believe that the Bible teaches what we believe the Bible teaches like all others; that we make it uncomfortable, impossible for persons who do not believe that the Bible teaches what we believe the Bible teaches, to remain with us like all others. In each and all of these meanings of the word creed we have a creed the same as all others. The only difference is freedom to use the Bible itself, appeal to the Bible where others used human opinions, where the Bible should be used, and as the Bible should be used. There were about thirty preachers present, who, after an indignation caucus, demanded that the writer be silenced and discarded, "because he misrepresented the cause and the Brotherhood." The official board of the church sustained the debater. At the close, preachers apologized and confessed that the debater's position was correct.

In a meeting of the Illinois Ministerial Association, in 1872, in Eureka, the writer took the position that all who believed that the Bible contained a revelation from God, and that Jesus was the Christ, the only begotten Son of God, and realized in their lives these two great beliefs, were Christians, and that we should treat them as such, though errors did make them Christians in error. The writer was told by one who was then state secretary of Illinois that he had no business to pretend to belong to the Brotherhood, and should go to the "sects" where he belonged; and the language was applauded by some. In 1870, in a convention of the Southern Ministerial Association and Ministerial Association in Du Quoin, the writer made the same statement and the secretary of the association used identical language. Were not such statements, was not such treatment identical with what is manifested now? Are they Christians?

In 1878 the writer, as a member of a committee, tried to find someone to lecture for the Ministerial Association in Eureka on "The Inspiration of the Bible." In declining, Isaac Errett said he dare not state what he knew to be true. The other members of the committee compelled the writer to deliver the lecture in which the writer insisted that such utterly untenable a priori assumptuous, as plenacy verbal inspiration, the absolute inerrancy of the text, and the inspiration and consequent inerrancy of all speaker's acts, writers of the language of the Bible, should be discarded. The questions should be, "What does the Bible itself, in fair expression or implication, claim for the acts, utterances, writings on its pages?" That only what the Bible presented as the acts, utterances, riting, of Divine Beings, angels, men that the Bible declared were inspired in such acts and utterances, should be regarded as inspired. That only such acts and utterances and those of which inspiration expressly approved, should be regarded as inculcations of the Bible.

At the close of the lecture the meeting house resembled a beehive into which a stick had been thrust. The writer said to assailants, "Ten years from now not one of you will think of questioning what you now assail." The writer has the MSS. he read, and not a critic now living, even the most violent, will assail a position then so violently assailed. Many have gone far beyond the most extreme positions of the lecture. The writer had to hurry from the pulpit to the deathbed of his wife. He has been told by one who said that he was a member of such committee, that a committee prepared resolutions denouncing the lecture, and censuring the lecturer; and that only the death of his wife saved the writer from such action. The writer is ready to read the same MSS. to all who so violently assailed it in 1878. They will not only be ashamed of the proposed resolutions, but also of their assaults on the lecture. All accept them now. Some have gone far beyond them.

The writer need not point out the moral or its present application. He would suggest to all parties certain practical considerations. As president of a school, the writer has had persons lecture to the school that he would not have employed to teach the same topics. He wanted students to hear all sides. As overseer of congregations and as preacher for congregations he has had persons preach and lecture to congregations that he would not have employed to preach regularly to the congregations. He wished the congregations to hear all sides, and a discussion of all sides. He is in favor of such a course in all instances where truth has an equal showing with error. He does object to allowing teachers or preachers to teach error where the antidote is absent.

Is it true that in all conventions of the past no one has ever been allowed to speak whose views did not harmonize with the views of the majority in the convention, that a considerable element of the convention did not accept as true? Is the fact that one speaks to a convention, in any sense an endorsement of all of his views? Or of any of them? By the audience? Or officers of the conventions? It has ever been our boast that we have a free platform, free pulpits. That we hear on all sides, expose, refute, error, and secure a triumph for the truth. Would it not be well to continue such course?

The Gates of the West

By Burris A. Jenkins

You have asked me to write a line now and then for your paper, Mr. Editor, your blood be upon your own head.

I begin with a prescription for the soreness in the head, and possibly heart, symptoms of which have been appearing once and again in our Christian papers. One has prescribed "To Our Knees." Let me set this beside it: "To the Open Air." Some of us have been living so much in the office, the study, or the sanctum that our brains are cobwebbed and moth-eaten, and possibly even out hearts are sheep-skinned. Let's get out of doors. Air is a wonderful sweetener and disinfectant. Trees are great preachers; grasses and flowers, great singers; and waters powerful in prayer.

Now, Brother Theologue, please don't inject a dry-as-dust stream into this pastoral of mine, and declare that that last sentence in that last paragraph is all mysticism, smacks even of pantheism, or is at best all tommyrot. Granted anyhow. Still lots of people believe it is so. They had found it "function serviceably." Suppose you try it once. Personally, I have always believed it so, in a measure, but had no idea how profoundly true, until during the last two years or so, I have been taking this prescription for body and soul. Pardon the personality, but what is testimonial to a prescription worth if not given in the first person?

And I have wondered, time and again, as I have read the writings of our good brother, who dips his pen in gall and stabs it into another brother equally good, or rather, as I have turned away, unable to bear the sight, I have wondered, I say, whether Brother Horatio Pen-of-gall ever sat by a marshy lake at sun-up, watching God's colors spread fanwise to the deep purple zenith, too absorbed even to fire his gun, as the mallards came tumbling out of the blue to his decoys. I have wondered whether he ever waded by a stream-side, lashing its waters for the speckled trout, listening to its bickering, entranced by its sparkling.

Now Brother Horatio, please don't cry out about the cruelty of shooting and angling. Hang it all, why will you be argumentative? Can't you smile once, and breathe the woods' breath? Can't you find sermons in stones, books in the running brooks, and good in everything? I maintain, pantheism or not, that part of God's message to us comes from his out-of-doors, and you, Brother Horatio Pen-gall, if it does not come to you, I fear it is because it can be said of you as of a certain Peter, (not Simon) and for similar reasons:

"A primrose by the river's brim
A yellow primrose was to him,
And nothing more."

Now then, since it has been suggested that a council of representative brethren should "sit on" this controversy, let them be heavy men, let us apply the prescription and if they sit this winter, let them sit on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico, with rods and guns and cameras, and a camp outfit. It verily makes me laugh, God wot! To think of Brother Pengall in khaki breeches, leggings, cap and shooting coat. Maybe it would make others laugh, even himself. If so, then the fight's half over! But if they sit next summer, let it be on the shores of Northern lake or the side of Northern mountain, where mayhap, they can see Governor 'Gus Wilson, "Billy" Taft, or "John D." himself, in knickerbockers knocking a golf-ball.

Such knocking knocks out knocking. But Brother Pengall is frowning heavily at such levity. I see him now, Oh, well, I give up! I did not expect the prescription to be taken seriously, though in heaven's name, I mean it seriously enough.

Alexander Proctor once, here at the gates of the west, was pruning his vines and weeding his flowers on a Saturday, when a gall-vizaged seventh day adventist, with a limp-back Bible under his arm, limped up and began to argue with the great seer, saying: "I'm afraid you'll never go to heaven, brother, working here on the Sabbath day."

"I'm in heaven now," smiled the sage, "I'm in heaven now."

And there are more things in those four words than are dreamt of in your philosophy, Horatio Pengall.

CHRISTMAS ON THE RED SEA.

By H. T. Morrison.

Christmas on the Red Sea is an event in one's life that does not often occur. It was, however, an experience the writer had in his homeward trip from Australia to Egypt two days ago. Considerable preparation was made in various ways on our good ship Ophir of the Oriental-Royal Mail Line, to make the day not only a joyful one, but one long to be remembered by all the passengers on board. The bill of fare at all the meals in three saloons was about all that one could expect in the best hotels on shore. And the dinner at night, served in courses, was superb.

At 11 a. m., a Christmas Anglican service was read by an English officer who was among the passengers, Captain Seeley of the Ophir being a Roman Catholic, and, therefore, not qualified to preside at such a service. The stewards had beautifully decorated our saloon, even to the point of representing snow and a snow-storm. This was done by a liberal use of cotton batting picked into small pieces and tied in various forms. The snow, however, did not serve to cool the atmosphere very much, for a good part of the day we found the heat above ninety degrees in the shade.

These ocean-going steamers have a bar for each of the three passenger saloons, at which all kinds of liquor can be procured day and night, and on Christmas they were most liberally patronized—especially by many of the third-class passengers. At ten o'clock, on looking in for a short time, I found many of them much under the influence of liquor, and yelling around the bar like a lot of mad-men. It was most manifest that we had on board a large class that were moving on a very low plane. And yet our passenger list is considerably under a hundred—about the smallest ever known in one of the ships of this line. Christianity is rather at a discount with many of those on board. Most likely those who make any pretensions to being Christians could be counted on the fingers of one's two hands. With the most of them Christmas has no higher meaning than that of feasting, drinking and having what so many people call "a good time."

There is no better place to find out what men and women are than during a voyage in one of these ocean-going steamers. The other evening, while in conversation with an officer of high standing, who has spent years in the service, he told me that it was most amazing to witness how people who bear good characters on shore would let themselves down when once they found themselves in the crowd on shipboard.

I sailed from Perth, Western Australia, December 7, and disembark at Port Said tomorrow for my tour in Egypt. The only place of call during the twenty days was at Colombo, Ceylon. Twelve hours were spent there seeing the city and the American fleet which was still there on its return trip from the far East. We felt the heat at Colombo more than we did on any other part of the entire trip. This is the time of year for comfort in these waters. I have enjoyed every hour of the entire trip. I have not been sick an hour nor missed a meal.

These notes are written on the Gulf of Suez, a few hours sail from where the Israelites crossed the sea. We reach Suez some time this evening, and pass through the canal at night. Today is the third Sunday we have had since leaving Australia. I have attended Anglican service four times and preached two Sunday evenings to those on board.

NOTE FROM PROFESSOR M'GARVEY

Editors of the Christian Century: In your issue of December 26, 1908, page eleven, I find an article over the signature of H. M. Brooks, Seymour, Texas, beginning with the following lines:

I am satisfied that the department of "Biblical Criticism," as conducted by J. W. McGarvey, in the Christian Standard, does an injustice to the Christian Church for the following reasons:

First. He persists in making tests of fellowship of things that are neither commanded nor prohibited by Jesus or any of the New Testament writers.

Second. He makes a test of fellowship of things that no man knows or can know in this life. As an illustration, the chronological order of the books of the Old Testament is a thing that neither McGarvey nor any other man knows. Nor is it essential that any one should know.

Third. He makes a test of fellowship of the mysterious relationship of the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, a thing that he knows no more about than ordinary mortals, a thing that each and every man must settle for himself.

Had these statements been written and published for readers familiar with my contributions to the Christian Standard, I would have no need to refer to them, but inasmuch as many of your readers know little or nothing of what I have written for that paper, and will be inclined to believe what H. M. Brooks thus charges if it goes uncontradicted, I solicit the privilege of saying through your columns that I have never proposed any of the tests of fellowship which he names.

J. W. McGarvey.

THE OTHER HALF OF THE TRUTH.

By W. L. Hayden.

Since the Christian Standard of January 2, 1909, concedes the "Half-Truth," why not make a clean breast of it and concede the other half of the truth at once and so end this inexcusable controversy over the centennial program precipitated by its lack of discernment.

proval and endorsement of "Campbell's bi-

The principle stated by Dr. Richardson involved in the Raines case cited with apographer," covers the other half-truth. His statement is, "There should be no contention henceforth in regard to opinions of men however wise and learned. Whatever private opinions might be entertained upon matters not clearly revealed, must be retained in silence, and no effort must be made to impose them upon others."

Evidently Dr. Richardson did not mean that there should be no courteous and complete discussion of opinions on proper occasions, for if so, the pioneers were "the chief of sinners" in this regard. He explains the retaining them in silence to mean "no effort must be made to impose them upon others." That is, they must not be made tests of fellowship or occasions of unbrotherly contention.

The violation of this principle is the cause of the current controversy and the responsibility must finally rest upon the violator who is misleading good brethren that are protesting without reason or justice. Let us kindly turn on the light.

THE PASSING OF "WILLETTISM"

Edwin C. Boynton.

A sample copy of a notorious journal has fallen into my hands, containing a lengthy protest from a contributor against "Willettism," and repeating the offered solution of peace by silence on the part of Mr. Willett. The "Century" feels that the personal phase of the controversy has passed, and I hope does so correctly. For Prof. Willett to resign from the Centennial program would be so grevious a mistake that one could almost say "to falter would be sin." Let us hope his resolution is fixed to vindicate at Pittsburg in the freedom of a disciple "the lordship of Jesus." But I feel the force of the "Century's" contention that beyond the personal focus lies the area of the general right of disciples. "Willettism" being a closed incident, who is to be the next victim of innuendo and misrepresentation? It is no time to clamor for an impossible peace purchased by ignoble surrender to petty despots. To those who would spy out our liberty let us give place no, not for one hour. I commend most heartily the program of the Century.

Huntsville, Texas.

We should so plan and work the Centennial propaganda that 1910 shall be greater than 1909. Only fundamentals should claim our attention. Missions is the one thing that gives excuse for and direction to every activity of the church.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

A Minister's Books

The Correspondent:—"Will you not give a list of books that will be helpful to a preacher in his ordinary work. We need the books that will inspire us and thus keep us going. When I was in college Prof. ——— recommended to me a set of commentaries which I bought; but from which I have never received any good. I would be glad to let any one have them to whom they might be of service."

I will be glad to furnish the address of "The Correspondent" to any one who cares to write him as to his set of commentaries.

How can I suggest a list of books that will "inspire" a man in the routine of his daily task? The need of the most of us is to have eyes trained to see the glory of the common. If books shut up our enjoyment of life and things to the study. Then they are a curse. They should be but means to the interpretation of life. If they make the daily task distasteful, they should be closed. But to him who has read books aright,

"In the mud and scum of things Something always, always sings."

What books can I recommend? The output today would be amazing even to Solomon. We are embarrassed by the enormity of publications, hence I prefer to deal now with the question, What class of books should have first place?

There are the grim commentaries. If they were men the most of them would be literalists, measuring men, ever drawing their rule. I admire every commentary I see. It is the result of vast labor. Its author has had a will to plod. The commentator has centainly been of great and good service to the world. With ease we come into the possession of the rich heritage he has bestowed upon us by his arduous and patient labors. I have profound admiration for the commentators; but it is my weakness that I seldom read them. I sometimes try to get excuses for not doing so. I have said that they are woefully lacking in agreement, that they are never satisfactory in just the thing you want to know, that like the lawyers they are slaves to precedent and that they often miss the sweep and spirit of him they are trying to explain. Doubtless mine is the fault.

History and Biography

Again there are the histories. Here is a rich field. History is not the tabulation of the births and deaths of kings as I used to think when I was younger. It is not the record of battles merely. It is the story of man learning, suffering, contending and conquering. Surely knowledge of the past ought to be both a pleasure to us and a guide away from the errors of life into its best.

Biography which is history centered in persons is a far too neglected field of study. The life of any person written with a discerning pen is well worth reading. Literature is rich with the biographies of the world's great and good. There are no missionary books comparable with the biographies of the first men in zeal for the spread of the Gospel. I know of no better way to helpfully mould young life than to place in its hands strong, simple biographies. As the reader peruses the story he will be gathering strong material out of which he will be, even while reading, building his own character.

Fiction has a large place in the libraries of today. It is easy reading. Its laws allow the author to enter into the intimacy of the life of the characters he is portraying; and consequently the reader of fiction comes into more intimate acquaintance with the character than he does in biography. Then there is the plot that is fascinating. "Make 'em laugh, make 'em cry and make 'em wait," Charles Reade gave as the design of the novelist.

The novel has a rightful place in every balanced library. Generally speaking women ought to read less fiction and preachers and men more.

With such standard authors as Hugo, Eliot, Dickens, Scott, Meredith, Thackeray, Hawthorne, Macdonald, etc., there is no excuse for any to waste time on trashy novels. All modern novels, however, are not trash, very far from it. There is a social breath in our fiction today that is most helpful. First place must not be given to novels, however, but reserved for another class.

Essays are coming, I am glad to notice, to have a larger reading. Such writers as Benson, Brierly, Chesterton, Wells, Tonsur, Mabie, Lucas, etc., have a wide constituency of readers. There is the splendid note of our throbbing present day life in all their writings. They are among the best commentators on actual life that we have. They help the eyes to see. Surely preachers could learn of them.

Devotional Writings

We continue our search for the first class. The devotional books must have a large place in the libraries of those who are leading the people's devotion. Great care must be had here. There are countless spurious works on piety. The easiest thing in the world is to talk or write pious platitudes. Be suspicious of the pious twang. The great devotional books have come to us out of the reality of stress and storm. They always sound the note of stern reality. Their prescriptions have been tried, fearfully tried, by the authors. I wonder if there is even one great devotional book that has not come to us out of the burning fires of trouble and conflict? Some of the greatest of them were penned in prison. The devotional books worth while can be read again and again. I fear most of us are satisfied in reading a book once. A book with a soul should be treated as a rich personality. We do not content ourselves with one prolonged conversation with the best people we know; but by repeated visits we come to feel and know the depth of their personalities and appreciate the richness and fullness of their minds. So with books that have endured the testing of time, we should give them frequent oportunity to speak to us the fullness of their message. Bunyan, Samuel Rutherford, a Kempis, Law, Taylor, Whyte, Mathewson, etc., are writers for our daily companionship.

I must pass over the drama and philosophy, two of the greatest classes of books in which men choose to write their thoughts. The drama measures the heights and depths of the soul's movements. We cannot ignore it if we are seeking comprehensively to know man. Philosophy, I think, is for the few. Happily the laughter and song of the ordinary worker is not disturbed with the insolvable problems of the philosopher. The most men believe in God without recondite reasoning as to why. The most men accept sin as a reality without agonizing over its origin. The most men believe in immortality without reading Fiske or Lodge to find a rational basis. A little philosophy disturbs and makes afraid. Much philosophy, I have noticed, often leads to a simple, strong and splendid faith.

Poetry First.

Because it is lamentably neglected and because of its intrinsic spiritual value I accord first place to poetry. It is the history of the delicate and mighty movement of the soul. It is the biography written in the Holy of Holies. It is devotional literature that makes all the universe divine. It is essay in finest attire. It is drama at its best. It is philosophy that hopes and believes. Strange that preachers so neglect this field of God. The psalms are easily the first devotional portion of the Bible. They are the eternal singings of the soul. They may bear David's name; but they belong to the common soul of humanity. The poets can help in all things needful.

Is it more sympathy with the homely and common lot of our fellows we need? We can nowhere find beter teachers than the poets. Burns is a master just here. Is it more faith with the good God we need? Then let us read such a poet as Browning with his hilarious optimism and his buoyant faith, a Whittier who sings of "Eternal Goodness." Do we need to feel that the science of today is not going to engulf our religion? Where a better teacher than Tennyson? Do we need to be calmed as the mountain and brook calm us? Then we must read the great master Wordsworth who saw far into the heart of nature. Do we need hope in the hour of defeat, sympathy in our loneliness, hope at death's grave? Then we may almost risk any of the poets. There are a few who despair, but not many. Do we need to be stirred for noble endeavors for our kind? Who can do it better than Lowell?

It would be well for our souls, well for our churches, well for our pulpits, if our grown up preachers would set themselves to the task usually asigned children, viz., committing poems. One good poem learned by heart each week would have a sweetening and strengthening effect upon the learner and upon all those to whom he afterwards gave it. It is more profitable to learn poems than to do—well, many things that we are at present doing.

To the Bible Professors at Drake, Lexington, Hiram, and the Rest

While writing this article, a suggestion has come to my mind. I must pen it at once for when it grows cold it will seem unimportant. Now, only a few moments old, it is welcomed by me as of great importance and with great enthusiasm. The suggestion is this: On the morning of graduating your students, call them into your most sacred room for a last word of counsel and questioning. Make the meeting have the spirit of prayer. College doors are about to close on these graduates and life's wider doors are to open. It is a time for richness of fellowship. You have come to the last hours of daily fellowship and it is a time for tender words. Say to them that you can no longer be constantly their guide but you now name to them certain great authors with whom they can go for counsel every day.

Then with great reverence mention the names of ten great novels, ten great devotional books, ten great essays, ten great poems. By "great" I mean good, genuine, vital, artistic, gripping, etc. By no means minimize the importance of this hour. It may mean as much to them as their whole college course; for if they come to know these forty you will name to them, know

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Before the Sanhedrin*

The healing of the lame man at the beautiful gate of the temple was an event so astonishing that a multitude soon gathered from the neighboring courts and streets to see the man and the disciples who had healed him. In the narrative of the previous chapter Peter is the one who takes the lead and does the speaking, and yet from a closer reading of chapter 4 it is apparent that John had not been unheard in what had transpired. In verse 1 are the words "as they spake unto the people," indicating that both Peter and John had been witnesses for the truth. And again in the 13th verse we have a statement concerning the council before whom the disciples were summoned, beginning, "when they beheld the boldness of Peter and John." From both of these texts it seems clear that John was no voiceless companion of the more active and eager Peter. It is possible, indeed, that the two disciples had each gathered about himself a circle of listeners, to whom an explanation of the strange events of the day was given.

The Arrest.

While the crowd was thus listening the authorities of the place came suddenly upon them, interrupting the message the disciples were giving. The priests were the leaders in this disturbance. They belonged for the most part to the Sadducean party, and jealous of their rights both as priests and as the owners of the rich temple franchises they had summoned the temple guards under their captain and now seized the two disciples and bore them away. Their action might seem perfectly justifiable on the ground of public safety, for the gathering of a crowd under any pretext is likely to be something of a disturbance of the peace and fraught with danger, especially when under the spell of such preachers as Peter and John. But there was a deeper motive than this on the part of the priests and Sadduceans. The disciples were preaching Jesus and the Resurrection; in neither one did the Sadducees believe, and they were not minded to allow this Galilean sect, the followers of Jesus, to gain headway in the city where he had so recently perished. Little further could be done that day, for it was now evening, three hours later than the time at which Peter and John had gone up to the temple. They could only put the two disciples into confinement for the night; perhaps in some of the rooms about the temple. But the preaching of the Gospel had not been without effect. Many accepted the message which the two disciples gave, and the writer adds that by this time the total number of believers in the city had come to be about five thousand.

Before the Council.

As soon as the night was passed the Sanhedrin, or governing body of Jews in Jerusalem, assembled to proceed with the trial of the two prisoners. This body was the supreme court of the Jews. It was composed of the high priest, the ex-high priests, the scribes and the leading men of the city. Annas is here called the high priest, though he had been deposed from this office by the Roman government, and the honor conferred upon Joseph Caiaphas, his son-in-law. Indeed Annas virtually held the office of high priest for a long time, his five sons and his son-in-law following him in due succession. While they were nominally in office, he was in reality exercising this function from which he had been deposed for cause. Others of the high priest's family were present and are named in the text.

Peter's Reply.

When the two prisoners were brought in it was demanded of them by what right they had gathered the assembly of the previous day and had preached. The council in which they were gathered was a public one, and many of the people who had made up the crowd on the former day were present; with them was the man who had been healed of his lameness. It was a splendid opportunity for the disciples to re-affirm the truths which they were most anxious to get into the hearts of the Jews. They had done, they said, a good deed on the previous day, and this was in contrast with the brutal treatment they had received from the rulers. The authority by which they had done that deed and the power that they had for its accomplishment were both in the name of Jesus, the Messiah of Nazareth. This was the very one whom the Jewish rulers had put to death, and Peter's charge that they had crucified the Nazarene was appropriately linked with this statement that God had raised him from the dead. In the power of the risen Christ the lame man stood there at that very moment before them all. The prophets the psalmists had spoken of Israel as a stone which the builders of former ages, the nations around them, rejected with scorn; only to find at last that Israel was intended to be the corner stone of all nations. Likewise said Peter of the Christ, the builders, the Jews, had rejected him, but he was now seen to be essential to their own history. Without him that history was a torso without a head, a history without a sequel. In no other name is there salvation of body or of soul. In his name alone are men made whole. In that name righteousness is preached, and for that name the faithful will be willing to die.

The Secret Conference.

Such boldness on the part of these disciples, neither of whom had any university experiences as had the scribes, astonished the hearers. And yet they remembered that these very men had been seen with Jesus during his work in that city. Moreover there stood the man whom they had healed on the previous day, and there was no argument that could prevail against what they had done. Their only safety lay in private conference, and so they sent the disciples forth.

One wonders how Luke the writer of the Book of Acts knew what went on in the secret council-chamber of the Sanhedrins, as all witnesses had been executed. No modern reporter was on hand to learn by secret and mysterious means what transpired in that conclave. But it is more than probable that some of the members of that distinguished body later became Christians, for we soon read that a great company of priests became obedient unto the faith. We read that in their deliberation over the matter they were compelled to concede that a remarkable event had occurred, and that the sympathies of the people were enlisted with the Apostles. The utmost that could be done was to prevent them, as far as possible, from teaching in the name of Jesus, on the ground that this was likely to raise sedition in the city, and to disturb the peace.

The Apostolic Refusal.

But this condition Peter and John refused at once to accept. They were witnesses, they said, of the things which they had seen and heard, and had no liberty to suppress the truth as they understood it. Seeing that it was useless to further hold the Apostles, the council dismissed them, insisting that they must not gather crowds, not otherwise press the claims of the prophet from Nazareth. Thus ended in failure the first official effort made in Jerusalem to restrain the growing enthusiasm of the early church, and it seems that this was the only effort of the sort attempted. Presently the Christian community was recognized as a perfectly licit and law abiding section of people. They lived on terms of goodwill with their Jewish neighbors, in fact, they were themselves Jews. It was not until a more ringing and vigorous statement of the independence of Christianity from Judaism was made by Stephen that the peaceful conditions which then prevailed were again disturbed.

The Apostles retired to their company, probably the 120 who were accustomed to meet together for prayer and they rejoiced together over their deliverance, and the glorious proof that had witnessed to the name of Jesus. In such an assembly the spirit of God was manifestly present and later as they recorded the facts they were impressed that God had manifested himself in mysterious signs of power.

Thus the early church work in Jerusalem prospered and love abounded everywhere. The Apostles preached and held the power. All things were held as if belonging to all, rather than to some particular owner. Many and numerous possessions were later laid at the feet of the Apostles for distribution for those who needed it. One conspicuous example of this generous bestowal of personal possessions was that of Joseph Barnabas, a man of the sacred tribe of Levi, whose people had migrated to Cyprus. He brought the money which he had obtained from the sale of some particular part of his patrimony, and added it to the common fund. This man became a notable worker in the later history of the church, as the companion of the Apostle Paul on his first missionary journey.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

LESSON VIII. OFFICERS AND THEIR DUTIES. (Continued).

VII. GENERAL SECRETARY. Next to the Superintendent, the Secretary is the most important officer in the school. On him largely depends the proper working of its machinery. His chief duties are to keep a complete, statistical record of the whole school; keep the minutes of all board and faculty or teachers' meetings, and order as directed all supplies. His reports should be kept in one of the many books on the market designed for the use of Sunday-school secretaries, and should give an accurate birds-eye-view of the financial and numerical strength of the school from week to week. It is all important that he should keep a complete roll (preferably a card list) of every scholar and teacher in the school, showing among other things, address, age, birthday, church membership or otherwise, date of entering, joining church, removal, etc. He should furnish a weekly, quarterly and yearly report to the whole school. The assistant secretary assists the secretary in all of these duties as directed by him, and in his absence takes full charge of the office.

VIII. GENERAL TREASURER. The general treasurer has charge of all funds belonging to the school, and pays them out on requisition of the proper authorities. He should keep a permanent record of all financial transactions, and present to the school a weekly, quarterly and yearly report of same.

IX. DIVISIONAL SECRETARY-TREASURER. This officer bears to his department the same general relation that the general secretary and treasurer bear to the school at large. As treasurer it is his specific duty to take the offering of his department each Sunday and hand it in to the general treasurer. As secretary, he should keep a record of all statistics of attendance, contributions, etc, and furnish same to the general treasurer for his weekly report. This office is only needed in the larger schools, where the divisional superintendent cannot perform its duties.

X. SECRETARY OF ENROLLMENT. This office is one of the most important in a graded school. In the smaller schools it may be filled by the assistant superintendent, but where new scholars are constantly coming in, a special officer is required. His duties are to receive all new scholars, determine by personal examination, their proper departmental and class grading; take them to the general secretary for enrollment; and introduce them to their teacher and class. He may also be required to keep a record of the class standings and promotions of the scholars. Some Sunday-schools have a special officer for this purpose called the secretary of promotion. In others, the secretary of general enrollment keeps the roll books in place of the secretary.

XI. LIBRARIAN. The librarian should have charge of all books, maps, magazines and supplies, and should attend to their distribution. He should also be responsible for the safe-keeping of all models, bible objects, missionary curios, etc. But he should be more than a custodian. A wide-awake librarian can do much to keep the best books in his library before the school, and to suggest to the library committee what class of books are most interesting to the scholars. No book should be given out by him to any pupils under the intermediate department, without an order from the teacher of the class . To prevent confusion all books should be given to the departmental superintendents for distribution to the classes under their control.

XII. CHORISTER AND ORGANIST. The chorister leads the singing of the main school. If the superintendent does not select the hymns the chorister should do so, having the musical program for each Sunday carefully prepared beforehand. He should not allow the singing to get stereotyped, but should teach the school from time to time new hymns. The organist presides at the piano or organ under the direction of the chorister.

XIII. DOORMEN, USHERS, ETC. There should be a doorman at every door entering into the main room, for the purpose of welcoming strangers, preserving quiet in the corridors, and keeping anyone from entering during the reading of the scripture or prayer. The doorman can do much to create a favorable impression on strangers upon their first visit to the school. In addition to the doorman, every school should have ushers to see that the places occupied by the regular scholars are reserved for them; to conduct strangers to comfortable seats; and at the conclusion of the exercises to introduce them to the superintendent and secretary of enrollment. Both ushers and doormen should be in their places a reasonable time before the opening of the school.

XIV. MESSENGERS. In large schools it is well to organize a band of messenger cadets, drawn preferably from the Junior Department, whose duty it is to carry messages for the superintendent or other officers, and to deliver the supplies of the Home and Cradle Roll Departments under direction of their respective superintendents. Boys may be thus early taught to serve in the Church. A similar band of girls may also be organized, for the purpose of visiting and carrying flowers to the sick; reading and singing to them; and holding song services in the various charitable organizations of the neighborhood.

XV. MANUAL DIRECTOR. In schools which have adopted manual training, a special officer called manual director, should be appointed, to superintend the work of this branch.

XVI. HOME DEPARTMENT AND CRADLE ROLL SUPERINTENDENTS. These officers should appoint and remove their own district visitors, subject to the approval of the Sunday-school board or other authority; pay over to the general treasurer the contributions from their department; and hand in to the general secretary a written report of their work, to be incorporated in the quarterly and yearly reports of the school. The success of these departments depends almost entirely on the work done by their superintendents.

XVII. COMMITTEES. Every school should have the following committees:

(1). Missionary Committee. The duty of this Committee is to arouse and maintain a healthy missionary interest in the school at large. It should keep itself informed on the latest methods of missionary work in the Sunday-school; provide for occasional missionary programs to take the place of the ordinary opening or closing exercises; and organize missionary exhibits, to which the whole church should be invited.

This committee should also suggest to the library committee new books to be added to the missionary section.

(2). Library Committee. It is the duty of this committee to maintain the efficiency of the library by adding new books from time to time. Its members should keep in touch with the literary needs and preferences of the different grades, and no books should be added to the library without its consent.

(3). Relief Committee. This committee has charge of all the relief and charitable work of the school, and sees to the distribution of the Christmas and other contributions for the poor.

(4). Temperance Committee. The temperance committee has charge of the temperance interests of the school. It should provide for stated temperance programs, and arrange for addresses from time to time in the line of temperance and good citizenship.

(5). Social Committee. This committee devises plans for developing the social side of the school life, and has full charge of all picnics, entertainments, etc.

LITERATURE. (Same as the preceding lesson.) QUESTIONS. (1.) What is the responsibility of an officer in the school? (2). How shall the number of officers be determined? (3). How should they be appointed? (4). How would you describe the general duties of an officer of the school? (5). What are the duties of the following officers—pastor, superintendent, general secretary, general treasurer, librarian, chorister? (6). What are the duties of divisional superintendents and secretary-treasurers? (7). What are doormen, ushers and messengers, and what are their duties? (8). What are the duties of the manual director? (9). What are the duties of the home department and cradle roll superintendents? (10). Name five committees that every school should have? (11). Describe them, and state briefly their duties and responsibilities?

THE PRAYER MEETING

Topic, January 27: Heresy of the Heart. Philippians 2:17-20.

"With me, mistakes of the understanding and errors of the affections are not to be confounded. They are as distant as the poles. An angel may mistake the meaning of a commandment, but he will obey it in the sense in which he understands it. * * * There are mistakes with and without depravity. There are willful errors which all the world must condemn, and unavoidable mistakes which every one will pity. * * * Many a good man has been mistaken. Mistakes are to be regarded as culpable and as declarative of a corrupt heart only when they proceed from willful neglect of the means of knowing what is commanded." So wrote Alexander Campbell in 1837. Doubtless he would have answered, if authority for his statement had been demanded, with a quotation from the Bible, such as, "The whole law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Or, "He that loveth not knoweth not God; for God is love." It is true that terrible wrongs are committed by men who think they are doing God service, but even in their case it may with reason be asked whether they have not put forward their own selfish schemes as the mind of God. We are bound to respect the conscience of men, but we are entitled to know whether the conscience of any particular man is that of a hog or of a human being. Is his citizenship earthly or heavenly? Does he glory in his shame? Is he an enemy of the cross of Christ? Or has he set his affections on things above?

Heresy of the heart discloses itself in business. A real estate agent, finding himself in possession of a piece of property on which he cannot realize what he paid if he tells the truth about it, deceives another and saves himself from loss. Is his heart right toward the other man who is not equipped with the knowledge of an expert? Perhaps it is a widow whose money he gets. Is he any better for having robber her through his superior knowledge than he would be if he had thrust a pistol into her face and compelled her to give up her savings? We demand of the minister and the scholar that they employ their knowledge for the benefit of mankind. Has the expert in business the right to deceive and defraud by virtue of his skill? No one can answer in the affirmative unless the cross of Christ is to him foolishness. To lay upon others the burden of our mistakes or to forget the spirit of brotherhood in the struggle for riches is to display the brute in us. The jerry builder endangers the lives of innocent children in order that he may save something for himself and the thievish architect who planned the schoolhouse. An inspector accepts a bribe and allows a rotten boat to continue in the service. The boat goes down and hundreds of lives are lost. The contractor thinks more of his gains than of the lives of men and so he saves expense by building a bridge that will not bear the strain to which it is to be subjected. He may commit suicide when he hears that an awful destruction of life has come from his greed, but that does not convince the world that his heart was right when he built the bridge. Love sacrifices for its object. The benevolent man does not make spoil of his weaker brother.

The pleasures of a man reveal whether his heart is heretical. Joseph Parker says: "The fool gets his pleasure out of the mischief he does, and the wise man gets his enjoyment out of the wisdom which he cultivates and increases. As mischief is the sport of the fool, so wisdom is the sport, in the sense of enjoyment, of the man of understanding." How many of the men who leave their homes for the sake of "affinities" have ever made notable sacrifices for the spiritual culture of the wives they cast aside? How many of the women who leave their homes for the sake of public careers and the notoriety to be gained thereby have any appreciation of the significance of the home and of the self-restraint that is required to make a good home? The mother denies herself for the sake of her children, for her heart is sound. The real man masters his appetite for drink, for he will not spend on it money needed to feed and clothe his children. He has the right attitude toward life and he endures the torture that may come from defying a perverted appetite in order that he may show love to his own. He declines to believe the lie that the drunkard loves the children that he starves as much as the sober man loves those for whom he cares with fidelity and tenderness. The pleasure-seeker who is indifferent to the moral damage he may work is a bad heretic. The theological errors of an Arius, a Servetus, or a Tolstoi sink into insignificance by the side of the heresy of a world wrong at heart. A self-satisfied church, no matter how loudly it may proclaims its continuance in the faith once for all delivered to the saints, is fundamentally heretical. There is no sound church except the one that is doing the will of God and in it will be found love pure and undefiled.

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Dear Bro. Willett: I have carefully read your recent articles in the Century. I have no desire to discredit a single statement you make. There are some things about your position, however, that are not entirely clear to my mind, and as I do not wish to misjudge you, I write you this note of inquiry.

For instance you say: "The older arguments of skepticism which were fatal against a Bible which the orthodoxy of the day insisted was verbally inspired, inerrant in matters of historical and scientific character, and equally authoritative at all points, are pointless and futile now. Mr. Ingersoll's shafts of wit, which seemed unanswerable to audiences trained to believe in the doctrine of a 'level Bible,' all portions of which were of precisely the same value for belief and conduct, would appear witless and absurd today to students of the historical method."

You here teach that the student of the historical method has some peculiar niew of the inspiration and erroneousness of the Bible that makes him superior to the orthodox student in meeting the arguments of skepticism.

What is your peculiar view of inspiration that would enable you to meet sceptics, such as Ingersoll, more effectively than the man who holds to the orthodox view? I do not like the term "verbal" as applied to inspiration, not because I do not believe in it, but because advantage is taken of its indefiniteness to evade the true issue. To you, for instance, it means "verbal dictation" or "mechanical inspiration of the documents." To those you call orthodox it has no such meaning. The most devout and scholarly advocates of "verbal inspiration" would repudiate all such representation of their view as mere caricature. What they mean by verbal inspiration is that the words of Scipture were written by men so guided by the Holy Spirit that the very words are just the words God wanted written, and hence are true, trustworthy and of divine authority. In repudiating verbal inspiration am I to understand that you repudiate this well-known position?

I do not like the term, "inerrant," because it involves the affirmation of a negative. As applied to the Holy Scriptures it simply means that they are not erroneous, or affirmatively stated. They are true, trustworthy and of divine authority. This is all that can be meant by a "level Bible." All parts of the Bible may not be of equal value to our faith and conduct, but when it comes to truthfulness and trustworthiness all parts of the Holy Scriptures are on a level because the whole is God's word. By denying "inerrancy" you are logically bound to affirm erroneousness of the sacred scriptures, or to deny their truthfulness and trustworthiness; for any writing that is erroneous cannot be truthful and trustworthy. Furthermore, by repudiating the infallibility of the Bible, as you do in your second article, you are logically compelled to affirm its fallibility, by which must be understood the liability of those who wrote it to err and be misled in what they wrote. Do you accept the logical consequence, and affirm erroneousness and fallibility of the Bible? If you say yes, in some things, then I ask in what sort of things and how many things? How do you determine the extent of such erroneousness? To illustrate what I mean. I understand that you deny that Moses raised a brazen serpent in the wilderness; if you do, is it because you exclude it as no part of the record, or because you consider it an error of the writer who gives us the rest of the record?

Again in commenting on Solomon's Choice, you say that the record may have been "colored by the favorable views of later biographers," and that his wisdom in part was the result of natural shrewdness and in part the result of the close observation of men and things. You surely do not call this an interpretation, for it can be nothing less than a rejection of the record. As I understand you, you regard First Kings as a part of the inspired Word of God. Am I to understand you then as admitting that this particular record of Solomon's Choice of wisdom may be erroneous, due to some coloring given it by the favorable views of later biographers?

I do not cite these two records because I hold them to possess any saving value but simply to draw you out on your views of erroneousness. Many things recorded in the Bible may have no saving value, yet to pronounce the records erroneous would seriously affect our faith in the whole Bible record as true and trustworthy.

My library is well supplied with critical works of both the conservatives and radicals, and as I understand the subject, the plea of erroneousness is relied upon for just two things. (1.) To explain what you term "perplexing variations." (2.) To justify the rejection of that which seems to conflict with reason. The radical critic may go further in the application of his rationalistic principle than his more conservative coworker, but the principle of erroneousness and untrustworthiness of scripture is the same with both. I have never found a critic who advocated the doctrine of erroneousness in opposition to inerrancy who did not treat the Bible as indefinitely erroneous and plead for the liberty of every man to reject what his reason might decide to be erroneous. I do not charge this upon you, but until you specify some safe and clear rule of limitation to the doctrine of erroneousness you will certainly be classed with the "indefinite errorists."

Here I believe is the ground upon which all the trouble has arisen over your teaching, and I could but wish you would deal with this phase of the question fully and clearly. You must not be too severe on us non-critical fellows if we are afraid an erroneous Bible will cease to be the divine standard of the fathers.

Fraternally,

Charlottesville, Va. H. G. Fleming.

No inquiries could be more timely than those which Bro. Fleming has raised, and I only regret that the number of questions received for this department compels us to postpone, at times, those which press for consideration, because others earlier received require attention. This, I hope, will explain to several of my correspondents the reason why their questions have not been answered. I have been delighted at the earnestness and candor of the letters I have received. With few exceptions they deal with profoundly important and interesting phases of biblical teaching. In due time I hope to answer every one.

The trouble that lies at the root of Bro. Fleming's problem seems to be the failure to discriminate between the essentials and the non-essentials of the Bible. Like every other vital organism, the Scriptures are made up of various elements. The seed from which a plant or a grain springs is composed of the germ and then several layers of covering affording nourishment and protection. These latter are merely incidental, and may perish without affecting the value of the seed. So of the Bible. The message of the divine Spirit is given to us in the lives and utterances of men of greater or lesser capacities, of greater or lesser clearness of vision, of greater or lesser consecration to their sacred tasks, but all of them guided in some true sense by that divine Spirit. Their lives were set in a framework of national history, and they used that history in fragmentary recitals or writings, to enforce and illustrate the ethical and spiritual truths which they gave to the world. Their knowledge of the national history was not the measure of their power as preachers or prophets. But it was of great value in their teaching, because it secured for them the interest and attention of the people to whom they preached. They nowhere seem chiefly concerned with historical facts. In the books that bear the names of particular prophets, like Amos and Jeremiah, the references to historical events are merely incidental to the message to the people. In the books that are chiefly made up of historical narratives, like Samuel and Kings, the interest of the writers, who were also prophets, was not in the facts themselves, but only in their religious value. For this reason they so frequently disappoint the mere student of history, because they tell only a very little of what he deems so interesting, and for the rest refer him to the state records, or "chronicles," which unfortunately have perished.

These men, the spiritual teachers of Israel, were also the possessors of certain virtues regarding nature and the world. Those virtues were a part of the common heritage of their race. Wherever they had occasion to speak of the world, its structure, its origin, its laws, they spoke in the language of their time. Their many references to the flat world, with waters below and above, separated by the bowl-shaped "firmament," with its pathways for sun and stars, or to the "pillars" on which the world stands, the "sheol" or pit beneath it, and the "mountain of God" or pole of the earth above are familiar. We are interested in their views of these things and recognize in them the common conceptions of their age regarding nature. But when they speak of the divine purpose for men, and the duties of individuals and the nation toward God, we recognize in their words a note of authority and power which is of a different sort. Their knowledge of history, shown in their use of it as affording examples of God's dealings with men, is valuable as enabling us to reconstruct with something of certainty the events of the past. But it was no vital part of their utterance, and therefore we see in it merely the means and not the end of their work. To distinguish between the truth and the form in which the truth is stated, between the kernel and the shell, between the gem and its casket, is the task of the biblical student.

This is the only "peculiar view" of inspiration which the historical method provides, but it is sufficient to account for nearly all of the difficulties which have perplexed Bible students in the past. When the same event is described in two or more different ways, not merely variant in details but in substance, which is frequently the case, especially in the Old Testament, from the two accounts of creation onward, no one is troubled if he understands that by different groups of narrators the same story might be told in different and even contradictory ways. But if he holds that "the very words are just the words God wanted written, and hence are true, trustworthy and of divine authority," he is involved with a theory which will not bear the test of facts, a theory which is as objectionable as the one Bro. Fleming disclaims. Let that theory be tried with the two different stories of Saul's choice as king, or of David's introduction at Saul's court. No difficulty is experienced by the Bible student who holds that the sacred writer ("inspired," because impelled by the spirit of God so to speak and write that his people might be led to clearer perception of the divine will) found value in both narratives of the events recalled, and put the accounts side by side in his record. But the two accounts are quite incompatible with any theory of verbal inspiration.

I have before me the questions of a Sunday-school teacher, who, in working over the Book of Acts in preparation for the lessons of this year has come upon and is perplexed by the following facts: (1) Matt. 27:5-8 says that the priests after Judas' suicide, purchased a field with the money he had given back to them. Acts 1:18 says that Judas himself purchased the field. This is a very simple variation, if one accords the writers of the Bible the free use of the materials at their disposal. But it is fatal to the doctrine of verbal exactness. (2) The different manner of Judas' death in 27:5 (hanging himself) and in Acts 1:18, (hurling himself from a cliff). Here also it seems probable that two different reports of the death of the traitor were current in different localities. And the same problem arises regarding "verbal" accuracy. (3) Peter referred the words of Psalm 69:25 to Judas (Acts 1:20). But the psalmist clearly refers to many enemies, not one man, much less Judas. I have discussed the free use of Old Testament Scriptures by the apostles, in the Sunday-school lesson exposition of Jan. 9, to which the questioner is referred. I only note here the bearing of the New Testament passage upon the doctrine of verbal inspiration. The remainder of this list of questions, all of similar nature, and all taken from the Book of Acts, I shall deal with at a later time. I have cited these three only to point out to Bro. Fleming the fact that no biblical student, so far as I know, is searching the Bible for the purpose of finding errors in it. But when in his study he finds records at one place clearly at variance with those in another, or finds chronological data difficult to reconcile with the facts as presented, or finds the frequent use of language inconsistent with accepted views of nature and the world, he has the choice of ignoring these facts, or of "reconciliation," which usually only increases the difficulty, or lastly of recognizing the facts as pointing to the real character of the Bible, not as an inspired text-book on history and science, but as the record of the religious education of the race through holy men, who used all the means at their disposal to make clear to their fellowmen the truths they had learned from God—truths not of history or of science, but of religion. If then in the framework of their teaching we discover statements that do not agree with other statements, or with history or science as these disciplines have taken form through the efforts of reverent and patient workers, we are not perplexed nor disturbed. We look rather for the abiding and imperishable truth in what the prophets taught. And happily here we have a standard of absolute values in the teachings of our Lord.

Bro. Fleming asks the question as to how we are to discriminate between the more and the less valuable. The answer is very simple. In matters in the range of the mere framework of the religious message of the Bible, we are to judge in accord with the recognized standards of historical and scientific character which we apply to any work of the past. But in matters of ethical and spiritual value our appeal is always to Christ. Every prophet's message must be judged, as to its permanent value, by its conformity to the teachings of Christ. This is the meaning of the Transfiguration scene. Moses had spoken; let him speak no more. Elijah had preached; let him henceforth keep silence. "This is my beloved Son; hear ye Him." Nor must we forget for a moment the wonderful advantage which the discovery of this principle of the appeal to Christ gave the fathers of this reformation against the armed and confident sectarianism of their day, with its doctrine of a "level Bible," all parts of which were equally the word of God and equally valuable. No force has been more potent against this unsatisfactory view of the Bible than our own movement, especially in its earlier years.

Of other matters referred to in Bro. Fleming's letter, such as his references to the serpent in the wilderness, and the wisdom of Solomon, I should have been glad to speak had space permitted. If desired, I shall be glad to give them consideration in a later issue.

The Men's Bible Class of the Gibson City (Ill.) Church was organized about a year ago with 45 members. At that time there were 136 men in the fellowship of the church. All but 14 are now members of the Bible class. Every member of the Official Board is in the class and active. The class has an attendance of from 60 to 100. The teacher, J. P. Lowry, is a young man of rare ability and a teacher of the first magnitude. This class gives $25 a year to the campaign now on in the interest of Eureka College, and all the men rejoice in the work.

them intimately, they will be among the most spiritually and intellectually endowed people of their communities. After this heart to heart hour, be sure it can be said of all these graduates they know forty of the world's best books.

In this brief word on books, I have not mentioned the Bible. It is in a class by itself, the supreme revelation, to be treated alone.

CHICAGO

TAKING AMERICAN IDEALS AND MANNERS TO THE FOREIGNERS CONGESTED IN OUR GREAT CITIES. O. F. JORDAN WRITES OF THE SOCIAL SETTLEMENTS OF CHICAGO, ESPECIALLY OF HULL HOUSE

In Chicago there are twenty-five social settlements. Probably none of these was in existence twenty-five years ago. The theory on which these social experiments have been conducted is that there is no way by which foreign populations can be Americanized except by association with Americans. There is no way by which the higher life of the educated can be transmitted to the less favored other than by daily contact. These social settlements, then, are groups of educated people, usually from the great universities, who have lived in daily association with the less fortunate individuals of our cities.

It is interesting to note that many of these social settlements are conducted by women. The most eminent woman in a settlement in Chicago, all would agree, is Miss Jane Addams. She with one companion rented a house at 335 South Halsted in September, 1889. For the first five years, the enterprise was her personal enterprise. The success of the enterprise led to its incorporation with a board of seven trustees. This is its present form of organization.

Hull House Coffee Room

We took lunch the other day in the coffee room of the Hull House. We had asked a policeman in the district where there was a clean restaurant. The air was reeking with strange smells and the restaurants were far from inviting on the outside with promise of unmentionable horrors within. Besides, we would not have been able to order a dinner in this vicinity anyway. Every store had its sign in Greek or Italian. Here was the office of the Greek newspaper. Here were signs in which our feeble memories supplied meaning from the long neglected Anabasis. Our policeman acquaintance proudly told us that there was no better place in Chicago to eat than in the coffee room of the Hull House and that it was cheap too. This fulsome compliment led us to investigate and we were compelled to admit that everything was up to the reputation assigned the place. The dining room was a unique affair. It was fire-proof with the tiling and other construction showing. An effect highly artistic and unique had been secured with permanency at less cost than more elaborate dining rooms sometimes had. Everything was spotlessly clean and the food was cooked by a past master. Even the waitresses had lost the dowdiness that characterized the women of the section and fitted into the atmosphere of the place if indeed they did not help create it. In the dining room was a Bohemian group. There was everything from public school teachers to diggers in the streets. They sat across the tables from each other and often conversed. The snobbery of the city life was forgotten and the brotherhood of man preached in the churches was here in actual practice. Though we saw much about the place, nowhere were we more impressed with the absolute democracy of the Hull House than in its dining room where snobbery would have been the surest to have manifested itself.

Nine Thousand Visitors a Week

On inquiry, we found the number of people visiting the place in the course of a week was enormous. It is true that the buildings cover the most of a city block on Halsted street from Polk to Ewing streets, but we did not realize that the institution reached as many people as it did. Nine thousand people come to the institution each week to participate in its benefits. We think the audience of Gunsaulus in the great Auditorium a great tribute and it is, but here is something which gathers more people together in a week than any church or any two churches in all Chicago.

High Grade Lectures

There is much in the program of the institution. Only a minor feature of the program is the supplying of athletics and amusement. Lectures by professors of the University of Chicago are given and the inhabitants of this section of Chicago come in such numbers that Bowen Hall with its seating capacity of eight hundred is not sufficient to seat the people. Such scientific lectures as "The Plant Life of the Seashore" have gotten such audiences. We venture the suggestion that this lecture would never fill a church in an American section of the city. These foreigners have a zeal for learning that puts to shame the careless and pleasure-loving American.

Some of the methods of the place may prove a bit shocking to the conventionally religious. We confess to a bit of question when we saw the announcement of the dance to be given at Hull House. The leaders there claim, however, that the dance combines physical exercise with social feelings in a way that no other exercise does. From the first the settlement house has taught dancing, and has hoped to put the dangerous dance halls of the neighborhood out of business with a clean dance. We are not familiar enough with this experiment to pass judgment on it.

Another favorite exercise of the Hull House is the giving of dramatic productions. The Italians and Greeks go into this work with the greatest zest. The Shakespeare club—composed of Greeks, Italians and Poles, you must remember—is large and popular. The Greeks give both classic and modern plays in their own language. The Italians and the Irish also present native plays.

Educational classes meet on the different evenings of the week. We read with difficulty a Greek sign which exhorted native Greeks to take the English lessons which were taught in the Greek language. Printing is taught several evenings in the week. Other classes are those in millinery, dress-making, pottery and drawing.

Training for Self Government

The Jane Club is a coöperative boarding club for young women. It was established in 1891. It is a four-story brick building with room for thirty young women. They live together here in a self-governing club at an expense of three dollars a week for rent, service, food and heat. What such a club would mean to the girls of department stores, only they could appreciate.

Miss Addams proceeds on the familiar theory that boys will exhibit the gang instinct in adolescence. There are many small clubs connected with the Hull House with officers and some definite interest to further. These are too numerous even for enumeration. What these will mean, however, in teaching democratic institutions to the children of foreign parents is beyond our full appreciation. Self-government is taught in self-governing clubs and our future voters taught the nature of their responsibilities.

The Hull House is the center of various kinds of political discussion. The exponents of the various economic theories gather there and in the best of humor discuss socialism, trades-unions and other questions of interest to the people of the district. This freedom of discussion in Hull House has led to the charge that it is the center of a socialistic propaganda. This is far from the truth. The settlement is not made the medium of any propaganda other than that of clean living and high ideals. It is true, however, that the thinking of most social experts has been profoundly modified by the theories of socialism. Perhaps few of them are thorough-going socialists, and few would accept the central socialistic principle that the government should own the tools of industry, but they would all go with the socialists in demanding better conditions for the toilers of the nations.

Religion Without the Name

Perhaps you have waited in vain to hear how religion is benefited by the Hull House. Such a movement may seem to some a dangerous rival to the church. A square from the Hull House stands the little Ewing Street Congregational Church. This little chapel compares unfavorably with the great institution nearby which covers a block. Religion is never taught at Hull House. Perhaps a sermon has never been preached there. That may seem to some a serious indictment. When one studies the variety of religions and points of view in this vicinity, however, it will soon be seen that the Hull House could not go on as a distinctly religious propaganda. In the near vicinity is the Ghetto with its thousands of Jews. The Greeks are members of the Greek Catholic Church with congregations near them. The Polanders are Roman Catholics. The Socialistic contingency which is numerous here is opposed to institutional Christianity and could not be induced to set foot in a church for the most part. This varied population could never find unity in a religious institution but can find neighborhood spirit in an institution which appeals only to the more fundamental human instincts. The Commons conducted by Prof. Graham Taylor has a bit more of a religious flavor, though even here the institution is not formally religious.

There are those, however, who do not hesitate to say that the most religious thing in all Chicago is the social settlement. Where else in our city do people forego the society of their own kind to radiate their culture to those less fortunate? The churches rent pews, while here is the true democracy. What the foreign missionary is in China, the settlement worker is in Chicago, minus the preaching. When we remember that Jesus was content to do good, and to talk about life, with little concern about building up institutions, we can understand those in the slums who are concerned only that man and women shall be made better.

A Valuable Lesson for the Church

In spite of this splendid example of the good that can be done outside the church we still confess that we are ardent in our devotion to the church. There is still power and authority in its history and character. Modernized, or as we used to say, brought back to the primitive ideals, it would be today a greater power than ever before. The church could not do what Hull House has done in Hull House neighborhood, but it can in its own locality do a work of similar character. Instead of being a grim, closed house which allows men to enter and pray once or twice a week, it may become a very beehive of activity. Instead of losing sanctity by night classes, it shall acquire sanctity through service, which is the only kind of

Summary of Annual Meeting Reports

CENTRAL CHURCH, INDIANAPOLIS

The annual report of the Central Church, Indianapolis, Allen B. Philputt, pastor, is one of the best in its history. The amount raised for all purposes was $11,882.08. Of this amount $3,034.40 was for missions and benevolence. This church supports three missionaries, two in the foreign field and one in the home field. It has for years observed all the offering days both in the church and Sunday-school. The Sunday-school has a total enrollment in all departments of eight hundred and thirty-four and raised last year over $1,200.00.

There were one hundred and nine additions during the year and a net gain of fifty-eight.

Plans will soon be undertaken for the enlargement of the building.

FIRST CHURCH, FORT COLLINS, COLORADO

During the year there were three hundred and eight additions to the church; the Sunday-school has an enrollment of two hundred and twenty-seven, not including the thirty-nine members of the Home Department, and the forty-nine enrolled in the Cradle Roll. The Senior C. E. Society has forty members and raised $217.49 during the year; the Juniors have fifty members and raised $35.00; the Intermediate Society, fifty members and raised $106.34. The Ladies Aid raised $940-.36; The C. W. B. M., forty eight members, raised $291.40; Men's Brotherhood, sixty-two members, raised $162.95. The treasurer's reports show the church proper to have collected $2,639.52, aside from an improvement fund of $1,176.00 and to have given to missions, $637.65. J. F. Findley is the successful pastor.

The Independence Boulevard Church has called to George P. Taubman to the associate pastorate. Brother Taubman will give himself largely to the educational and evangelistic work of the church through the agency of the Bible School. We are expecting large things from his coming. Our people have received Brother Taubman with open arms and hearts and he measures up every inch to our liking.

George H. Combs.

Jan. 13-09.

TAYLORVILLE, ILLINOIS

Have organized a training class here with forty members. A. M. Bloxam is the teacher. We began our Sunday-school the first Sunday of the year with two hundred and four present and $5.70 collection. Have expended $2,600 in improvements the past year and have had one hundred and fifty-one additions during the past fifteen months. All departments of our work active.

M. L. Pontius.

CHICO, CALIFORNIA.

The Chico Church held its annual roll call and business meeting January 1.

A banquet was served by the ladies, after which, reports showing a gain in membership of sixty-five for the year, were read.

Total membership to date four hundred and ten. Amount of money raised for all purposes $4,258.92. Pastor's report shows ninety sermons preached, four hundred and sixty-five visits, thirteen weddings and fifty-one funerals. All departments in good condition. The pastor is also conducting a teacher's training class of fifty members.

G. L. Lobdell, Pastor.

LEBANON, INDIANA

At the annual dinner, and business meeting of the Central Church, January seven, three hundred of the members were present. The yearly reports were given by the head of each department of work showing that during the past year the total amount of money raised by the entire church was $4,470.16, of this amount $707.17 was for missions. During the year there were one hundred and twenty-two members received. There was a loss of twenty-six by removal, eighteen by letter, and nine by death, making a net gain of sixty-seven. The present resident membership is six hundred and sixty-seven. The entire debt on their splendid building has been paid. The church is helping a young man through Lexington school who is preparing for the ministry.

THIRD CHURCH, PHILADELPHIA.

At the annual congregational meeting of the Third Church, Philadelphia, Pa., January 13, the records showed that our church, as a whole, gave $809.00 to missions during the year. I began my twelfth year here February 1.

SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA.

Total present membership 234. Added in 1908, fifty-four. Net gain for the year twenty-two. Total money raised for local expenses $2,631.99; for missions and benevolences $367.55. The average attendance at Sunday-school was 112 for the year. The Senior C. E. has twenty-seven members. Intermediate thirty-one, Juniors fifty-five and C. W. B. M. twenty-seven members. Sumner T. Martin has been pastor since August 15.

JOPLIN, MO.

W. F. Turner closes ten years and one month of service with the First Church at Joplin, Mo., Jan. 24. These have been faithful years. Exactly 2,000 persons had taken fellowship with the church at the close of the ten years. The ties that bind Bro. Turner are very strong. He was born and reared in Southwest Missouri, and with the exception of four years ministry at La Belle, Mo., his entire ministry, since graduating from Kentucky University has been given to this section. At the recent Jasper County Convention the following resolutions were passed, expressing the appreciation of the brethren of the county of his services in behalf of the Master's cause.

"Whereas, Our beloved brother and fellow-worker, W. F. Turner, who for the past ten years has been a moving spirit in the co-operative work of our county, has resigned the work of the First Christian Church at Joplin, and is soon to remove from Jasper County to Peoria, Ill., therefore be it

Resolved, That we express to him our appreciation of the inestimable service he has rendered the cause of our Master in this county and district during his long residence here, and that we deeply regret his departure from our midst.

Resolved, That we commend him to the brethren in his new field of labor as a man of earnest piety, a deep student of God's word, a preacher of spiritual power, and a wise and capable leader, and earnestly pray that the blessings of our heavenly Father may rest richly upon all his work."

F. F. Walters, of Springfield, succeeds Brother Turner, beginning his work about March 1. Brother Walters has done a splendid work at Springfield and he comes well-equipped to lead the First Church into larger things.

Villa Heights Church held ordination services Jan. 3, setting apart their minister, J. W. Fomuliver, to the work of an evangelist, and two elders and five deacons. W. F. Turner and the writer conducted the service.

South Joplin continues to go forward. There were 263 in Bible-school Jan. 10, although the day was stormy. We are pushing for 300 in regular attendance. The writer and H. M. Barnett, of Webb City, exchange meetings during Jan. and Feb.

Geo. L. Peters.

WOODLAWN, ALABAMA.

Every department of the church is in working order and the spirit of progress is in our midst. We closed the old year with two additions at the last Lord's Day service. We are observing the Week of Prayer.

J. David Arnold.

A MEMORABLE MEETING.

On the very historic ground, most hallowed in the hearts of Disciples all over the world, a most remarkable revival has just closed. This historic spot is Washington, Pa., the first American home of Thomas Campbell. The place where the Declaration and Address first saw the light. The revival was held by George L. Snively with C. H. Althiede as singer. Things which justify us in saying it was an unusual revival are better appreciated by those on the field than those away from us can possibly realize. First, the First Church had closed a great meeting, having 134 additions, in March, 1908, and had not planned another until about the same time this year.

Second, Henry Ostrom, and three associates began a great union campaign on the 25th of November and closed on Dec. 13th. The town was greatly stirred and more than 118 persons signed cards preferring the First Church. We dared to begin our meeting Dec. 20th with only two weeks and three Lord's days in which to compass this great work, and with all these seeming difficulties in the way we persuaded our Brother Snively and singer to hold this meeting. It has resulted in a great victory. Brother Snively is a loyal, eloquent, powerful preacher. He has withstood every comparison possible with other noted evangelists heard recently, and stands higher in the esteem of the people than any. There were 176 additions. A very great number of these are men. The union of divided families was a striking feature of the results. His illustrated sermons to the Bible School were such as never to be forgotten in their applications to great and vital subjects of life and religious faith.

The most remarkable and beautiful service was a special service called "A Tribute to the Pioneers," held in connection with the Communion services on the last Lordsday afternoon. It was inspirational to the young and soul-reviving to the veterans in the church.

Bro. Snively's work is not complete without his solidifying and unifying the whole membership in greatly increasing the revenue of the church by plainly and most practically enlisting the new and old members in a strong bond of fellowship in the Lord's work, home and world-wide.

The additions were classified as follows:

One hundred twenty-five confessions—eight by letter from other religious bodies.

Twenty-seven by letter and statement from Christian churches.

Sixteen reclaimed.

Of the 118 cards signed preferring Christian church in union meeting, 69 united during the revival. E. A. Cole, Minister.

Washington, Pa., Jan. 5, 1909.

WITH THE WORKERS

The church at Lawton, Okla., recently burned a $1,000 mortgage and improved their building at a cost of $200.

The Highland Park Church, Los Angeles, where E. A. Child ministers has doubled its membership in the past ten months.

A. C. Parker has resigned the pastorate of the church at Midland, Texas, to become field agent for the Midland College.

Douglass Weber, of Providence, Rhode Island, has been holding evangelistic meetings to reach the Chinamen of that city.

Miss Edna P. Dale, of Wuhu, China, recently spoke at the Christian Church, Atlanta, Ill., where Ralph Calloway is the minister.

The church at LaPorte, Ind., is in a meeting. H. M. Garrard, the pastor is doing the preaching, and C. M. Hughes has charge of the music.

All obligations for 1908 met with a balance in the treasury. Church happy and in the best condition in its history, is the word of J. T. Ogle, pastor of the church at Paris, Texas.

Drake University will have a summer school of ten weeks, this year, according to a recent decision of the Board of Trustees. The work offered will be especially adapted to the needs of teachers.

The Second Church, Brooklyn, under the leadership of their pastor, Joseph Keevil, will devote the month of February to evangelism, in which they will have the help of Lowell C. McPherson, vice-president of Keuka College.

The Iowa State Board has appointed W. T. Fisher, C. C. Davis and J. J. Grove, a committee to secure a successor to C. L. Organ, as superintendent of Christian Endeavor and of Sunday-school work for the state.

Education day approaches. It is well to note the words of President King of Oberlin, in a recent address before the students of Yale University: "The prominence of the Ohio man is due to the prevalence of the Ohio college more than to any other single cause."

The church at Oskaloosa, Iowa, has a fine Sunday-school. The average attendance for the year 1908 was 292; the average collection was $9.81. Such a church must experience a continuous growth in membership, and will be composed of those who have come into church membership through intelligent choice.

Nelse C. Hansen is the teacher of a class of seventy-five messenger boys in the Sunday-school of the Capitol Church, Des Moines. The boys are from eight to twelve years of age. This is a commendable plan, for the boys belonging thus to the same industrial class will naturally be in the more sympathetic accord.

The semi-centennial of the church at Ionia, Mich., will be celebrated January 20 to 24. There will be addresses as follows: "The History of the Disciples of Christ in Michigan," F. P. Arthur; "The Church and the Brotherhood," Dr. Herbert L. Willett; "The Reformation of the Nineteenth Century," W. T. Moore; "The History of the Ionia Church," C. A. Preston; "Isaac Errett," W. T. Moore. This celebration will be followed immediately by evangelistic meetings led by M. J. Grable, evangelist, and Una Dell Berry, singer. G. W. Moore is the pastor of the church.

C. C. Buckner goes from Aurora, Ill., to South Bend, Ind.

The church at 169th street, New York, S. T. Willis, will install a new pipe organ in the early spring.

Louisiana has a new corresponding secretary, R. L. Porter of Baton Rouge, who will also edit the state paper.

David H. Shields of Salina, Kan., delivered one of the educational addresses in Eureka, Ill., Sunday, January 17. He graduated from Eureka thirteen years ago.

The church at Paris, Ky., held a recent meeting, in which they were assisted by President R. H. Crossfield, of Transylvania University. There were thirty-six additions to the church. Carey E. Morgan is the princely leader and much beloved pastor for this church.

The Capitol Hill Church, Des Moines, Iowa, under the leadership of H. E. Van Horn, is in a meeting, assisted by John L. Brandt, Evangelist, B. L. Burdette, leader of song; Mrs. J. L. Brandt, personal worker and organizer of the Sunbeam Chorus. The meeting is succeeding beyond the expectation of the church.

The Oxnard Mission under the Southern California Board has just closed a very successful meeting, in which John T. Stivers did the preaching. E. N. Phillips has been pastor of the church for a little more than a year and has rapidly developed the church, so that now the church has declared its ability to support its work without depending upon the State Board for help.

J. J. Morgan who has been for three years pastor of the First Church, Fort Worth, Texas, has resigned, and will close his work in ninety days. Mr. Morgan's work is most highly commended, both for his pulpit ability and his efficiency as a pastor. He is indeed one of the most successful pastors in the brotherhood. Mr. Morgan's plans for the future are not announced.

The $100,000.00 endowment fund for Hiram College has been raised, and the institution will enter upon a new era. It will be remembered that Mr. Carnegie promised $25,000 on the condition that the friends of the college raise $75,000. Through the prompt and energetic efforts of President Bates this has been accomplished. Our colleges are thus rapidly coming to the front in the educational work.

In his annual report, E. R. Moore, the clerk of the church at Davenport, Iowa, says: "Through the able leadership of our beloved pastor, S. M. Perkins, the work of the church has advanced steadily on every line and in every department. The church is unified and we are all one and of one mind. The treasurer's report shows $4,537.67 to have been raised; all outstanding bills paid, and a balance in the treasury for the coming year. There has been a net increase of ninety-eight in the church membership."

The pastors of the Christian churches in Fort Worth, Texas, say regarding J. J. Morgan, who has just resigned the pastorate of the First Church: "He has been a faithful co-worker and preacher of unusual ability. His fine social qualities added to his fine scholarly instincts and training, his unwavering good judgment and spiritual force, make him fitted to lead any people to the highest planes of Christian living and service. He has done a most commendable work and we deplore the decision that takes him from us."

F. B. Elsmore has resigned the pastorate at Russellville, Ill.

President McLean held a missionary rally at the First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

C. A. Lowe and C. L. Harbord are the new evangelists of the Missouri State Board.

Fifteen Disciples are studying in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago.

I. N. McCash of Berkeley, Cal., writes in highest appreciation of the work of Lockhart, Linnitt and Garmong, in a recent meeting with the church at Berkeley.

The churches of the Pacific Coast are enjoying the privilege of hearing Walter G. Menzies and wife who were for seven years missionaries under our Foreign Board in Rath, India.

Rev. W. F. Reagor, for seven years pastor at Sacramento, Cal., has resigned to accept a call to the church at Portland, Ore. His work at Sacramento has been attended with unusual success and it was with reluctance that the church consented to his departure.

The church at Lincoln, Neb., H. H. Harmon pastor, has moved into the basement of their new church where they will worship until the completion of the building. Their problem is where to stow away their 300 members of the Sunday-school for these three months.

O. C. Bolman, pastor at Havana, Ill., is doing the preaching in a meeting held by the church there, and is being assisted by J. W. Sniff as leader of song, who has organized a chorus of seventy voices. The efforts of the church are meeting with encouraging success.

On January 17, the church at Clinton, Ill., under the leadership of the pastor, Albert Schwartz, began a series of special meetings. Mr. Schwartz, who will do the preaching, has announced his sermons, which are of an educational type. This sort of work will make for permanent progress in the church. Mr. Schwartz is doing a successful work at Clinton.

The American Christian Missionary Society, and the Disciples Missionary Union of New York City have united in the support of the work of the Second Church of Christ, Brooklyn, New York. Joseph Keevil is the minister. The church plans the erection of a building to cost not less than $50,000.00, with institutional features so as to meet the needs of that community and to in some adequate measure reach the foreign population about the church. This is business in Christianity. Only as the Disciples of Christ adopt such far reaching, effective measures will they be able to exert any influence upon the great cities. Chicago needs such work.

The current issue of the Illinois Christian News is devoted to the interests of Eureka College. The committee to raise an endowment of $250,000 in the next four years is beginning aggressive work. Other colleges have been raising large endowment funds. Drake, Butler, Hiram have made great leaps forward. The Disciples of Illinois have the money and certainly they will not allow Eureka to be behind the others in this matter. For small endowment means a limited teaching force, and this means that many of the best young people of our churches will not attend our own college at all. The people have the money. They will respond to the call.

WITH THE WORKERS

D. S. Henkel is the new pastor of the church at Harrisonburg, Va.

O. H. Williams has become pastor of the church at Lebanon, Ohio.

Colby D. Hall, Waco, Texas has been called to the First Church, San Antonio, where he will succeed W. W. Wharton.

E. E. Mack, and the church at Atlantic. Iowa, are in a meeting. Chas E. McVey is leading the singing.

C. F. Ladd reports five accessions to the membership of the church at Rock Falls, Ill., on a recent Sunday Morning.

The Virginia Christian College is erecting two new buildings; one to be used as dormitory and the other a lecture hall.

O. P. Speigel is in a successful meeting with the Broadway Church, Los Angeles. Mrs. Princess Long is in charge of the music.

The Primary Mothers' Circle is an interesting feature of the work of the First Church, Bloomington, where Edgar Jones is pastor.

James S. Meyers and the Central Church, Kansas City, Kan., will hold a meeting in February and will be assisted by W. A. Gardner.

The Sunday-schools of the Christian churches of Richmond and Manchester, Va., have an association, with H. O. C. MacLachlan as president.

The church at New Castle progresses under the leadership of L. C. Howe. There are frequent additions to the membership. They have just paid $650.99 of indebtedness.

George H. Combs, pastor of the Independence Blvd. Church of Kansas City, is to leave shortly for a trip in the Orient to Egypt and the Holy Land. James Small will supply the pulpit during his absence.

A. C. Smither has been pastor of the First Church, Los Angeles, Cal., for nineteen years, and occupies a leading place among the religious workers of the city. He was called upon to deliver the address before the Y. M. C. A. on the first Sunday of the New Year.

The 1908 report showed 160 sermons and addresses, 1564 calls, twenty-six funerals, thirty-one weddings, and 695 additions, not including the twenty-seven added at Camden Point, Mo. 598 of these came during the Scoville meetings.

W. A. Wherry, Norman, Okla., reports twenty-five additions to the church since the beginning of his work there last September. The church debt has been provided for, and the church is in an encouraging condition. They are planning to hold a tent meeting next summer.

On January 3, J. W. Lowber preached his farewell sermon of the Central Church, Austin, Texas, where he has served for twelve years, with strength and efficiency, bringing the church to occupy a leading place in the life of the city. Mr. Lowber will lecture and hold evangelistic meetings.

President McLean conducted the missionary rally at the First Church, Bloomington, January 13. Addresses were made by Ralph Calloway, Atlanta; C. C. Wisher, Bellflower; Albert Schwartz, Clinton; Dr. James Butchart, China; B. H. Sezlock, Lexington; H. L. Maltman, Saybrook; W. H. Hanna, the Philippines; C. W. Marlowe, Stanford; C. J. Robertson, Heyworth; W. G. McCooley, Normal.

The Miles Avenue Church, Cleveland, Ohio, is being assisted in a short meeting by J. J. Tisdall.

W. F. Richardson and family are back from a sojourn in New Mexico. Mrs. Richardson is much improved in health.

The churches of Richmond, Va., are entering enthusiastically into the work of the Chapman meetings which began there Jan. uary 6.

L. L. Carpenter dedicated the new church at Dunnith, Ind., January 17. The church is the outgrowth of a meeting held there two years ago by L. C. Howe, of New Castle, Ind.

In a recent contest between the Sunday-school at Alexandria, Ind., and one at Elwood, of the same state, the former won. Both Sunday-schools were greatly helped by the contest.

L. O. Bricker has resigned at Cameron, Mo., and accepted a call to the church at Maryville, Mo. Mr. Bricker has been with the church for four years; the best four years in the history of the church.

The Bartholomew County Christian Missionry Association, comprising all the Christian churches in Bartholomew County, Ind., has just closed a most successful year. The new trustees are Mr. T. Reeves, Joseph I. Irwin, William E. Springer, B. M. Hutchins, and William F. Kendall. It raised more money for missions the last year than in any previous year of its history.

E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., and Mrs. Emma Gordon, the widow of Dr. Gordon of India, were married on January 12.

F. E. Jaynes is conducting a revival in the church at Pendelton, Ind. Mr. Mannon, an evangelistic singer, of Indianapolis is assisting him.

C. A. Polson closed a three weeks' meeting at Exira, Ia., with fifteen additions to the church. Mr. Polson has resigned this charge but has not yet located elsewhere.

Indianapolis, Ind.—Twelve confessions at regular services in December, 85 in fourteen months' pastorate here. Begin evangelistic services with home forces Jan. 3 The church grants me permission to hold two or three meetings elsewhere. If you want one write me.

Dec. 30, 1908. Chas. M. Fillmore.

J. E. Davis has just entered upon the fourth year of a very successful work with the church at Beatrice, Nebraska. From the Beatrice Christian Call, the weekly paper of the church we take the following statement:

The three years' work showed 450 sermons and addresses, 4,166 calls, sixty-three funerals, 110 people married, 893 added to the church, with a membership of over 1,200 residents and a total, non-resident and all, of 1,402 members. Many of the non-resident members are regular contributors. If beneath all this tabulated work the spirit of God does not flow with power, our glorying in victories is our open shame. But our church as a mighty unit has championed the moral right of the community; it has grown to be a great missionary force and has taken a forward step in sending out its pastor as an evangelist to hold one meeting a year in other fields.

We now support Dr. James Butchart at Tu Chow Fu, China, and Dr. Mary Langdon at Deoghur, India as American missionaries to the heathen world. For these two great works no public call was made on our congregation except at children's day. The church has contracted with Herbert Yewell and his workers for a meeting to begin immediately after the Pittsburg convention or about October 15 to 20. It is putting it mildly to say our congregation is optimistic and happy.

THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR MEMBERSHIP RALLY.

Christian Endeavor has become a world-wide enterprise. There are now 70,000 Christian Endeavor Societies with a membership of about 3,500,000. Besides training these millions of young people for service in the churches, the 70,000 Christian Endeavor Societies are doing much to promote the cause of Christian union. Certainly no people should be more active in the work of Christian Endeavor, or devoted to its interests, than the Disciples of Christ, and the fact that our people held second place in the number of societies among the various churches at the time of holding the last International Christian Endeavor Convention is a reason for great rejoicing. Our Endeavor leaders soon after, set the following as our Centennial Aim:

The Centennial Aim of Christian Endeavor among the Disciples of Christ is to be, by 1909, first among the Endeavorers of the various churches in the following:

1. First in the number of organizations.

WITH THE WORKERS

2. First in the number of members.
3. First in the amount of money given for missions through our missionary societies.

Our Intermediate and Junior Societies form a large part of our Endeavor host, and must have a large part in the work for reaching our Centennial Endeavor Aim.

The first Sunday in February is observed throughout the world as Christian Endeavor Day. For several years the entire month of February has been set apart by the Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for a membership rally for Intermediate and Junior Societies—and Mission Bands, as well—these three kinds of organizations composing the department. As 1909 is not only the Centennial year of our religious movement, but also the Quarter-Centennial of the Young People's Department, especial effort will be made to hold successful rallies this year. The Young People's Department is deserving of far more consideration on the part of the people of our churches generally, than it has hitherto received. It is the chief organized work for training the children of our churches for service and giving them a missionary spirit. The missionaries upon every field are telling us that the hope of success in their work is in the children; that it is by those who are trained aright from childhood that the nations are to be evangelized. The same thing is true concerning the work of our churches in the homeland and our missionary enterprises. If, like Samuel, a child shall minister before the Lord, shall virtually be brought up in the house of the Lord, shall early know what it is to give time and thought and treasure for the advancement of the kingdom of his Lord, he will be ready to listen to the voice of God and accept the divine guidance throughout his life. Not only is the individual thus blessed, but he becomes a blessing. The societies that have been training the children for service during the past quarter of a century have also been largely furnishing the church with her efficient workers. They have given her Sunday-school superintendents and teachers, Christian Endeavor leaders, and many of the chief men and women of the local churches. And many of those who have given themselves to the ministry of the word in the home and foreign lands have been led to such consecration by some faithful Mission Band or Junior Superintendent, who wrought far better than she dreamed.

Our missionary treasuries, as well as our missionaries, have been largely increased by the work of our societies and bands. The sums credited to the children in our reports have never been large, and will never be great. But because those who were trained to give largely of their small things in childhood, have grown to manhood and womanhood, and are giving largely of their abundance, other reports of receipts are and will be such as to create great enthusiasm. The year that the Christian Woman's Board of Missions was organized, the entire receipts of the National Board, that included all our missionary work, was $5,183.43—and this from some six hundred thousand Disciples. That there was reported more than a million of dollars in each of our two last annual missionary reports is due in no inconsiderable way to the fact that some boys and girls have been trained in Children's Endeavor Societies and Mission Bands, and that a still larger company have through the Sunday-school helped the work of missions on Children's Day and been helped themselves thereby. This work of the Young People's Department has accomplished more than any of us have come to know or understand, and it deserves to be brought to the attention of the entire church during its twenty-fifth anniversary in a way that will be heard and heeded.

There is great opportunity for increasing the membership of our Endeavor Societies during the February rally. Tens of thousands of young people have been gathered into our Sunday-schools during the rallies held within recent months, which sometimes continued for three months or more in one school. All the members of the Sunday-schools who are not adults should be won for our Intermediate and Junior Societies. The same methods that succeeded in the schools will succeed in the work for the boys' and girls' missionary organizations. Please arrange for this work at once.

Mattie Pounds, National Superintendent.

CHURCH EXTENSION RECEIPTS.

Receipts for October, November and December 1908, Compared With Same Time During 1907.

Churches.

For this year	$7,646.31.
For last year	6,929.98.
Gain	$ 716.33.

Individuals.

For this year	$4,645.99.
For last year	2,847.99.
Gain	$1,797.59.
Total gain	$2,513.92.

Our comparative Statement shows that we have made a total gain of $2,513.92 in receipts. There is a gain of $716.33 from the churches. We also gained 49 in the number of contributing churches. We are grateful to churches and individuals who have helped to make this gain. There are yet quite a number of churches that ordered supplies for the Annual Offering in September and that promised to take the offering that we have not yet heard from.

The first fifteen days of January show a gain in our receipts of $2,794.31. Remit to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 500 Waterworks Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

NOTES FROM THE LONE STAR STATE.

The work among "Plain Christians" in Texas is progressing nicely. The November offering for State work far surpassed that of previous years. Quite a considerable number of Living-links have been added to the list. The recent reports from the general work all along the line have been encouraging.

The writer has recently assisted in locating A. W. Gehres of Brook, Ind., at Iowa Park, Tex. W. C. Wright at Rule, Tex; W. Pearce of Dearing, Kans., at Hamlin, Tex.; W. H. Anderson, of Paris, Ark; at Brady, Texas; and J. N. Thomas at El Campo, Tex. He has assisted lately in organizing churches at Archer City, Iowa Park and Electro. The money was raised a few days ago for a new church-house at Hamlin.

The Bowie District Convention convenes at Wichita Falls, Feb. 13-15.

The Texas Ministerial Institute will be held at Waco this year the last week of Jan. Following that is the South Texas Missionary Rally and following that immediately is the Texas Lectureship.

The South Texas Convention meets this year at San Antonio, Jan. 9-11.

The prospects in Texas for the new year are very promising. There never were more open doors in promising new fields for planting churches. Texas is a great field of growing possibilities. W. A. Boggess,
Sta. A Dallas, Tex. 1-9-'09 State Evangelist.

The Young People's Department of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is this year celebrating its Quarter-Centennial and is asking the young people's societies in all our churches to each give as much as $25.00 this silver anniversary year. It is hoped also that as many as 100 societies will each give $100 in celebration of the Centennial of our religious movement. Many of our organizations have already sent pledges that they will try to raise this amount. Among these organizations are the following: Arkansas, Fayetteville Junior Society; California, Los Angeles (First Church) Junior Society; Indiana, Mishawaka Junior Society, Irvington Junior Society, Bloomington Intermediate and Junior Societies, Franklin Intermediate Society and Mission Band; Iowa, Des Moines (University Place) Junior Society, (Capitol Hill) Junior Society, Marshalltown Junior Society, Farragut Junior Society, Davenport Junior Society; Kentucky, Lexington Junior Society; Maryland, Baltimore (Harlem Avenue) Junior Society; Massachusetts, Boston Junior Society; Mexico, Monterey Junior Society; Missouri, St. Louis (Compton Heights) Junior Society, Joplin Junior Society; New York, New York (Lenox Avenue) Junior Society; North Carolina, Belhaven Mission Band, Kinston Mission Band; Ohio, Akron (High Street Church) Junior Society, Kenton Junior Society, Cleveland (Franklin Circle) Junior Society, Mansfield, Junior Society; Pennsylvania, New Castle (First Church) Junior Society; Tennessee, Murfreesboro Junior Society, Nashville (Vine Street) M. B., Memphis (Mississippi Ave.) Intermediate and Junior Society; Washington, Seattle (First Church) Junior Society.

BETHANY ASSEMBLY NOTES.

The prospects for a successful Assembly in 1909 are the brightest known within the history of "dear old Bethany." The National Bible School Association will hold a National Bible Conference on August 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th, as a worthy successor to the enthusiastic Teacher-Training Institute held last year. Other great features are in process of development, that will make the 1909 session the best ever held.

The Secretary's annual report at First Quarterly Board Meeting, held January 6, 1909, showed the present value of the Assembly grounds and improvements to be over $32,000. The Board has been offered over $50,000 for this property. Over $5,000 in improvements and repairs have been made in the last three years.

The Program Committee consists of L. L. Carpenter, A. E. Philputt and the writer. This committee would be glad to receive suggestions in reference to the program for 1909. If you know of some good features that can be secured, write the undersigned.

W. E. M. Hackleman, Sec.

Anything short of heroic giving for world-wide missions on the part of our congregations during this Centennial year will be a sad reflection upon our sense of gratitude for past Centennial benefactions.

The whole world is open and ready for the gospel now. More Living-link churches and individuals in the great work. More support from our great brotherhood, so that more workers may be sent.

THE FAMILY ALTAR LEAGUE.

No undertaking was ever given a more cordial welcome by Christian people than has been accorded the new Family Altar League, which is just being established by W. E. Biederwolf and a few others. The thinking portion of the church realizes that the question of how to cultivate the religious of the home is one of the most vital and most disturbing problems that the church faces today. A generation ago, in almost every Christian home in the country, the family altar was a recognized custom. Every day it was the habit of the family,young and old to gather together while the father read some portion of the Word of God, and then all would kneel as a blessing was reverently invoked upon the home and its members. Today that household is an exception where united daily prayer is a custom. In most Christian homes, the sad fact is that the scriptures are seldom opened in the presence of the family, and the children rarely hear their parents' voices raised in the home.

To him who has ever known the rich blessings of family prayer and felt its influence, and who treasures the sacred memories that cluster around the family altar of his childhood, it brings a feeling of sorrow as he realizes that the good old custom has almost passed into neglect and disuse, and that children are coming up into manhood and womanhood in homes where the scriptures is practically a sealed book and prayer unknown. One can not but wonder what will be the effect when, under such circumstances this generation rises to the place of control in the nation. It does not augur well for the future of our Christian land.

It was because of this that the League was given such a glad welcome when it was first announced to the public. A great gathering of evangelists, last summer gave it the promise of their enthusiastic support, and since the plan has been made pulic in other ways, thousands of letters have been received by the organizers and others interested. These have come from all sections of the country and from other lands, and have been unanimous in their hearty commendation of the idea.

The Family Altar League is not a society as generally understood. It has no local organization and no meeting. It simply is a nation-wide company of people who have taken the same vows and are moved by the same purposes, and membership is not conditioned on any elaborate requirements. The plan in brief is this: Attractive cards are distributed by evangelist and pastors, bearing the following covenant:

Believing myself to be largely responsible for the eternal salvation and religious training of my children, and realizing the need of God's grace for my own Christian life, I covenant with God to make it the rule of my life to gather together, each day so far as possible, the members of my family, and together read some portion of His word and and pray for His blessing upon my home.

Husband.....

Wife.....

This card is signed by the husband and wife, and sent to the headquarters of the League in Chicago, 602 Lakeside Bldg., where it is filed, and in its place is sent a beautifully engraved wall-card, certifying that, "This home is enrolled in the Family Altar League," and bearing also the words of the covenant. A detached portion of the card is given to the pastor as a reminder that the family is registered in the League. Every card is numbered, and an exact record kept of every registry. Cards will be gladly sent free to any one making application at headquarters.

To make the League a vital and permanent thing, there will be published in connection with it a little monthly magazine filled with helpful thoughts and suggestions. Dr. Biederwolf has associated with him, on the editorial staff some of the most consecrated Bible teachers and prominent leaders in the devotional life in the country, and the magazine will be a valuable help to all Christians. Its field will be exclusively Bible study and Bible helps and the prayer life with special attention to young converts and the home life. Rev. Hugh T. Kerr, pastor of the Fullerton Ave. Presbyterian Church, Chicago, will have entire charge of the publication. The magazine will be furnished to the members of the League at actual cost. The whole undertaking will entail no small financial outlay, but it is backed by men whose money is consecrated to the work of Christ, and the return in good done will mean more than any financial gain possibly could.

Surely God will abundantly bless such a worthy effort as this, for if the evangelists and pastors give it the support it deserves, and the Christian people continue to stand by it as they have generally begun to do it will mean great things for the Kingdom of Christ, in the quickening of the religious life of the home, and it will tell for years and generations to come. The year 1909 ought to see the establishment or the re-establishment of the family altar and the united worship of God in thousands of homes.

Ingram, Wis. Ray Y. Cliff.

LOWELL'S THOUGHT OF GOD.

'Tis Sorrow builds the shining ladder up,
Whose golden rounds are our calamities,
Whereon our firm feet planting, nearer God
The spirit climbs, and hath its eyes unsealed.
True is it that Death's face seems stern and cold
When he is sent to summon those we love;
But all God's angels come to us disguised;
Sorrow and Sickness, Poverty and Death,
One after other lift their frowning masks,
And we behold the seraph's face beneath,
All radiant with the glory and the calm
Of having looked upon the front of God.

—James Russell Lowell.

This coming year the number of Living-link churches in the Foreign Society should be doubled. The foreign work is the greatest enterprise of the churches.

WITH THE WORKERS

WHAT'S THE USE?

Say these words over to each other January 17th, Education Day:

As long as the Christian Home has a place the Christian College, next to the Christian Church, will be its chief ally.

Education cannot be bought like sardines until children are reared like oysters.

When your congregation is content to meet forever in the Court House or the Lodge Room, the whole body of Disciples may be satisfied with a State University or a Methodist College.

We must put our colleges above defense.

It is cheaper to paint the college fence and pay the the professor a living wage than to explain.

"Good enough" does it satisfy the twentieth century American, while his children tolerate the best only until it can be improved!

Alien education may not warp the head, but it alienates the heart—and "out of the heart are the issues of life."

Are United States Army Officers trained in British war colleges? And yet the science and art of fighting are not difficult there, and we are zealously cultivating our affection for the mother country.

No Presbyterian Church for me!—but a Presbyterian College for my son.

"Leaders lead." We propose to lead the religious world into union—while they are laughing at our ignorance. While they are serene in their ignorance of our existence.

Dollar for dollar, through our sons who have received alien education and bestowed their gifts where they got their skill, we have lost enough to endow all our schools.

Not the "irony of fate" but the Discipline of Providence compels us individually and collectively to sacrifice to the quick for Education.

The Presbyterians educated all four of our Pioneers for us. They and others have schooled many more on whose brains we have fed and multiplied. In "the year of a hundred years" we ought to cease at once and forever playing the Educational pauper!

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

CLARENDON, ARKANSAS.

A few words fom a cotton-patch church might be of interest to our brethren. We are not a large congregation, and are not making much fuss about our work, yet we are doing what we can to upbuild the Kingdom in this Eastern Arkansas.

Our land is low, comparatively, and Clarendon proper is levied in; yet overflows seldom effect us in this portion of the (Monroe) county. Our church was organized in July, 1902, in our court house, by Dr. C. C. Cline, who had just closed a five weeks' meeting with 116 additions and forty-five baptisms. We met for three years in the Court house with random preaching, trying to decide whether we wanted to buy a cheap lot in the suburbs of the town, or come down near the business district to build, and pay a little more for a lot, and use a little common sense with our religion just as we do in our everyday affairs. At last we decided to carry our common ordinary intelligence into our religious activities and purchased an elegant corner lot in one block of the Court Square, and thereon erected the first concrete building in the county.

At the dedication of our little church by L. L. Carpenter we felt our work was done, that we were out of the court house and that the people would flock to the new building. Brethren, in six months our own folks quit flocking, to say nothing of outsiders. We had learned another lesson. We had learned that our efforts must be unceasing if we succeed. Most of us were resting when that fact dawned upon us, then most of us quit resting immediately. We haven't rested since. We can't. We're scared to.

We worked along on this wise for some time when at the beginning of 1908 we engaged a minister for the year, Bro. R. B. Orahood. After ten months' labor among us he resigned, and now we have called Bro. A. R. Adams of Fremont, Mich., to take the work. He has accepted and will be with us quite likely, about the first Lord's Day in February. He is recommended as being a very able and worthy man and we look forward to his coming with joy.

Bro. H. A. McCarty of Little Rock, closed a four weeks' meeting for us in November, 1908, with six additions and five baptisms. Bro. McCarty is the most sweet-spirited man we ever had in our midst. He succeeded in getting us all in a good humor with one another and then getting the community in a good humor with us. He was ably assisted by his daughter, Miss Hallie. who has an exceptionally fine voice, and is also a strong congregational song leader. She succeeds in getting everybody to sing. Their services were of great benefit to our people.

Our church has seventy-five members and is growing steadily. We had eighteen additions this year and expect to make 1909 our banner year. There are more negroes than white people in this town, and county too, for that matter. I am trying to establish a little negro church in this place and give our colored brethren the benefit of primitive Christianity. This is a great problem and I will write some facts in regard to it in another paper some time later.

THE PACIFIC COAST CHURCHES AND THE CONGO.

Our people of Oregon are engaged in the heroic task of raising money for the building of a mission steamer on the Congo. This will cost $15,000. Tney are making the raising of this money tneir Centennial task for foreign missions. Geo. C. Ritcney of Newberg, Ore., is leading this work. Dr. Dye launched it last summer. Already they have $4,000 in cash and pledges. The steamer is to be called the "Oregon." No finer work in gospel extension than this can possibly be done. The "Oregon" will be a great lightbearer to millions in the dark Congo region. Our missionaries have open to them 1,000 miles of navigable waterways in our own district there. God speed the "Oregon."

Southern California has undertaken as her Centennial aim, the raising of $10,000 for a new station on the great Momboyo tributary river. Vast multitudes await the gospel in that Congo region. Already native evangelists are winning many to Christ there. The Southern California churches already have pledged $4,000 towards this great undertaking. Besides, they have paid the expense and salary of a new missionary to the Congo this year.

Northern California has put as her Centennial aim the raising of another $10,000 for a new station at far Bonyeka, 250 miles from Bolenge. Here the native evangelists have been toiling but a few months. Already 700 people have given up their evil practices and await further instruction and baptism.

This is a great work our Pacific Coast brethren are undertaking. A work which will make thousands rejoice. The Nkundo nation is ours. Our missionaries alone have entered the field. There are 3,000,000 people to be reached. The Pacific Coast brethren are determined to have their share in this pentacostal victory.

Royal J. Dye, M. D.,

"FROM THE LAND OF THE DAKOTAS."

Here comes a renewal for 190 and order for "Alexander Campbell as a preacher" by A. McLean. Other papers also continue—not that all belong to the same class of religious journalism, but it requires all, nay more, to represent the heart and thought of a great brotherhood. Any recent number of the Century is worth far more than the annual subscription. It is already in the front ranks and is destined to become the representative paper of the greatest movement in modern times. Our foremost young men and university scholars should not forget however, that thousands of good and faithful brethren can read with much delight and some profit the "scheme," the "plan," of salvation, the "beginning" of the kingdom, etc., who cannot appreciate the best thought of such men as Alexander Campbell, Isaac Errett, A. McLean, J. H. Garrison, H. L. Willett, and scores of others, to say nothing of the great truths yet to burst forth from the New Testament revelation.

My work under the Christian Woman's Board of Missions began in North Dakota in April of the past year. We began locally in Fargo in September. Each Lord's day we had prayer and song with the communion in some Christian home. A part of the time in November and December was spent in the field. With the second Sunday in December we began regular services in Aaker's Hall, the as-

HER MOTHER-IN-LAW

Proved a Wise, Good Friend.

A young woman out in Ia. found a wise, good friend in her mother-in-law, jokes notwithstanding. She writes:

"It is two years since we began using Postum in our house. I was greatly troubled with my stomach, complexion was blotchy and yellow. After meals I often suffered sharp pains and would have to lie down. My mother often told me it was the coffee I drank at meals. But when I quit coffee I'd have a severe headache.

"While visiting my mother-in-law I remarked that she always made such good coffee, and asked her to tell me how. She laughed and told me it was easy to make good 'coffee' when you use Postum.

"I began to use Postum as soon as I got home, and now we have the same good 'coffee' (Postum) every day, and I have no more trouble. Indigestion is a thing of the past, and my complexion has cleared up beautifully.

"My grandmother suffered a great deal with her stomach. Her doctor told her to leave off coffee. She then took tea but that was just as bad.

"She finally was induced to try Postum, which she has used for over a year. She traveled during the winter over the greater part of Iowa, visiting, something she had not been able to do for years. She says she owes her present good health to Postum."

Name given by Postum Co.. Battle Creek, Mich. Read, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

sembly room of a business college. From the start our meetings have been well attended. Our Bible School was organized the first Sunday in January with about twenty enrolled. The pastor has a class of seven college men to begin with and hopes to increase the number. The weather has not been above zero for two weeks and once as low as thirty-three degrees below.

The State Agricultural College located here has about eleven hundred students enrolled and is located five blocks from the lot we purchased some months ago. Fargo College is also full and the two business colleges have two hundred students each. The High School is taxed and the private and parochial schools are full. It would appear, in the winter time, that Fargo had been transformed from a commercial to an educational center.

Fargo has a population of fifteen thousand, and fifteen miles of electric street car line, and fifteen miles of paved streets. She is the second city in the world as a distributing point for farm machinery. Her business this year in that line was $6,742,014.00. Her bank clearances, $32,750,010.74. Post office receipts, $80,965.47. Fargo has the second largest Masonic Temple in the United States, used exclusively for Masonic purposes. Her Shrine has fourteen hundred members. Fargo buys more diamonds than any city in the United States under forty thousand—and yet has more saloons. Yesterday the New Gardner Hotel opened to the public. The cost and equipment of the same was $350,000. This is the finest hotel in the Dakotas. This hotel is thoroughly modern and can take care of five thousand people in one day for meals and furnish rooms for three hundred guests.

North Dakota has taken the lead in the nation in the matter of pure food legislation. Professor Ladd, of the State Agricultural College, has recently won a victory for the people debarring the millers of the state from the manufacture of "Bleached Flour."

Minot, perhaps the second city in the state has the proud distinction of being the National Headquarters of the "Non-Swearing Knights of America" which has grown from three thousand to seven thousand in membership. R. C. Wynn, a conductor on the Great Northern Railway is the Secretary and chief promoter. A building is to be erected. Many men of national reputation are becoming honorary members. Space fails me to do justice to such a movement. The contention is that profanity does not pay in this world nor in the world to come.

We hope to build the coming summer. The C. W. B. M. advanced the money to purchase the lot. Yesterday we remitted to them the semi-annual interest and half of the principal. We expect to pay out in full in the early spring.

The organization of a Sunday-school was the result of a short meeting I held in McLean County mid storm and blizzard. Before the storm some came fifteen miles. After the storm others came on skees, some of whom are now attending the State Agricultural College and rooming in my home.

C. V. Pence, of Iowa, is located with the church at Ellendale, North Dakota, and is doing well. J. Winbigler, of Iowa, is located at Aberdeen, South Dakota, and good reports come from there.

May the coming Centennial not be the end but the beginning of greater things in the kingdom of God. When another has rolled around we shall all be orthodox enough.

F. B. Sapp.

sanctity that is really worth while. The lesson of Hull House in its unselfish service of its neighborhood has a mighty message for the Disciples of Christ. In the future we must take on as heartily the burden of restoring the primitive service of Jesus who fed the poor, healed the sick and opened the eyes of the blind, as in times past we have given ourselves to the restoration of primitive doctrine and ordinances.

CHURCH NOTES.

The Evanston Church will install a printing press the coming week in its building. This press will furnish an opportunity for some of the boys to learn the printing trade. The press is large enough to turn out all the printing that the church needs.

Harry F. Burns and O. F. Jordon exchanged pulpits last Sunday night to the profit of both ministers and both congregations.

The Douglas Park Church has organized to take a delegation of fifty to the rally of Chicago Christian Missionary Society next Sunday. Other churches will bring large delegations. Dr. Ames will deliver the address and the meeting will be held in the First M. E. Church at the corner of Clark and Washington streets.

The Irving Park Church will have a special service for children next Sunday.

There have been seven additions in the West End, where G. W. Thomas is now preaching.

There have been three confessions already this year at the Metropolitan Church where A. T. Campbell ministers. The church has a choir of thirty young people of high school age.

West Pullman is in a local option campaign. The Christian Church and Guy Hoover are taking a prominent place in the movement.

A company of 160 men sat down to dinner together in the Englewood Church recently. They presented C. G. Kindred with a set of the Millenial Harbingers.

BETHANY ASSEMBLY NOTES.

The prospects for a successful Assembly in 1909 are the brightest known within the history of "dear old Bethany." The National Bible School Association will hold a National Bible Conference on August 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th, as a worthy successor to the enthusiastic Teacher-Training Institute held last year. Other great features are in process of development, that will make the 1909 session the best ever held.

The Secretary's annual report at First Quarterly Board Meeting held January 6, 1909, showed the present value of the Assembly grounds and improvements to be over $32,000. The Board has been offered over $50,000 for this property. Over $5,000 in improvements and repairs have been made in the last three years.

The Program Committee consists of L. L. Carpenter, A. E. Philputt and the writer. This committee would be glad to receive suggestions in reference to the program for 1909. If you know of some good features that can be secured, write the undersigned.

Taste Is Sure Stomach Guide

A Barometer Which Never Fails, Though Seldom Believed.

"Taste is the direct guide to the stomach; and the taste buds are connected by the nerves with the stomach itself, so that they represent its health or disorder. If the stomach or its juices are out of tone, the blood is fermented by a change in the alkaline or acid condition, and these reach the mouth both directly and indirectly.

"The taste buds are in the tongue, and are mounted by hairlike projections called papillae; they cover the surface of the tongue."

"When you taste these buds rise up and absorb the liquid; inform the nerves; the nerves tell the stomach, and the food is acceptable or not, just as the stomach feels."

The above remarks on taste comes from an eminent authority and simply explains why when one smells cooking or sees food one thinks he can eat, but when he tastes he learns the stomach is out of business.

To the person who cannot taste aright, who relishes no food and simply forces himself to eat, Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets hold the secret of enjoyable eating, perfect digestion and renewed general health.

Most men wait until their stomachs are completely sickened before they think seriously of assisting nature.

When your taste for food is lost it is a certain sign the stomach needs attention. Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets cure such stomachs. They restore sweetness of breath, renew gastric juices, enrich the blood and give the stomach the strength and rest necessary to general duty.

Forty thousand physicians use Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets and every druggist carries them in stock; price 50c. per box. Send us your name and address and we will send your a trial package free by mail. Address, F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

REPORT OF NEW CALENDAR COMMITTEE.

According to a recommendation of our National Convention at New Orleans, last October, a calendar committee was appointed consisting of one member from each state society and three members from each general society. This committee had its meeting in St. Louis on January 14th, and begs to make the following tentative report:

Missionary Calendar.

First: January, vacant.

Second: February and March, home missions.

Third: April, May and June, foreign missions.

Fourth: July, Educational Day.

Fifth: August and September, church extension.

Sixth: November, state missions.

Seventh: Third Sunday of November, boys' and girls' rally day.

Eighth: December, C. W. B. M.

Ninth: Easter, National Benevolent Association.

Tenth: Ministerial Relief, supported by a pro-rata appropriation from each of the general and state societies.

Eleventh: It was further recommended that the fiscal year end and the books of our general missionary societies close on the 31st of July instead of the 30th of September.

The above Calendar was adopted as a tentative report by a vote of eighteen to six. Brother McLean asked that his protest against the motion to adopt the above Calendar should be recorded, also Brother Myhr, of Tennessee, requested his protest to be recorded. It was moved that this report be sent to our religious papers for publication. The Committee desires to emphasize that the above report is only a recommendation to the National Convention at Pittsburg next October, and does not go into effect until after that Convention, provided it shall be adopted by a joint meeting of all the Missionary Societies.

J. O. Rose, Secretary.

THE NEW STATION IN AFRICA.

Dr. Jaggard and I have been here now three weeks. We have our first building already up and are now living in it. It is built for a carpenter shop and store. We are now building the first dwelling house. It is to be a three-room pole-and-mud house, with a thatched roof. Dr. and Mrs. Jaggard will live in one room and Mrs. Eldred and I will live in another, with the third room as a common dining-room till we can get another such house built. We will have to be content with these blessings till we can get our permanent houses built. At present we have no stove, so we cook on an open fire of sticks and bake our bread, etc., in an empty oil can. However, we are well and happy to be able thus to begin the work of our Master in this needy place. We have already organized a church of fifty members and will from now on work more or less separate from the Bolenge Church. We will send out our own evangelists, etc. The field for work here is as great as it ever was at Bolenge We are hoping to be able to report good things from Longa as the months pass by. This is a great step forward in Africa. We must follow these brave men up with every necessary equipment. This can not be done without the new Bible College at Bolenge.

Fitting Religion Close Up to Daily Life

Do your religious beliefs fit close up to your daily life?

This is the kind of question to ask yourself when you get into an argument over your religion. It will surprise you to discover how heated you can become over a perfectly unimportant if not fictitious matter.

There are two questions we may ask about our beliefs. Both are wholesome questions. One is, Are they true? The other is, Are they vital? It is possible that certain things are true that are not vital. But it is hardly likely that any belief can be vital without in some sense being true.

Therefore the great question to ask about religious beliefs is the second one, Are they vital?

Hitherto the first question has been conceived to be the important one. All the discussions of theology in the past have been carried on in the realm of logic.

In the future, theology will be discussed on the level of life and its formulations will be made not with reference merely to the demands of abstract truth, but to the needs of actual human living.

Why do you suppose we do not keep Saturday instead of Sunday for a rest day, as our Seventh-day Adventist brothers argue for us to do? Is it because we have examined the argument and have decided in favor of the first day of the week? No at all. Not one out of ten thousand has examined the argument. We simply are not interested in that kind of a question; it is not vital. The Sabbatarian may be able, if you grant his premises, to prove the truth of his contention, but he can never make modern men and women feel that his contention is vital or even important. Therefore his argument goes unheeded.

A religious sect organizes itself around a certain conception of the future world, the life after death. Periods are marked off, a calendar of eternity is gotten up, a program of the heavenly entertainment is issued. All these matters are "based on the Bible," all indeed are proved by a net-work of scripture texts wondrously woven. Yet not many people are interested in the argument or will stop to hear the proof. It may be true, the practical man says, but it is not important.

We talked the other day with a theosophist who believed in the transmigration of souls. This doctrine was the essence of his religion. He had a scheme of proof that was fearfully and wonderfully made. To him the French nation was a reincarnation of the Greek soul and the English a reincarnation of the Roman. Such a man as Gladstone was formerly Cicero and Roosevelt might have been one of the Gracchi in a former incarnation. When asked how long a period elapsed between incarnations he answered that an average of fifteen hundred years was the probable interim! With him the most specific information concerning the unseen past and future was provable. If we had been concerned only with the question as to the truth of his contentions we might be ourselves floundering yet through the mazes of his proofs. But as a matter of fact we dismissed the whole subject from our mind when the conversation was ended. Why? Because the argument was preposterous? Not altogether. But because the issue at stake was not vital. It had nothing to do with the life we really live.

Within the limits of conventional Christianity, too, it is important to keep our beliefs close up to concrete life. The times demand a practicable religion. A religion that can be practiced in common experience.

Men do not pass the old creeds by because they have been convinced of their logical untruth. They may or may not be true; but men today feel that, true or false, they are not important, not vital. Masses are passing the church by for the same reason. Thousands of earnest souls feel that what we do in the church has little or no pertinence to their daily living. Let it become known that a preacher has a vital message and that his church is a dynamo sending divine power into people's lives for every-day use, and that preacher and that church will not beg for hearers.

With all our misgivings concerning the fate of religion in modern times the one heartening fact is that modern men have no patience with a religion that does not bring enlargement of life. Your religious "system" may be true, and again it may not, but it must be vital, it must be life-giving. And the practical man of today hardly needs any other argument for its truth except that it does actually give life and power and peace and hope.

You may dispense with your logic so far as he cares. You may even dispense with your splendidly-woven scheme of proof-texts taken from the Bible. If your doctrine fits close up to daily living and makes men strong to meet life's duties and humble to serve others and gentle to comfort others the practical man of today will feel, perhaps in spite of your argument, that there is truth in what you say!

"'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
More life and fuller that we want."

True religion, then must become an out-and-out individual matter. It is not intellectual conformity to a creed written by others, nor voluntary submission to the authority of an institution. It is not a "system" to be contemplated nor a doctrine to be argued over, but a principle or a group of principles to be appropriated by acting upon them and to be proved true by their fruitage in actual experience.

What are the affirmations the soul must make to fit its religion close up to daily life? We shall endeavor in this outline to suggest some principles which are vital and true and leave others to contend for matters that may be true but certainly are not vital. The individual, practical, character of these affirmations we shall indicate by the use of the first personal pronoun throughout.

I. My Master is Christ. The fruitage of his life is perfect. The character he bears and his deeds are so crystalline that I must learn the secret of his living. If I can find his secret it shall be my law. Whatever he commands me to do I will do it.

II. My Father is God. I take no step nor think nor breathe—nor fall, without him. I build my faith on that.

III. God is the source of my health and character and peace.

IV. My mind is the meeting place of God and my soul. My thoughts are the channels of his grace and power. Therefore will I train my mind in truth and kindliness and in faith, and will guard my thoughts against anger and doubt and lust and all uncleanness and fear, so that God may abide in me and build me up.

V. I am myself.

VI. I am not bound—not by heredity nor environment nor past habits nor divine decree, but myself make the laws of my being by what I allow.

VII. I am at home. The world is a room in my Father's house. I therefore am not afraid of disease or temptation, nor of death. I only fear lest by forgetting my Father I lose his strength and protection.

VIII. I am debtor to all men. I shall use my powers and the surplus of my goods to help others. Moreover, I shall take good heed that in making a living for myself I am conferring benefit and not bringing injury upon society. No human interest shall be foreign to me. Men are my brothers and I will strive to treat them so and take my part in every effort to give them justice.

IX. The things worth while are three—goodness, influence and joy. These I diligently seek, not in strain and much effort, but in quietness and purity of heart, doing each day my simple tasks, taking my share of the burden and as much more as I can, in full faith that my quiet life lived earnestly is more important to my Father and my fellows than any other lot could be.

X. I love the Church as the fellowship of those who strive to practice these affirmations of the spirit and to teach them to others. I need the Church because my faith is nourished by the faith of others, and in so far as my efforts after spiritual wholeness are sincere the Church needs me.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

DOES THE CITY NEED LICENSE MONEY?

Atlanta, Ga., increased her income $241,000 in her first year as a "dry" city. The year began with the city owing $368,600 and closed with $233,000 in the sinking fund and all current obligations provided for. In 1907 the police court tried 23,013 cases, in 1908 there were only 13,880 or 8,133 less and the police are said to be much more alert. Of these cases 6,480 were "drunks" in 1907, while 2,577 were so classed in 1908, a difference of nearly 4,000. This explains in part the balance in the city's finances.

FIGURES DO NOT LIE, BUT LIARS DO FIGURE

Figures do not lie but liars will figure. In the latter case is the chief art of liquor advocates. For instance, they "proved" that Kansas was worse than Minnesota because it had so many more convicts. But they did not say that in Kansas there is a great federal prison and that Oklahoma pays the Sunflower State to keep her criminals while she erects a penitentiary. All were charged up to Kansas and prohibition. Figures are easily manipulated into an appearance of fairness but cannot be trusted beyond the simplest statement unless one knows all that depends upon and gathers about them. Like sacred Scripture, statistics can be quoted to prove anything. Their only logical use is to furnish inductions for reasoning on the case.

JAPANESE CHARITY BEGINS

Mr. T. Namae, of Kobe, Japan, is in this country on an official tour for study of our charity organizations and methods. Several of the larger Japanese cities have "charity leagues" and Tokio has recently organized a "Central Charity Association." Five years ago Japan held a national charity congress and, as she does in all things, is studying all systems in all lands that she may choose the best from each and improve even upon that if possible. Prison reform was inaugurated there some years ago by a native Christian and the country as a whole is adopting the social and salvatory methods of Christianity much faster than it is the church as such. In all these movements native Christians are active and influential. The strongly centralized government of the empire and of the municipalities may do much but without the effectual leaven of Christianity it will be impossible to do it well. But there is much more of the leaven of Christianity there than membership in the churches would indicate. In Kobe last year, with a population of 400,000, but $1,000 was given for public relief and times are very hard throughout the country and there is much distress.

LA FOLLETTE "CALLING THE ROLL"

Senator La Follette's new weekly journal is out and promises to be very interesting. The doughty Badger Senator never fails to be interesting. He is courageous and of a good conscience and he cares immensely more for his cause than for the convention of party or dignity or courtesy or any other thing. And that makes him interesting. What is so sensational as the unvarnished truth, plainly spoken without fear or favor of man and for the public good? John the Baptist was something of a sensationalist, and he did not defile his message with "Billy" Sunday vulgarisms either. So with La Follette. He is always clean. He is never more vehement than the cause he denounces is iniquitous. He does not pad much with adjective, but follows Emerson's advice and tells his story in nouns and verbs. And he "calls the roll." He not only names the wrong but the wrong-doer, and what hurts worst, he names those reputable sinners who vote for or consent to a wrong measure for party or any other reason. He began it on the Chautauqua platform and it proved the season's political sensation, but the most horrified could not give reason why it should not be done. Now he will do it more effectively in his weekly magazine. Any truth-teller in public is worth a hearing and when he combines with that interesting trait the expert knowledge and the splendid ability of a La Follette he is trebly worth listening to.

"ALL MEN UP"

Religiously this bids fair to be a man's era. The greatest movement in the church today is the "men's movement" and the great concern of the church, such as foreign missions and civic righteousness, are not only challenging the interest of men but organizing them for effectiveness.

No religious organization of our times is growing more rapidly, performing a greater service, or more truly sounding a bugle-note than is the Y. M. C. A. That note is "All men up," and is backed by the motto, "The upward life to overcome the downward pull."

Last year buildings were either dedicated or put into process of construction that will cost $19,000,000, more than half of this was paid during the year and the other half will be paid on buildings to be dedicated this year. Eighty-four buildings were added to the list of young men's centers and eighty more are being erected to be added to the $60,000,000 already invested in Y. M. C. A. homes. Nearly $7,000,000 was raised and expended for current work during the year, an increase of nearly $1,000,000, and more than one-half the entire sum was paid by the members. There are now 1,939 branches and 456,000 members. Of these, in round numbers, 65,000 are in industrial occupations, 86,000 railroad men, 59,000 college students, and 150,000 boys in their teens. In all 2,544 secretaries are employed of which eighty are in the foreign field.

The following table will give some idea of the activities of the Association in the United States and Canada:

Branch of work	No. Engaged
Night study	48,000
Gymnasium classes	190,000
Bible classes	105,000
Daily attendance in reading rooms	155,000
Weekly attendance of religious meetings	105,000
Attendance of shop and factory meetings	983,000
Number of conversions for year	19,706

Of the 59,000 college student members, 33,000 are in the Bible classes and 10,000 are studying missions.

The 150,000 boys in the Association furnish forty per cent of the Bible class membership. "As goes the boy so goes the city."

Bible study has gained eighty per cent in five years. The Y. M. C. A. is something more than a gymnasium and popular lecture course.

There are thirty-seven Associations for colored men with a membership of 5,000.

County Associations are formed in twenty states and provinces and forty per cent of the members are in Bible classes. Many of them go to college.

The railroads put over $300,000 annually into the R. R. Association and count it so good an investment that no reductions were made during the panic.

Many great industrial concerns are finding it wise to erect and equip buildings and turn them over to the association.

From one battleship ninety-five per cent of the men reported at the Y. M. C. A. immediately upon landing. Associations are found on many of the naval vessels and the navy yards have handsome buildings.

The Y. M. C. A. furnishes a club that is clean and beats the saloon on its own ground; it gives the boy good associations, provides for his idle hours, and directs his play-energies usefully; it furnishes baths and thus cleanliness to thousands; it trains the minds of a multitude who toil and are ambitious for proficiency and promotion; it gives Biblical instruction and organizes for useful service; it is the most outstanding example of actual unity in Christian work; it makes men.

THE TEXAS TRUST-BUSTER.

The supreme court has sustained the fine assessed by the state of Texas against the Waters-Pierce Oil Company, and close to $2,000,000 will be paid by the criminal monopoly into the state treasury. The company will also be ousted from the state. It is to suffer a like fate in Missouri. It is announced that Texas will be punished by receiving the entire sum in silver and is preparing a place at the state house into which it can be scooped. The great Lone Star State is boasting its prowess as a "trust-buster," and proclaims itself the coming model government. They say "the law is enforced in Texas; saloons are closed tight on Sundays and no guns are carried under the coat down there; the 'trust' is treated like any other offender and the saloons will soon join the grand exodus from the Southland."

Other states will take courage from Texan success with the prosecution of monopolies. The noted $29,000,000 Standard Oil case is beginning retrial. It will be recalled that the enormous fine was assessed by Judge Landis and overruled by Judge Grosscup and the bench of the circuit court of appeals and that the supreme court refused to interfere with the ruling. President Roosevelt publicly called the Grosscup ruling "a gross miscarriage of justice." It so limits the powers of the court that it makes the law a farce as a restraining power. For instance, it is not enough to show a lower or secret rate was accepted, but that it must be known to be such, a thing practically impossible of proof unless the accused will confess it. But suppose a pontoon can be thrown across this swift defense and the fact of knowledge be established. Judge Grosscup builds a strong rampart in ruling that fines cannot be based on each separate carload shipment as per carload rates made in the agreement, but only on each settlement made. Thus one settlement per year can be made and a fine of from $1,000 to $20,000 be assessed against an infraction of the law that may mean a saving of millions to the company which can thus break the law with impunity and pay the inconsiderable fine as a part of the "business" expense just as a dive-keeper may pay his assessment to the police or ward-boss or his fine each month according to understanding with the mayor. But not yet enough. A final refuge is established in making it impossible to reach the real offender. The fine cannot be collected from any but the company in whose name the business is done. Thus a "dummy" company can be organized with small capital and do business on small profits and plead that the fines are ruinous and thus escape while the real company is never endangered.

President Roosevelt lays it down that courts rule according to the social and political philosophy of the judges. The only hope then is in public sentiment becoming so overwhelming that courts must yield with legislatures and law be both made and interpreted to suit the popular will.

IS IT DEMOCRATIC SIMPLICITY?

The Senate has passed a bill increasing the president's salary to $100,000 per year. Senators Bailey (Dem.) and Borah (Rep.) spoke warmly against the measure and deplored the tendency to depart from democratic simplicity. The latter condemned it as a departure from the spirit of the constitution. Figures were presented to the Senate showing that Mr. Roosevelt had drawn an average of $196,000 per year. This makes his "extras" ten times larger than those of any predecessor, but is only in keeping with the general extravagance in the voting of the public funds in these "piping times of prosperity." The income of the national treasury was never so great as during the past few years and yet we ran millions behind last year. Let it be remembered that the Panama Canal is not being builded out of the government funds, but by selling bonds and that the vast work of the Reclamation Service is likewise conducted by bond-selling.

The question is do we desire our chief executive to entertain like royalty? We are cited to the fact that the British ambassador receives $50,000 per year and a home, besides many perquisites. But is it pertinent? All monarchies support their governmental establishments in a grandiose style. We beg the question by making the comparison. England pays her royalty millions and all her ministerial and diplomatic heads large salaries but the rank and file of government employes receive much smaller salaries than ours and a poor man cannot enter parliament because there is no salary provided. The bishops receive as much as from $10,000 to $25,000 per year and the archbishop $75,000 and a palace, but poor curates by the hundreds do their labor of love for from $200 to $400 per year. The working of the comparison is to reveal our tendency to depart from the essential thing for which we stand, viz., democratic simplicity versus monarchical splendor.

Senator Borah declared the proposal would never have been made previous to or during a presidential campaign. By this he asserts that it would not meet popular approval and would become a menace to the party making it and thus prove we are yet in favor of the good old-time Jeffersonian simplicity. We would ask whether we desire our governmental servants to receive incomes based on the general raising of economic standards and in due ratio to the general rise of popular income, or will we parcel them off to the millionaire class and make a wide difference between the man who sits at the head and the rank and file who are as necessary but not so conspicuous in position. No one regrets the cash expended. It is only to call in the question the motive that the question is raised at all. Is it for the logical demands of the office or is it that splendor and pomp may "dignify" out of existence that democratic simplicity that has been the sign and symbol of the republic. Are we longing for the flesh-pots of Egypt?

Paragraphic Editorials

The wonderful rescue of the sixteen hundred passengers of the Steamer Republic through the use of the wireless telegraph in signalling for help has brought the world again to the feet of Marconi in gratitude. The imagination of the sea-traveler has ever been haunted with the sense of fear due to the utter loneliness of the ship on the great deep. But wireless telegraphy socializes all ships at sea. It brings them into speaking distances and into relations of mutual helpfulness. How well this achievement of science illustrates the achievement of Christ upon the higher level of human welfare, Marconi has overcome what Matthew Arnold called "the salt, unplumbed, estranging sea."

And Christ has given the world a principle for overcoming the estrangement of caste and class, of nationality and color, of culture and creed. Love messages between Sicily and all the world have been passed in invisible currents these late direful days. Love messages are passing between society and the stunted child in the factory, between society and the underpaid and overworked laborer, between society and the widows and children of workmen killed in wrecks and fires. A new system is being installed in the world—a system by which distress becomes more quickly known and by which society may rush more effectively to its relief. Since Christ's day it is true that "no man liveth to himself alone," for he discovered how the hearts of men may be "tuned" together so that pain and grief and helplessness may communicate themselves and be anwered in the subtle telegraphy of love and service. "Come over into Macedonia and help us!" that was the wireless Paul received, and straightway left his own continent and carried the good news of Christ into Europe. Still the instrument clicks; from India and China and Africa the message of distress comes. The great glory of our modern Christianity is that our hearts are being "tuned" so we can hear this most distant signal of distress and rush with men and money to save the lost.

Hardly a week goes by without adding some improvement to the Christian Century. Last week we announced four new features. This week we are happy to announce two of first rank importance. Rev. J. R. Ewers, of Youngstown, Ohio, takes charge of a department for our Church Men. Mr. Ewers' ministry has been remarkable in its masculine quality. He reaches men. And he has some vigorous and clear ideas on the method of both reaching men and organizing them. Read his "salutatory" statement on another page. Mr. Ewers wishes us to state that he desires our readers to send him news of the men's work in the various churches. Short articles on the men's movement are also solicited. Methods that have been effective in one congregation should be passed on to others. Mr. Ewers and his department will be glad to be the medium of this communication. Address all correspondence to the New Christian Century Co., and mark plainly on the envelope "Church Men Department."

Our second feature refers to the development of our Church News. We are less satisfied with the character of the news department of our religious papers than with any other feature. While we have striven to make our news columns an improvement over all precedents, we frankly confess that we are a good way yet from our ideal. Therefore we have entered into correspondence with the state secretaries of every state of the Union proposing a method of co-operation with them in gathering the news and asking their aid in developing a principle of selection of news so as to give this department the dignity it deserves. We have received replies from a sufficient number of these brethren to warrant us in announcing that we will have the help of virtually all of them in this important cause. Rev. Harry F. Burns of Chicago has taken charge of the news department and will put into its development his best effort and talent. In this department it is our fixed determination not to be excelled by any newspaper of the brotherhood.

A certain self-styled "Bishop in Israel," whose apostolic succession we are inclined to deny, says some ludicrous things in a recent issue of a contemporary paper, and some things that are so false that nothing but a flat denial need be set over against them. One very ludicrous feature of his communication is his cocksure attempt to trace to Professor Willett, the authorship of certain Christian Century editorial notes in the New Orleans Convention. He quoted particularly from the note commending a number of our New Orlenas speakers for using manuscript, and says, "Willett is prescribing his pulpit mannerisms for the brotherhood and is naturally delighted to see our preachers driven into this rut of one style of pulpit action." Some of Dr. Willett's most frequent hearers have never seen him draw a manuscript and will be highly amused at this screed. The assertions about George A. Campbell and A. W. Taylor are not funny, however. We are just this day in receipt of a letter from a prominent member of the Eureka Church, which describes the loyalty of that congregation to the pastor who shortly leaves them for the Irving Park, Chicago, charge. The letter calls Mr. Taylor "The right arm of every good cause in Eureka." As to Mr. Campbell, the thousands who have felt the uplift of his writings in this paper, will refuse to believe that he is a ruthless persecutor of his brethren. No member of the official board ever said that he persecuted them out of the church. He was away from home when the lamentable thing happened at Austin. With singular grace and gentleness of spirit he has borne misrepresentation. It occurs to us that there is good reason for our "Bishop in Israel" to use a nom de plume in making scurrilous charges against a brother involved in a church division. His own name is burned too deep in the nistory of Chicago church quarrels to permit him to make such charges except from behind a mask.

New Living-Links

The Foreign Society is making progress toward a large number of new Living-links in the approaching annual offering for Foreign Missions. It is believed that no less than 100 churches should be brought into this rank this Centennial year.

In the future the church at Elyria, Ohio, will support its own missionary or do an equal work on the heathen field. It will raise $600. It may give this amount toward the new College at Bolenge, Africa.

L. W. McCreary, minister of the Hamilton Avenue Church, St. Louis, Mo., writes: "I am glad to report to you that the Committee appointed by our Board to bring recommendations to the Church at our annual meeting of such work as ought to be undertaken for this year, recommended among other things that we become a Living-link in the Foreign Society. You may safely count on us for $600."

Edgar S. Potter, speaking of preparation for the Rally at Quincy, Ill., says: "We propose to keep this fight up until Quincy shall be landed in the Living-link ranks."

Geo. H. Brown, minister of the church at Charleston, Ill., says: "We hope to become a Living-link at Charleston this year."

S. A. Fisher, minister of the church at Walla Walla, Wash., says that that church will support a missionary on the foreign field. We already have two Living-links in Washington and this will be the third, and we are expecting still others.

The church at Fayetteville, Ark., W. S. Lockhart, minister, is confident of the Living-link column.

F. W. Allen, minister of the church at Paris, Mo., will be made glad if his church enters the Living-link rank this year.

Another brother who does not want his name known nor that of his church, says: "You can depend upon us for the $600."

Last year, 1907-08, the Foreign Society enrolled twenty-four new Living-link Churches, the largest number in any one year in the history of the Society. The Churches and their ministers have great joy in this new and larger life. This step gave them a new sense of their power and a fresh appreciation of their real mission. These churches are not rich. On the contrary some of them are poor. But they have faith and they are growing churches, every one of them.

W. B. Taylor, Mexico, Mo., speaking of that church's experience, says: "I never saw happier people and we are highly gratified at the advanced step the church took that day. It helps a church to understand better her ability and therefore responsibility and of course puts her in touch with the actual work on the field. We didn't like to be behind other churches with no greater strength in money and members than we had."

W. G. Conley, Covina, Calif., says: "Nothing so inspiring presented itself as the thought of supporting a missionary on the foreign field. Our people have been especially stirred by the story of the marvelous triumphs of the gospel among the cannibals of the Congo. We feel that it is a privilege for us to have fellowship in this work, and we shall have much joy in supporting E. R. Moon as our Living-link."

G. L. Bush, Gainesville, Tex., who now supports Miss Edna Kurz in China, says: "When the day came all were surprised at the readiness and liberality of the giving. It was the greatest and happiest day in the history of the congregation. There have been more than three times as many additions, in the regular services, as there were during the same period last year. It has made all of us better and happier in the Lord."

John Mullen, minister of the First Church, Findlay, Ohio, says: "When the cards were all in enough was secured to insure the support of a missionary. All were happy in the result. It enlarges the vision, stimulates endeavor and increases offerings for every worthy enterprise."

J. L. Greenwell, minister of the Queen Anne Church, Seattle, Wash., speaks as follows: "Our vision is wider and truer, our sympathies have been broadened, and the sphere of our activities has been enlarged. By this step we have been brought into living and active touch with the work and workers in every part of God's kingdom. We have begun to think of the possibility of larger things all along the line. It is easier to raise $600 for the support of Mrs. Hensey in the work at Bolenge than it is to raise $50 to be scattered over the face of the whole earth."

LORDSDAY, OCTOBER 17.

Morning, Preaching in 500 pulpits in Pittsburg District with raidus of eighty miles. Special trains into the City for Afternoon, Centennial Communion.

Evening, Preaching everywhere in Greater Pittsburg.

The preaching of this day will be altogether different from the ordinary courtesy of "occupying all offered pulpits." The men for this work are being chosen now and are co-ordinate with the other Centennial speakers. Each sermon will be the preacher's life message of Christ.

For the Convention Hall Sermons we are permitted to announce: H. O. Breeden, San Francisco, Cal.; W. E. Crabtree, San Diego, Cal.; M. M. Davis, Dallas, Texas; B. A. Jenkins, Kansas City, Mo.; J. M. Philputt, St. Louis Mo.; Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind. We have also appointed: T. B. Larimore, Florence, Ala.; I. N. McCash, Berkeley, Cal.; S. M. Martin, Seattle, Wash.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 18.

Morning, afternoon and evening in three parallel sessions will be devoted to The Teaching Function of the Church of Christ.

The program is not yet complete but will be the best that Martin Stevenson, Herbert Moninger, W. C. Pearce, E. A. Cole, E. J. Meacham, R. H. Crossfield, T. W. Grafton, J. M. Kersey, Marion Lawrence and more such men and better women can produce. There will also be early morning conferences on Bible-school work throughout the Centennial week. Each will be led by a Master.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 19.

Morning, afternoon and evening in three parallel sessions, the climax of a century of Evangelism and the inauguration of a truly Pentecostal era of soul-saving. Watch for the program.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

A PENTECOSTAL PRAYER.

By Rev. J. F. Williams.

Renew, O Lord, the Pentecostal vision,
The utterance of the Spirit, true;
The mind and heart to make the good decision
Between the Old and New.

So many are the earnest voices pleading:
"Lo, there! Lo, here! the kingdom find;"
And baffled men are waiting for Thy leading,
True men, though weak and blind.

Upon the cause and night of our confusion
Shed forth, O Sun of Truth, Thy light;
Remove the subtle blind of Sin's illusion,
That all may see the right.

For Thy work's sake, through change and Time's probation,
Lord Jesus, our companion be;
The rendering birth pangs of a new creation
Our souls can bear, with Thee.

From Darkness into Light, wherein abiding,
To know in part as we are fully known;
The breathing nearness of our Lord, in Him confiding,—
O Father, never more to walk alone!

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Z. T. Sweeney Writes Again on Miracles

Dear Brother Willett:—The substance of this letter was sent you the first week in November by registered mail, but for some reason, doubtless known in the machinery of our great Post Office department, it was delayed and finally returned to me a few days ago. I am sending it again with a few alterations and hope you will still give it consideration.

The first part of your last reply dealt with some interpretations or definitions of miracles, which you thought I might, could, would or should have given. All of this was irrelevant because I have given no interpretation nor definition of miracles. This discussion is limited to your definitions and interpretations. I feel, however, that we are making some progress in understanding each other.

To summarize, I understand you to teach:

First, Miracle is not the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law.

Second, Miracle is the normal activity of a perfect life in the domain of Nature, though unusual.

Third, Jesus was a visitant to this world bearing the super-natural character of Heaven, of which he has been supposed to be a resident.

Fourth, The universal faith and teachings of the church in all ages that he was a visitant to this world must be changed to meet the demands of the modern thinking.

Fifth, The apparent chasm between the phenomena of miracles and the uniform course of events in human experience and under the reign of law must be bridged or it will prove a fatal hindrance to the acceptance of miracles.

Sixth, That Jesus performed his miracles by employing natural law at its highest level. He lived the normal, natural life of a man at its highest point.

Seventh, He wrought no miracles to convince men that he was the Christ.

Eighth. He was not raised from the dead by the intervention of a super-natural power, but his resurrection was the ripe fruit from the tree of such a life as he lived.

Ninth. It was a pledge that all who attain his life shall share with him a resurrection from the dead.

Tenth, That the resurrection spoken of in the last two propositions is the physical resurrection of the body.

You will notice that in stating these ten propositions that I have done so in the first nine, distinctly in your own language. I have inserted the tenth because some so-called theologians have tried to play double by juggling with the word resurrection; claiming to believe in the resurrection of Jesus while they deny the resurrection of his physical body. I do not believe this of you, but I insert it that we may both understand the word resurrection in the same sense.

The above propositions are quite revolutionary and have some logical consequences to which I wish to call your attention. It is a well known postulate, both of science and philosophy that any correct hypothesis must account for the phenomena on which it is based.

Let us apply this postulate to the miracles of the New Testament, waving those of the Old.

Miracle First. The virgin birth of Jesus. Now, under the old hypothesis, "that a miracle is the intervention of a super-natural power, etc." this miracle is easily accounted for, but can you account for the virgin birth by your hypotnesis? that "a miracle is the normal activity of a human life, etc."

Miracle Second, The testimony of God at the baptism of Jesus. This also is readily accounted for by the old hypothesis, but how can you account for it as the normal activity of a human life?

Miracle Third, The feeding of the five thousand with five loaves and two small fishes and the gathering up of twelve baskets full of fragments. This is all plain under the old hypothesis, but it is utterly impossible to account for it as the result of the normal activity of a human life.

Miracle Fourth, Jesus walked upon the waves. When we say this was done by the intervention of a super-natural power, the phenomenon is easily explained, but when we say that it was done as the natural activity of a human life, it makes utter nonsense.

Miracle Fifth, The healing of the lame man at the beautiful gate of the temple by Peter and John. The theory of the intervention of a super-natural power is entirely adequate to account for this, but the theory of the normal activity of a human life is utterly powerless to account for it. In fact, the Apostles emphatically deny that it was by any abnormal activity on their part and distinctly ascribe it to the intervention of a super-natural power.

These five illustrations indicate the whole trend of the New Testament. Your definitions will not account for a single miracle in the New Testament, while the definition you denounce accounts satisfactorily for every one of them.

Now, my dear brother, there is just one of three courses open to you.

First: Show that your hypothesis does account for the facts.

Second: Deny your hypothesis.

Third: Deny the records as we have them in the four evangelists.

As a scientist and a philosopher you must recognize that your hypothesis is obliged to accounts for the facts. As a man of good, common sense, you must see that your hypothesis does not account for the facts. You are left no logical alternative, therefore, but to deny the facts.

I think this letter long enough, but beg to assure you we will consider all ten of these statements before we are through.

Sincerely and fraternally,

Z. T. Sweeney.

Columbus, Indiana, December 8, 1908.

Bro. Sweeney's letter, above given, seems to have shared in some measure the fate of the former one of which he speaks, for it did not reach me until December 19th. But this was doubtless due to delays in the registry service of the mail. Bro. Sweeney is accustomed to making rapid journeys over long distances in his work of lecturing and preaching, and this may account for the amount of territory covered in his letter, which might well be called continental in the distance it traverses and the number of items it includes. It seems to me it might have been more profitable to consider a smaller portion of the Bible at one sitting. It reminded one of those sermons that the fathers loved to preach, which started with creation and covered most of the field of revelation in their survey. But as most of the points refer to one general principle, that of the definition of miracles, I shall deal with each item in brief and with that principle more at length.

And first it will be noticed that in spite of the fact that Bro. Sweeney disclaims any intention of dealing with the definition of miracles, he is at the same time assuming such a definition, and is protesting against one which to me seems far more reasonable and satisfactory. When, therefore, he says, "I have given no interpretation or definition of miracles," is he unaware that it is the very question between two statements as to the nature of miracles which is the issue, and that furnishes the ground of his letter? If he finds my definition of the miraculous work of Jesus unsatisfactory, it must be because he would define it otherwise than I have done. We both affirm the fact that the miraculous narratives of Jesus' life are valid and satisfactory statements of fact. The question which Bro. Sweeney raises relates to my definition of miracle. If I gather aright his view of the matter, he would say that miracle is the intervention of a superior power in the realm of nature, which sets aside its laws, or reverses its processes in the interest of higher and spiritual ends. If I do him injustice in this description of his view, he will correct me. But he will not attempt to evade the fact that he has a definition of miracles, and that it differs from the one I have set forth precisely in the fact that it denies the orderly and harmonious character of God's work, and finds value in the setting aside of the laws of nature in the interest of the progress of revelation. This at least is the teaching of those who still maintain the arbitrary and contra-natural character of miracles. This has been the chief objection to the use of the unbiblical word "supernatural" in our time. If by it one means the divine presence in the universe, the divine purpose as manifested in the work of prophets, apostles and our Lord, and the divine possibilities of humanity under the leadership of Christ, attested by his works of powers in his own ministry, and in the uplift of the world through the Christian faith, then no one within the circle of evangelical believers would raise any question as to the use of the term. It is only against a view that makes the word "supernatural" the equivalent of contra-natural, arbitrary and capricious, that it is found unsatisfactory as applied to the miracles of the Bible.

If this understanding of the term be kept in mind, Bro. Sweeney's summary of my views is entirely satisfactory. It will be borne in mind by readers of all my statements on this subject that my insistence has been on miracles as the manifestation of a being living in the fulness of communion with God, and therefore competent to employ the forces of nature in ways impossible to our meagre and fragmentary life. That is my objection to such expressions as the one in the third item of the summary, that Jesus was a mere "visitant" to this world. Such terms rob him of that genuine humanity, which is as essential to all just comprehension of his nature as is his unique sonship to God.

There have been periods in the history of the church when men thought to honor Christ by removing him as far as possible from humanity. In this manner his divine nature was emphasized at the expense of the reality of his human experience. Similarly, whatever removed his work as far as possible from the ordinary activities of man was supposed to honor him. This is no longer true. The wonder and uniqueness of our Lord's life and work do not rest upon his separateness from men, but upon his complete realization of the divine ideal for men. He alone fulfilled all righteousness. He alone realized the Father's plan. He alone stood master of the forces in the midst of which men live. He employed them in perfect harmony with his own nature and the purpose of God. This view of his work seems consistent with all we know of God's revelation of himself in nature and in his word. On the other hand the view that Jesus broke, or ignored the methods by which God governs and orders the universe is radically at variance with all that the universe is teaching us regarding God. For this reason it is clear "that the chasm" of the fifth theme no longer exists to the man who accepts the modern view of miracle.

In the tenth item Bro. Sweeney adds a statement on which he at once preceeds to pass judgment as against "some so-called theologians." I must disclaim the privilege of being classed with such, for I do not recall having discussed the manner or mysteries of the resurrection of our Lord. I know there are those who are quite convinced as to the details of the great event. For myself I am satisfied to affirm with emphasis, that Jesus rose from the dead on the third day, and manifested himself to his disciples by many infallible proofs on that and succeeding days.

I wish now to examine Bro. Sweeney's interesting statement that "any correct hypothesis must account for the phenomena on which it is based." If he means this in the obvious sense of the true "account for," this will be disquieting news to most philosophers and scientists, for there are very few of the processes of nature or the human mind that can be "accounted for" in the sense of an explanation of causes and effects. What science does undertake to do is to observe and describe phenomena. With explanations it concerns itself less and less. If it had been affirmed by Bro. Sweeney that a hypothesis must be in harmony with the facts on which it is based, no one could take exception to the statement. It would be a poor theory that was manifestly at variance with the observed data. But science is busy in our day gathering and classifying the facts of nature, often with little success at affording explanations. It is an observed fact that seed cast into the ground germinates and grows into grain or flowers. Yet no scientist ventures to explain this fact; he only observes and records it. Students of physiology discover that nutritive material introduced into an animal organism is converted in some manner into cells and these are built into tissue of muscle and bone. Every step of this process can be traced with accuracy. Yet our latest authorities offer no explanation of the prenomena. They only note that the process is apparently in harmony with certain laws and occurs under certain conditions. We are becoming aware of a power to communicate by electrical instruments yet without connecting wires. We have seen the operation of the Marconi system, and of other systems seemingly far more wonderful than this. Yet no "explanation" has ever been offered that does more than state the condition under which such results may be expected.

Now apply this principle to the miracles of Jesus. We observe that he wrought at times as other men have not done. In other words, we observe that while in most regards his life conformed to the usual conventions of human conduct and experience, yet it was marked by instances of power unapproached elsewhere. He went among men with the air of one quite at home in the environment of the world order of his day. Then at times he moved out into wider spaces and performed works in regions where we gradually lose the power to compare them with any other deeds in history, because of their uniqueness and marvel. Is it more reasonable to suppose that he continued to manifest in these far regions that full life which he everywhere else discloses, or that he suddenly reversed all this process of natural self-expression at the point where we lose power of comparison?

In the application to the miracles of the principle of the higher employment of law, rather than its abrogation, no difficulty is experienced. The "hypothesis," to use Bro. Sweeney's term, is in entire harmony with all the facts we have. Not one of them falls outside the range of the life of Jesus as the perfect realization of the divine ideal, the incarnation of the life of God in terms of flesh and blood. To deny that the work of Jesus, or that the circumstances of his life, are in complete harmony with the laws of nature, and the expression of their supreme employment, is to assume that one has explored all the resources of the universe and discovered that they suddenly became exhausted at the point where the miracles of Jesus begin. More than this. It is to assert that for purposes of more fully revealing his nature, the Father suddenly, in the historic instances of which the Scriptures speak, shattered the structure of order and symmetry which through the centuries he had been constructing, and which to our own day constitutes one of our most assured sources of knowledge concerning his nature.

But I wish to go further and point out the utter fallacy of the assertion that the contra-natural theory of miracle explains the work of Jesus. As a matter of fact it is a metaphysical refuge from the attempt to explain anything. When approached by such an event as one of the miracles, the virgin birth, the divine testimony to Jesus, the feeding of the multitudes, it merely asserts that God did it, or that Jesus did it by the power of God, naively unconscious that the question is as little answered as before. What the questioner still wishes to know is whether some suggestion can be made that will relate these events to the rest of God's work in nature.

The commentaries and treatises on theology in past ages, when confronted by the inquiry as to the nature of Christ's works of power, have insisted that no explanation could be offered or expected, because miracle was in the nature of the case beyond explanation. They were quite correct, as science is showing, but this limitation of knowledge is no adequate apology for the suppression of inquiry to the extent that such inquiry is fruitful, and that such reflection upon the miracles of Jesus is leading to a firmer faith in his true nature as the wonder-worker, the final prophet, the Son of God, the Savior and Redeemer of men, is one of the commonplaces of religious education in our day.

And now, to make the issue still clearer, and to come closer, more to the heart of the matter, I wish to ask Bro. Sweeney the following questions:

1. What is your definition of miracle?
2. What do you consider to be the value of Jesus' miracles today as evidences of his divine nature and purpose, in comparison with his character, his teachings and his program for men?
3. What do you consider to be the present value of the miracles of Jesus as aids to Christian living?

The Financial Side of the Church

By William Oeschger

This article is written in the hope that others may speak through the Century on the subject of church finance. The writer is firmly of the opinion that many of our churches, especially the smaller ones, are greatly handicapped in their work and growth through a lack of adequate financial support. There are many churches that are always behind in meeting their financial obligations. The financial problem for such a church is a veritable nightmare. Such a state of affairs depresses the church and the minister. It gives a mood that is detrimental to active and joyous church work.

But the whole cause of such a situation is due to the fact that the matter of raising money for the local needs of the church, current runing expenses, is done without any system. The church does not have an orderly businesslike fiscal policy. The members of the church pay into the treasury of the Lord in an irregular way. They do this when the church has a minister employed. But when the church has no minister many of the members feel, and they act on that feeling, that they are not expected to pay anything into the treasury of the Lord. In many of the smaller churches there is not in the consciousness of the membership that the Christian profession implies a permanent and constant financial obligation. Now these people are, for the most part, excellent people. The fault is not so much theirs as it is in the leadership that organized them into a church. They were not made to understand from the beginning that to give from one's substance to the work of the Lord is a constant and permanent obligation. That such giving is not conditioned upon having a minister employed. Nothing more unfortunate could arise in the mind of a member of the church than that his or her financial obligation grows out of the fact that the church has a minister employed. The obligation rests upon an altogether different basis. It arises out of the personal relationship that every Christian sustains to Christ. It rests upon the permanent and constant duty that every Christian should do all that is in his or her power to bring in the reign of Christ on the whole earth. This we cannot do, unless we honor the Lord with our substance. All that we are and all that we have has been purchased by Christ through the blood that he shed for us on Calvary. To withhold what belongs to him, is sin. He has a claim upon our substance whether the church has a minister or not. The Christians' financial obligation is not abrogated when the church has no minister, and re-established again when the church has a new minister. It neither fluctuates nor varies with the coming or going of a minister.

But to inculcate this truth into the minds of many church members is a slow process. It is not done in a day. There must be persistent and patient effort. There must be more than that. The church must adopt some wise and judicious business system as a permanent method for raising the money that the work of the Lord needs in the local church. The method or system adopted must have business virtue about it to commend it to the business judgment of the membership of the church. Such a business method is needed. The church has a business side to it that makes just as imperative demands upon the church as any other interests. A church that fails in its business matters will suffer greatly in its spiritual interests. The exhortation is: have a plan, have a business-like plan, and when you have these, then work your plan in a business-like way. It will mean so much for the sucess of the church.

The writer here gives the plan that is used by the church of which he has been pastor for eight years. The pledge card used to secure the annual subscriptions from the membership of the church is herewith shown. This pledge card was originated by the writer seven years ago. He has had it electrotyped so that plenty of pledge cards can be readily run off at any time. Our financial year begins with January 1, and closes with December 31. In the first week of the year, on the the very first days of the year, we called the elders and the deacons together, and with the pastor, these all resolve themselves into a committee on finance to solicit the congregation. The church membership roll is taken and every name read. As a name is read off it is given to one of this large committee selected to do this work. It is given to the person that in the judgment of those present is the best person to see the person whose name has been read off. Thus the whole roll is gone over. Every person that has been given names is urged to see their parties at once. We aim to complete the canvass in one week. But if all are not seen in the first week, we continue. We do not cease our efforts until every member of the church has been seen. Every member is urged to pledge. The amount that is pledged is left to them. We have many penny pledges from the children. We urge the different members of the family to make separate pledges. By so doing we teach the children to become systematic givers. Very few persons refuse to make a pledge. Now and then we find a person that is peculiar or,—that refuses to make a pledge. But we just keep sweet and labor on. When the canvass is completed we know just what our resources are. With this knowledge before us we know how to proceed with our expenditures for the year. We are thus enabled to make definite calculations.

This system does not simply get the necessary funds for the work of the Lord, but it has great educational value. It inculcates the habit of systematic giving in the minds of the children. Each child is urged to open up an account with the Lord. The pledge card, as will be seen by its perusal, indicates to every one making a pledge how to proceed in its payment. Those making pledges are urged in the church paper and from the pulpit to keep their pledges paid up. They are also urged to be very careful always to write their name very plainly upon the envelope containing their contribution, so that the church treasurer will be able to give them credit. We have learned from experience that it is better to send out the statements quarterly than semi-annually. Great care must always be taken that the accounts are made out with great accuracy. Mistakes destroy confidence. The statements should be sent out very promptly at the end of each quarter. They should always be out before the first Sunday of the next quarter. The same is true at the end of the year. There must be accuracy and promptness.

In such a system the preacher is lost sight of as a factor in getting the people to give to the work of the Lord. The people are not giving because the church has a minister, but because the church has a settled policy that every member should give, and it meets every member with an organized plan that is the established order in the consciousness of the church. It is a part of the church life. It becomes a fixed habit. The new comers will readily fall in line with what is the established rule in the church.

The church is thus enabled to lay hold on the resources that she needs with which to do her work, and the whole church brought into a sacred fellowship with Christ in bringing in his rule among men. If it is desired a collector may be employed to call upon those that are in arrears at the end of each quarter. We have never had to resort to this. Our statements sent through the mail have sufficed in almost every case to bring in the amount subscribed.

In conclusion the writer would say that the system will not work of itself. It must be persistently and patiently worked. If that is done it will bring splendid results. The crucial point in it is, that the canvass for subscriptions be thoroughly done. Every member must be seen. Miss no one. See to it that they are all seen. Get a pledge from every member, if it only for a penny per week. The next thing in importance is that there must be accurate account kept of every cent that is paid in. The statements should be sent out promptly and free from error. Lastly, there must be constant attention called through gentle and gracious reminders that all put forth a very earnest effort to keep their pledges paid up. Be persistent and patient and it will bring great results.

There is no need for instruction and agitation along these lines. Could our churches lay hold of the resources that rightly belong to them the work of the Lord would go forward in leaps and bounds. But because we do not get it, is not so much the fault of the people, but because we do not go at our task in a methodical and business-like way. Our people need training. The people "are fervent in spirit," but there is often a leadership that "is slothful in business." There is much work to be done along the line of introducing a system of business-like giving in our churches. Our great need is both material and spiritual. The injunction is: "Not slothful in business; fervent in the spirit; serving the Lord." William Oeschger.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Faith Enriched

The Correspondent: "I am feeling very humble today. God has smitten me heavily. My wife was taken away from us Sunday so suddenly that I had not even a word of farewell."

The writer and his wife were in the prime of life and the full enjoyment of their years of strength when this blow fell. They had courageously studied and sacrificed together so that they might efficiently do their work of love. The years of happy home-building and joyful Christian service stretched in prospects decades ahead. Their circle of friends was an increasing one both in numbers and kindliness. There was great joy to both their hearts in watching and guiding the unfolding lives of their children. All seemed well. There was continual laughter and song in the home. There was the buoyancy of health in their bodies. There was enthusiasm and the conquering spirit in their work. There was a child-like disregard for opposition and trouble. There was the faith of light and health; but not yet the faith of darkness and time. There was the faith of reason, not yet the faith of the heart and of the deeper experiences of life.

In an hour the scenes changed. The rollicking laughter breaks suddenly off. The song ceases. All plans are shattered. Light gives place to darkness. The body is cold in death. And the soul can no longer talk and laugh, plan and pray, sing and sorrow with its companion soul. The bereaved husband has entered a new world.

"The Exit of Sorrow."

When I received the letter quoted from above I turned to a sermon of this friend that he had sent me some time previous. I said I shall read this sermon again, but this time in the light of this new experience.

I had forgotten the subject of the sermon, and was surprised and deeply impressed when I read this title, "The Exit of Sorrow;" but almost before the ink was dry, life, in its apparent grim heartlessness and in its incomprehensible mystery has written "The Entrance of Sorrow." The text used by my friend was this, "Yea and a sword shall pierce through thine own soul; that thoughts out of many hearts may be revealed."

The text to the writer of the sermon is now no longer one merely of historical meaning. The sword has now pierced his own heart; and doubtless this text and every similar text when used by him will be interpreted in the light of this new experience

"I will not play the philosopher at the cross, I will pray," is a quotation he uses in his sermon. Now is the time in his life for prayer. "The Exit of Sorrow" is good philosophy; but when it is re-written, some of these days of wonderings, heartbreakings, mysteries, strivings, prayings and child-like trustings will work themselves into the new sermon—and oh, how much richer it will be! The old sermon talks much about the Cross. The new sermon will understand it. The old sermon says "Let us endure the sorrow and search for the blessing." That is a preacher's platitude or exhortation. It is so easy to exhort in like phases. The new sermon, every line of it, will breath the impression, "I have tasted the sorrow and have found the blessing."

"Upon a Crutch."

The sermon concludes by quoting a little poem with the above title:

"Upon a crutch—her girlish face
Alight with love and tender grace,
Laughing, she limps from place to place,
Upon a crutch.

And you and I who journey through
A roseleaf world of dawn and dew,
We cry to heaven overmuch;
We rail and frown at fate,
While she and many more in agony
Are brave and patient, strong and true,
Upon a crutch."

Glad am I that as our friend goes softly these days "upon a crutch" that is philosophy, his Christian philosophy of the exit of sorrow is serving him well, and that he is learning too, "that the heart has reasons that the reason cannot know." Doubtless sorrow will reveal to him and to many of us who hope in the coming years to be enriched by his sanctified ministry, strengthening, illuminating and transforming thoughts of his heart and of the Father's heart not heretofore suspected as possible.

Our Faith Not for Parades.

Our philosophy of sorrow is not for the day of health, but for the night of trial. Faith is not for parade, it is for life with all its complexities, burdens and defeats. It is not something to boast of; but a support to humbly use. The profession of assent to propositional standards is a habit which may prove dangerous to the soul. Such profession may have its origin in books or associates. That worth while is the faith that is innermost. It is comparatively easy to assent to propositions of belief, but the real testing is with the grim realities of life. We are too often concerned with the externality of the believer; God with the very inwardness of his soul. I would know the man behind the man of the newspapers. They tell me that he believes in the Deity of Christ, in the resurrection, in the atonement, in the immortality of the soul, etc. All these are important. But what I would know does the man believe them with his lips or with his soul of souls? It is something to speak or write assent to the propositions of our Christian faith; but most men are doing it today, even while unbelief is rampant. I would like to get behind the reporter's glib writings. Not what does a man believe about Christ but does he believe Christ, is what is most necessary to ascertain. Does he believe in Christ so fully that amid all discouragements he keeps at his task in Christ's kingdom? Does he believe in the Father so fully that even in times of stress and poverty he doubts not his care? Does he believe in the resurrection so fully that even when his wife lies dead he can go happily, though subdued, to his daily work because in his heart of hearts he knows all is well? Does he believe so fully in his Lord that in every dark moment he is upheld by his promise "I am with you?". Does he so fully believe in his Master's kingdom that he can forgo the natural disposition to cultivate jealousy and hatred, and come to love even his enemies? Can he so fully believe in the almightiness of his Captain as to face the future courageously, undoubtingly, firmly trusting that every unholy tree shall be rooted up?

Perhaps no one is so accomplished in Christian grace as to completely fulfil these requirements. But I would know if the believer is laboring towards these ideals It is not the clothes that should concern us, but the heart.

Unbelief.

In these days when many are confessing their beliefs, it might be a helpful spiritual exercise for us to confess our own unbelief. There is likely to be a selfish purpose and arrogancy in our published creeds. We probably write of our faith with the thought of how it will satisfy others in our mind. We are apt to claim too much more writing of our shortcomings and less assertive boasting. Every man of us has felt sufficient of God's mysterious ways to humble him to the dust and cause all to cry out, "Lord I believe, help Thou my unbelief."

"Visit, then, this soul of mine,
Pierce the gloom of sin and grief
Fill me, Radiancy Divine;
Scatter all my unbelief."

"Unbelief is the mother of all sins." Not the unbelief of the lip or the creed, but the unbelief of the deeper self. Idleness, worry, impatience, discouragements, wayward thoughts, the lack of courage, unkindness, sectarianism, etc., are all the results of unbelief—insidious unbelief. The unbelief that steals into our hearts and steels them is the unbelief to be feared. We may believe enough of the propositional, and still be veritable unbelievers. Unbelief's ways are subtle. We need constantly to pray:

"Fill me Radiancy Divine
Scatter all my unbelief."

The unbeliever has no holy, trysting time with God; he teaches not his faith to his children; he may profess to believe, but his belief breaks down easily under trial; he may be an ardent propagator of a religious party but out of touch entirely with the Source of life. He may have a thousand arguments for his faith, but not one that will endure in the testing time.

"Help Thou my unbelief."

Last week the Foreign Society received another gift of $500 on the annuity plan. This gift comes from an aged friend in Los Angeles, Cal. The society is receiving much more from this source this year than last. Indeed, there is a gain from all sources for the first three months of the missionary year.

W. B. Alexander and wife reached Harda, India, December 8, and are already hard at work on the language. They are delighted with the prospects at Harda. They state that the missionaries are quite busy.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of December, 1908, amounted to $7,465, an increase over the corresponding month in 1907, of $5,168. There was an increase also of fifteen contributing churches, thirteen contributing Sunday-schools and seventeen Endeavor societies.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

The Essence of Legalism

The one thing more than anything else which prevents union and fellowship among Christians is the legalistic spirit. Legalism in essence is the principle of determining spiritual values and realities by solitary and arbitrary tests, by single acts of a ceremonial or verbal or moral nature, which are made decisive of spiritual states.

According to religious legalism, God approaches man and is related to him through special and particular laws or forms, and in appointed times and places. In its extreme form it is but one remove from superstition and idolatry; for while legalism is the confinement of divine life and favor to a particular act or event, idolatry is the identification, more or less complete, of the divine presence with particular objects. There is an element of superstition in all legal systems.

Legalism teaches that the form, the order, the time and place of obedience or worship, makes a difference with God; that he will grant his presence and favor in one form and order, in one time and place, but not in another; that men can come to him, be blessed by him, only as they come through a certain prescribed arrangement of visible objects or acts. This order of material objects or legal steps is not usually a natural order, but an arbitrary and artificial order; it is fixed by an authoritive person whose only reason for the order or law is that he wills it. He refuses to honor worship or service, or to bestow his favors and gifts through any other order, no matter what the character, the intention or the devotion of the worshipper may be.

Pharisaic Legalism.

As typical expressions of this legalism, one will readily recognize the priestly system of Isaiah's time, and the Phariseeism of Jesus' time. Jesus and Paul both set themselves against it as a most dangerous perversion of the true religion of God. It was this legalism of the Pharisees, this determining of a man's standing in the sight of God by the rites he performed, that separated Jew from Gentile and Jew from Samaritan. The difference between Jew and Samaritan was a difference of place where God was worshipped, not a difference in the object of worship. But this external difference was enough to distinguish the true from the false worshippers of God. The false could easily be picked out from the true, and be dealt with as "dogs." At the basis of the persecution and ostracism, the division between Jew and Samaritan, was this bigotry, this certainty of being right, grounded upon an external ritual, legal difference. Jesus' irenicon for the sectarian strife and hatred between Jew and Samaritan was a spiritual principle, "God is a spirit," and they that worship him must worship in spirit and in truth.

Legalism in the Church.

Legalism re-appeared in the early Christian church, and with it came strife and division. The root of most divisions among Christians is legalism, particular acts, which can be seen, and be made grounds of separate fellowship, opposition, hostility and persecution. The Christian world is at the present moment united spiritually and morally; but it is divided ritually, ceremonially, organically—just in those things which are external and can be made grounds of legal definition and disfellowship. This is the only ground on which the sectarian critic or censor can work; he can see and specify the things that have been left undone ceremonially or externally; but the moment the essential thing becomes spiritual and pertains to motive, attitude of the spirit and spiritual life, the things left undone are not so easily detected. The censor may find that he himself falls short spiritually and has left many moral things undone. He lets God be his judge in spiritual things; but he makes himself judge in ritual, doctrinal and external things, and on the basis of shortcoming in these he advises separation and promotes division.

Examples of Legalism.

In the early days of my ministry, in the town where I was preaching, there was a very devout, earnest young woman, a school teacher, who was a Congregationalist. There being no church of her order in the town she became a regular attendant at the services of the Christian Church, and one of the most zealous members of the Christian Endeavor Society. There were to be several baptisms at the prayer meeting; and a few hours before the time set she came and asked that she might be baptized along with the others. She came and was baptized without "coming forward" and making a formal confession of her faith. It never occurred to me that there was anything irregular or unscriptural in the procedure until the next day, when a very sincere preacher, retired and living in the place, came to my home and took me to task for baptizing her without taking her confession. He thought the baptism was invalidated because of the omission.

The fact that this young woman had confessed her faith in Christ a hundred times in the public prayer meetings of the Christian Endeavor Society, and was known by the entire community for her unselfish Christian service, seemed to pass for naught with this good man, who saw the usual order—faith, repentence, confession and baptism—violated in her case.

To him this order was inviolable. As no one could repent without believing, so no one could properly be baptized without "coming forward and making a confession." That man sincerely believed that she had missed the way into the kingdom. The conditions of salvation—faith, repentance, confession and baptism—were so many appointed doors leading through a maze of passageways into the kingdom of heaven. No matter how earnest the desire to find the King and come before His presence, to open the wrong door, or to open the right door at the wrong step in the process, was sure to miss the way.

Legalistic conversion is a nicely planned process, like the secret combination of a vault, which must be followed with mathematical accuracy. The only objection to it is that it really is not so. The soul is not a mechanism but a spiritual organism; and the treasures of the spiritual life are not hidden behind iron doors. The King in his beauty is not immured within walls at the end of an intricate passageway, to baffle the soul that seeks him. He lives in the open way, not far from any one of us. To desire him is to come into his presence; the pure in heart see God.

Strange, is it not, that one who loves us, as a father loves his child, as an elder brother loves the younger, one who in the agony of his longing to bring us to himself, out of darkness into light, laid down his life in quest of us, strange that he should make the finding of himself depend upon the turning of a legalistic trick! I wonder what father-love, mother-love, brother-love—for Jesus was all these—would have to say of the young woman whom I baptized without taking her oral confession; that she found him whom her soul desired, or that she missed the way? He said something once that makes me think she found him: "Ask, and it shall be given unto you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for everyone that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh, findeth; and to him that knocketh, it shall be opened." There was something in the light of that young woman's face, as she came up out of the water, and in the life she lived afterward, that made me think she had found him.

Divine Will and Spiritual Law.

But my legalistic friend objects by saying: Are there not certain conditions of salvation laid down in the Bible by the Divine Will which must be followed? My reply is, that there most certainly are conditions governing the salvation of the soul; but they are spiritual conditions, which are imposed by the very nature of the soul itself, just as there are certain conditions governing the growth of a tree, which are imposed by the nature of the tree, and can be known only by knowing the nature of the tree.

He who knew the nature of the soul better than we do—for he knew what was in man, and needeth not that any man should teach him—he unfolded the conditions, the laws of spiritual growth and welfare in terms of the Divine Will. It was God's will that the heart should be pure; but it is also the condition of spiritual sight. It is God's will that we should hunger and thirst after righteousness; but it is also the condition of the soul's health. It is God's will that we should love one another; but it is also the condition of social well-being. And if there is any other expression of the Divine Will in the teaching of Jesus, it is also a condition of spiritual life. It matters very little as far as its authority or necessity is concerned, whether Jesus tells us it is Divine Will or spiritual law—spiritual law or Divine Will. It is both, it is Divine Will because spiritual law (for he made the spirit to be as it is); and it is spiritual law because Divine Will. It is simply the way the soul has of living; it cannot be otherwise. It has all the authority of Divine Will. That is just the religious way (Jesus' way) of saying it.

What is Salvation?

Salvation is soul-life. It means the same thing in the language of a past time to say that it is deliverance from the wrath of God; or escape from hell; or faith in Christ; or membership in the body of Christ. These expressions all denote soul-health, conditions of spiritual life. Conversion is a term that expresses as natural a process in the spiritual world, as birth expresses a natural process in the physical world. It consists in the nature of things—in the one case in the nature of the spiritual being, and in the other case in the nature of the physical being.

Any act, or ceremony, or step, or condition, imposed in conversion, which does not grow out of the nature of the process itself, or aid the process, is arbitrary, unnatural, and legalistic. If it is not hurtful, it may or may not be done just as one chooses; it is a thing indifferent; and in such a case neither appeal to Divine Will nor human law can make it necessary. That which makes no difference with the spiritual condition—the soul life—makes no difference with God.

God never did and never will make anything necessary to salvation which is not first of all necessary in the nature of things to spiritual growth and well being.

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

The Tragedy of Falsehood*

The community of disciples which had been suddenly augmented on the Day of Pentecost to more than three thousand had now come to be a much larger group, more than five thousand in all. The spirit of Jesus was in their hearts. Good will prevailed everywhere. The first desire of those who had means was to care for the unprovided. Many of the followers of the Lord were no doubt of the unresourceful and perhaps even the improvident class. Every new movement attracts to itself many people who are merely curious who are even willing to be borne along by the good will of their more industrious fellows. Probably, therefore, early Christianity found itself very soon compelled to supply material aid to many of its adherents.

The Gift of Barnabas.

This task was taken up with enthusiasm. Generous gifts were made to a common fund. Among those who thus freely gave was Barnabas, who afterwards became a notable figure in the work of the church, especially in companionship with the Apostle Paul. The home of Barnabas had been in the Island of Cyprus. It was to Cyprus that he directed the little missionary expedition of which he and Paul and Mark were the members when the church at Antioch first took up the task of evangelism in the regions beyond (Acts 13). As yet however, he was but an obscure disciple, and his spirit was made evident when he sold a piece of property owned by him, either in Jerusalem or Cyprus, and brought the money to the common treasury, casting it into the pile at the feet of the Apostles. This was, perhaps, only one of many notable instances of generous giving.

The Free Offerings.

But there was no communism in the early church, since everyone gave as he chose. It has often been claimed by advocates of the communistic program that there is apostolic sanction for the practice of abolishing private ownership of property and vesting all the proceeds of industry in a common fund. But it will be seen that this was not the case among the early Christians. Their contributions were quite voluntary. Peter expressly states, as we see in the present lesson, that a man's goods are his own to be disposed of as he sees fit. If he wished to give a part or the whole that was a matter for his own decision. Some gave all and were correspondingly approved by those who witnessed their act. Others gave a part and withheld some, as they thought they might need to provide for the future.

The Sin of Ananias.

But there were some in the church at Jerusalem who gave a part and claimed to have given all, and this brought them into trouble. The names of Ananias and Sapphira are the synonyms of deception even to our day. In one of the gatherings of the disciples, when gifts were being brought or reports of progress of the cause were being presented, Ananias was present. He had given a sum of money to the common fund, letting it be known that this was the total proceeds of the property he had sold. To be sure he was not compelled to give more than this amount. The matter was quite in his own hands, but he wished the credit of a total consecration. Perhaps Peter had learned of the deception. Perhaps the actual price which Ananias received had been told and had come to the apostle's ears, or perhaps in the man's look and conduct there was something which declared him guilty of the attempt to deceive. In some manner Peter was so firmly convinced of the fraud that with his fiery and indignant soul deeply stirred at this early manifestation of evil among the followers of the Master, he denounced the offender with unsparing wrath.

The Work of Satan.

His question, "Why hath Satan filled thy heart?" is not to be construed as relieving Ananias in any way of moral blame. To be sure, if Satan had forcibly possessed Ananias' mind it might be questioned in what way could he be held accountable for his act by Peter. But Peter recognized that whatever the temptation that had come to Ananias the sin was his own as a matter of disposition or of present choice. Therefore, more directly, he said: "How is it thou has conceived this thing in thy heart." Here the figure of Satanic control is abandoned, and the sin is laid bare as that of the man's own will. The Apostle and his fellows were witnesses for the Holy Spirit. In the new time which had now come, the church was under the leadership of the Spirit of God. Above the Apostle there stood evermore in the mind of these early followers of Jesus the imperial leadership of the Holy Spirit to which they were accountable. Ananias' act had been one of outrage, not against Peter, but against that Spirit of truth which was the quickening force, in the church.

The Death Stroke.

So terrible was the denunciation that, stung with shame and remorse past enduring, or frightened by the awful wrath of the apostolic leader, or stricken by some sudden malady induced by the terror of the hour, he fell dead at the apostle's feet. There is no statement that it was by the stroke of God, it will be observed, and yet there is no doubt that both Peter and the beholders believed that divine vengeance had overtaken the sinner. We do not need to suppose that Peter exerted any miraculous power in this instance. Indeed, such a fact would at once implicate the power of Jesus through which the apostles wrought their works of might, with a spirit of vengeance totally foreign to our Lord. The other explanations are much more in keeping with the spirit of the New Testament, and the lesson taught the early church was equally effective.

The Coming of Sapphira.

It was a moment of consternation on the part of all who beheld the tragedy. The man lay dead, and obviously as the result of his conduct. Quickly some of the young men in the group wrapped him about and carried him forth for burial according to the hasty customs of the age.

No doubt the commotion caused by this event was very great. The assembly of the disciples was probably one of those gatherings which they were accustomed to enjoy daily. Hours passed in such conference, preaching, healing, and giving directions. But the theme of the day absorbed all minds. They had not yet dispersed when three hours later Sapphira, the wife of Ananias appeared. She had learned nothing of the fate that had overtaken her husband, but she must have soon become aware of the unusual intensity of the feeling on the part of those who were present. When she came in, the apostle Peter attempted to learn at once whether she had been guilty with her husband or whether she was innocent. The money still lay where it had been placed by Ananias, or the record of it was at hand. Peter asked Sapphira whether this was actually the amount received for the field. She responded at once that it was, perhaps startled by the inquiry, but determined to stand with her husband in the transaction and perhaps looking about to learn whether he was present.

Death of the Wife.

Then once more the righteous indignation of Peter poured forth. They had agreed upon the matter as was evident. It was a direct insult to the Spirit of God. It was a trial of the patience of that Lord who had given himself completely for them. At that moment the men who had borne Ananias forth apepared again in the circle. It seemed to the apostle full of significance as an indication of Sapphira's own fate. He could not doubt that if the wrath of God had stricken down the first offender the other would share in the chastisement. He denounced her before them all. Under such a crushing indictment and with the tense atmosphere of apprehension, indignation, and excitement all about her, the woman suffered the same shock that had come upon her husband and fell prostrate at the feet of Peter. The very youths who had carried forth Ananias to burial, bore her away.

The Value of the Event.

This was the manner in which the story took form in the early church, was treasured in the first Christian community and came to the ears of Luke, thus finding its way into the annals of early Christianity. The significance of these events could not be misunderstood. With the strong emotional nature of these early disciples the effect would be overwhelming and the strong sense of the consequences of evil must have pervaded the church for many a day. We have learned in the process of the years that God does not strike down offenders against his laws. If he did and lying were punished today by such means, it would be difficult for any community to escape disaster. But the divine laws, none the less, work inexorably. The penalty of deception and fraud is not always external, but is certainly and invariably in the soul of the sinner himself. Liars cannot inherit the Kingdom of God.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

LESSON IX. SUNDAY SCHOOL EQUIPMENT.

I. IN GENERAL. One general rule for all Sunday-school equipment is that it shall have meaning for education, and that everything that is effective for education has its place in the Sunday-school.

II. Buildings. As much care should be given to the architecture of the Sunday-school room as to that of the church itself. For new schools the services of an architect who is a specialist in the Sunday-school line should be secured. In old schools much can be done by re-arrangement and the erection of sliding partitions or folding doors, to bring them into line with the chief modern requirements. Wherever possible, SEPARATE CLASS ROOMS should be provided. In addition the Kindergarten, Primary and Junior Departments should have SEPARATE ASSEMBLY ROOMS. This, of course, is only possible in the larger and more modern buildings. Where nothing else can be done, at least a spare room should be curtained or partitioned off for the exclusive use of the Primary Department. The building should be neither a barn nor a cathedral—serviceable, but not ugly. A proper system of ventilation is essential, as children are often blamed for listlessness when lack of oxygen is the real trouble. For further information on this important subject the student is referred to the literature at the end of the chapter.

III. FURNITURE. All Sunday-school furniture should be of the best. Cheap and flimsy material should be avoided.

(1.) CARPET. Where funds will permit, the main room should be carpeted, and the several classes and departments may be encouraged to raise funds for the carpeting of their own rooms.

(2.) CHAIRS. Chairs are very much better than benches. They should be of the folding variety, in order that they may be stacked away when the room is used for social purposes. They should be suited to the size of the pupils: A little child on a big chair is sure to be restless. Where the room is uncarpeted rubber tips prevent a great deal of unnecessary noise.

(3.) DESKS, TABLES, ETC. A DESK should be provided for the use of those officers who have records to keep, or writing to do. In most schools one large desk will be sufficient. Where manual work is used, each class in the Primary, Junior and Intermediate Departments should have a separate TABLE large enough to accommodate all the pupils comfortably, and a LOCK-BOX for keeping the class supplies—note and song-books, pictures, pencils, mucilage, etc. Folding tables can be had at a reasonable price.

(4.) BLACKBOARDS. These are essential to all modern education. There should be one for the main school, and for each department. Each class may profitably be provided with a small board for table use, or that can be let into the wall. The Square Chalk Crayons are the best, and colored chalks are of advantage.

(5) SAND TABLES. Sand tables should be provided in the Kindergarten, Primary and Junior Departments. These should be fixed on casters, and provision made for tilting. They should vary in height with the size of the pupils. Clean sand should be used.

(6.) PICTURES. For reaching the minds through the "eye-gate" pictures are very valuable. They should represent only the best in Christian art. The Kindergarten and Primary grades should have many of these which may be cut from current magazines and inexpensively mounted. The higher classes should be encouraged to purchase more expensive pictures for themselves. This will give them pride in their rooms.

IV. MAPS, ETC. A good map is essential to intelligent Bible teaching. Where possible every department above the Primary should have its own map of Palestine in the time of Christ. In addition a fully equipped school should have the following: Map of Bible lands, Wilderness Wandering, Paul's Missionary Journeys, United Hebrew Kingdom, Divided Hebrew Kingdom, Restored Jewish Community, Missionary Map of the World, Topographical Map of Palestine, showing contour, altitudes, etc., Relief Map of Palestine, indispensable for manual training work in geography. Where all of these cannot be secured let them be purchased in the order named. In the selection of maps care should be taken that they represent the latest results of scholarship. The adult classes may well be encouraged to provide a series of maps for themselves.

V. CHARTS. Charts are of great use in illustrating Bible history, and kindred matters. The Sunday-school Supply houses catalogue the best of these. Perhaps the most are those of Bible Chronology, the Life of Christ, the Holy City, and the Temples of Solomon and Herod. Temperance and Missionary charts may also be used with advantage.

VI. MODELS, ETC. Models of Bible objects are very useful for class work, especially in the younger grades. The fully equipped school will have a set of these models for each series of lessons. Some of these, such as the eastern tent, well-curb, etc., can be made by the teachers themselves, or by the classes under their direction. Where manual work is a regular part of the curriculum, the scholars should be encouraged to make correct models for the use of the school. For missionary study, CURIOS are indispensable. The Missionary Boards of most of the churches provide boxes of these curios for Sunday-school use. Where they can be secured actual objects, utensils, idols, etc., brought from heathen countries are of great service. MISSIONARY PROGRAMMES, with appropriate charts, pictures etc., are also helpful for the younger grades and for platform use.

VII. RECORDS. For the proper keeping of its records the school should be provided with: (1) a card list with box for the enrollment of each scholar and teacher in school; (2) a set of class cards for each scholar and teacher; (3) a class book for each class, preferably of the loose-leaf kind. (4) A Modern Secretary's Record Book. (5) A collection envelope for each class and for the officers of the school. Large schools may find it necessary, and all will find it useful to have a multigraph, or other machine for manifolding circulars and other matter of general interest. All printed matter should be only of the best.

VIII. MANUAL WORK. In schools that have adopted manual training, the following material will be found of service: Paper pulp for map work; sand map; colored papers for cutting and pasting note books, or book covers with loose leaves; clay or plasticine for modeling paper objects; sets of Perry, Tissot or similar pictures for pasting in note books; scissors, pencils, paste, etc.

IX. In addition to the above equipment the following need be barely mentioned: (1) BIBLES and MUSIC BOOKS—one of the latter for each scholar where possible; (2) FLAGS and BANNERS. These should be used with care, but are useful in their place to encourage a healthy rivalry; (3) STEREOPTICON. There is no better way to conduct the quarterly review than by means of a stereopticon lecture. Missionary teaching is also greatly aided in this way. Many of the Missionary Boards provide stereopticon slides for the use of schools.

LITERATURE. Meads' "Modern Methods in Sunday-school Work;" Hixon's "Missions in the Sunday-school;" Cope's "Modern Sunday-school in Principles and Practice;" Foster's "Manual of Sunday-school Methods;" Littlefield's "Hand-work in the Sunday-school." For the outline of the above lesson, the author is largely indebted to the chapter on "The Sunday-school Equipped," by Marion Lawrence, in "Training the Teacher."

QUESTIONS: (1) What is the general rule for all Sunday-school equipment? (2) Name two requirements of the modern Sunday-school room. (3) What can often be done with an old room? (4) Discuss the following articles of furniture: Carpets, chairs, desks, tables, blackboards, sand-tables, pictures. (5) Where it is possible secure only one map, which would you choose, and why? (6) How many maps of Palestine in the time of Christ should there be in the school? (7) Name in order the maps of a fully equipped school. (8) What may the adult classes be encouraged to do? (9) Name some of the charts that are of greatest use. (10) Tell the use of models, curios and missionary programmes. (11) Name some of the essentials for keeping good records. (12) What equipment is needed for manual work? (13) Name some other useful things.

THE PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

Are We Realizing Our Mission as a People?
Topic, Feb. 3. Matt. 7:15-20; Luke 13:6-9.

Our mission is to assist in Christianizing the world. We are committed to the proclamation of the grace of God that brings salvation. Any special work we have to do has its warrant in the general commission under which we are sent forth. "Be ye reconciled to God," is the entreaty we must make to all whose hearts have not been touched by the fatherly compasion of God. "Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you," is our exhortation to all whose lives are deformed by personal, class, or race antagonisms.

Our Controversies.

Like the Corinthians, we are enriched in word. It is a rare Disciple who declines to make the fullest use of an opportunity to defend in debate the faith once for all delivered to the saints. When our religious neighbors are not present to engage us in combat, we fall one upon another. We regard our controversial powers as a sacred trust and we take pride in having them always in readiness. We glory in battle. Let us not be ashamed of our fighting proclivities. This world cannot be delivered from its evil ways by men who will not fight. But it may be that in our zeal to destroy the enemies of the Lord we occasionally beat to pieces men of straw and even turn our weapons against our fellow-soldiers. The blare of trumpets and the roll of drums and the shouting of the host throw us into confusion and we strike every man his brother. Self-restraint is a much needed virtue in the day of battle. Rash leaders invite disaster.

Our Plea for Union.

We have discussed union for many days; what have we to show in the way of practice and of spirit? Every church must answer this question for itself, for our churches differ widely in their attitude toward believers in the Lord who do not see eye to eye with us. Every Disciple has the question to answer with respect to himself. Some of us may be the worst sort of sectarians. We may be more anxious to have our opinions accepted than to be led into all the truth. Because we have no written creed it does not follow that we are always open-minded in the study of the Bible and of religious phenomena. Bigoted sectarianism may wave the banner of Christian union. It has become the fashion to put the "Antis" in the class of sectarians; perhaps others of us will have to go into that class. It is for each of us to search his heart and see whether his motives will stand the test of the whole truth. But while we are ferreting out the sectarianism among us, let us not miss the privilege of fellowship with the truly catholic souls to be found in our churches. There are many of them. Their breadth of view and sympathy give them a right to condemn the sins of a divided church.

Our Worship.

Do we know how to worship God? Have the devotional portions of the Bible power over us? What sort of hymns do we sing? What goes on in our minds during public prayer? Do the ministers know how to pray? Do our souls cry out for the living God? Or do we think of God merely as the dispenser of material comforts whom it is good form to thank now and then? These questions I leave for the consideration of any who may read them. It is possible to make general statements that will apply to every congregation of Disciples. I am sure, however, that in no congregation has the ideal been reached. For the benefit of our own souls and for the good we can do to the irreligious we must cultivate the devotional life. Worship has its social aspects and if we truly honor the Lord in song and prayer we shall not feel that it is a vain and foolish thing to go to church even when the congregation does not rush up to shake hands with us. We shall be glad to unite in common worship.

Our Schools.

How many of us are profoundly interested in education? How many resent the appearance of the college's representative to discuss before the people the needs of the college and the work it is expected to do? How many preachers have a just appreciation of the importance of education in carrying out the mission of the church? It is easier to arouse interest in efforts to rescue the vicious than it is to secure co-operation for the systematic training of the young that they may not go astray? How many of our church members are studying their Bibles? How many have a fair knowledge of America as a mission field? How many can talk two minutes on foreign missions and talk intelligently? Here again I ask others to give the answer. It is my conviction that we are not realizing our mission if we have not a definite policy that enlists the support of every disciple and that includes the Sunday-school and the college and provides for instruction in the Bible, church history, missions, philanthropy, and personal, social, and civic righteousness.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

February 7, 1909.

Subject: "Our Christian Endeavor Comrades the World Over." Ps. 98:1-9. (Christian Endeavor Day).

Suggestive Readings: The Book of Joel; The Book of Obadiah.

Suggestive Thought: "The primary work of the church is to make Jesus Christ known and obeyed and loved throughout the world."

The growth of Israel into the attitude toward the heathen which the psalmist holds was a slow and arduous one. Indeed, the Old Testament becomes a fascinating book to us when we notice that it has two sides, one of which is intensely divine, and the other of which is intensely human. The Hebrews fought great battles without, but they fought greater battles within. That vivid and picturesque prophet, Jeremiah, describes as his own experience what was the experience of the nation. "Then I said, I will not make mention of Him or speak any more in His name. But His word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay."

The Old Testament forms another Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde story, only in the person of Jesus Christ the climax was reversed. The wild spirit of the untamed man fought against the will of God and the God life, but in the end the God life prevailed. Hebrew history began in barbarism, deceit, idolatry, and hatred of the heathen. Read the books of Joel and Obadiah, and if we are correct in placing their dates at an early period, see the Hebrew pronouncing curses upon the nations all around.

But in the end love prevailed over fear and hatred, as it always will. The later centuries, from which our psalm for study comes, developed the thought that the heathen also were children of God and embraced in His plan of salvation. Read hastily the book of Jonah, and notice how the whole purpose of the writer is to set forth this powerful and beautiful truth. It teaches that God is more merciful than man, and that the punishing of Israel's foes is not so dear to Him as the work of bringing all men everywhere to repentance and salvation.

Such thoughts as these helped to form the seed bed for Christianity. Then in the fulness of time Jesus came. By story, by parable, by deeds, but most of all by his attitude, he taught the universal brotherhood of man. The Samaritan, the Publican, the beggar, the cripple, the blind, the sinful woman, the aristocrat, all peoples, are your neighbors and mine. Were there no such words in the New Testament as "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," the very attitude of Jesus should fill us with missionary fire and zeal.

Moreover Jesus was a young man, but in his thirties when he died. He looked upon the young man and loved him, he loved children, he drew his stories from the children playing in the streets. Therefore, all the more ought every Christian Endeavor Society to be a missionary society, full of the spirit of Peter and Paul. Our own social pleasure and our own moral uplift form only one side of our work. We've got the world on our shoulders. Jesus Christ put it there.

I looked upon the picture of an eastern battlefield. A Japanese boy lay there, cold and quiet, the youthful face of one not out of his teens turned up to the sky. He was my brother. Did he know Jesus Christ? Our missionary lectures are showing us pictures of little foreign children walking along the streets. They are being taught the "WAY." They'll be our Endeavor comrades some day perhaps. What a word is that word, "Comrade"! As one hears it his elbow reaches out to lock arms, does it not? Let us resolve to study and read and work that we may know more of, and have more of, "our Christian Endeavor Comrades the world over."

Hiram College Facts and Hopes

By a Friend of the College.

Some three years ago Mr. H. R. Newcomb, president of The Citizens Savings & Trust Company, of Cleveland, and a member of the Board of Trustees of Hiram College, offered the sum of ten thousand dollars for the College endowment fund, provided nine other gifts of like amount should first be secured. Later on, Mr. Newcomb consented to modify this condition in such wise as to permit of the sum of $90,000 being raised in amounts of any size and number whatever, instead of the nine sums of ten thousand dollars each originally contemplated.

This proposition was made because of the necessity confronting the Hiram College Board to make permanent provision against the recurrence of annual deficits of $10,000 or more.

Such deficits have arisen each year because of the fact that the College shows an annual operation expense of from $25,000 to $28,000, and an income from students' fees and interest on invested funds of only about $15,000 or $18,000 annually. Hitherto two-thirds of the income has been derived from the former and one-third from the latter source.

These annual deficits have been met by current subscriptions from friends of the college, which have on the average exceeded the shortage to be made good. Thus the total assets of the college have slowly increased, and at no time have the invested funds been materially or permanently impaired or depleted.

Until the successful conclusion of the recent attempt to obtain one hundred thousand dollars additional endowment for Hiram College, that institution had, in addition to $47,000 special funds for the fulfillment of annuity contracts, or the discharge of other particular objects to which they were restricted, about $102,000 of productive endowment, the income whereof, was applicable to the general expenses of operation. But in order to prevent the recurrence of deficits and to lay a foundation for further growth in the work of the College along lines of need, as well as particularly to obtain admission for the College, on behalf of the members of its faculty, to the benefits of The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, a doubling at least, and preferably a trebling of its general endowment was called for.

About a year ago the foregoing facts were brought to the attention of Mr. Andrew Carnegie, who very kindly offered, by letter of Feb. 7, 1908, to provide the last $25,000 of $100,000 additional endowment for Hiram college, upon its obtaining $75,000 in "cash or realizable securities."

The trustees of the College and one or two warm friends of its work quickly pledged amounts which brought the sum total, with Mr. Carnegie's offer, to $68,000. But because of the general and acute business depression and the pending presidential campaign the project lagged until the middle of November, at which time the president of the College, and endownment committees of the Board and of the Faculty, the Hiram College Alumni Association of Cleveland and vicinity, and the Hiram College Club of Women took up the work with much enthusiasm.

Meanwhile, Mr. H. R. Newcomb, by reason of advancing years and failing health, as well as his desire to see the endowment project consumated as soon as possible, fixed a time limit for the fulfillment of the condition attached to his gift of ten thousand dollars and stipulated that the whole amount must be subscribed before January 1, 1909. By dint of great effort subscriptions aggregating about $105,000 were obtained within the time thus limited. While this amount apparently overshoots the mark, and the conditions of Mr. Newcomb's gift will have been fulfilled if only $100,000 of the amount pledged shall be promptly paid, yet it must be borne in mind that some of the pledges, amounting to possibly $5,000 are of such a nature as not to be eligible immediately, if at all, to meet the limitation embodied in Mr. Carnegie's phrase "Cash or realizable securities." Moreover, with the completion of the year 1907, another annual deficit of $10,000 under the old condition of affairs has again arisen, and inasmuch as the entire accretions to the college funds from current subscriptions have been counted toward the fulfillment of the endowment enterprise, it follows that the usual means of meeting the yearly shortage are not available. This statement must, however, be qualified by the fact that certain annuities have fallen in during the year by the death of the annuitant, and transfers have accordingly been made from special funds to the general fund, while at the same time accretions to the special funds from entirely new sources have in considerable amounts been received.

Until the books of the finance committee and of the treasurer of Hiram College can be closed for the year 1907, and a statement drawn off, it will not be possible to state exactly how much, if any more money, will be required to make a showing on behalf of the college, which is a clean $100,000 better than that of a year ago, prior to the commencement of the endowment campaign.

It is conjectured, however, that $4,000 or $5,000 more ought to be subscribed, in order to make the situation in this behalf perfectly secure.

It is also true that this splendid achievement is not sufficient, even with the present increased enrollment of students and enlarged revenue from students' fees, to prevent wholly the recurrence of deficits, which is the first evil to be remedied. At least $50,000 more should be obtained at once to accomplish this result.

The College for Christ; Christ for the College is the Centennial watchword appropriate to this day. The colleges of the Disciples in friendly rivalry, but with a common purpose, are the indispensable allies of the Church in the Christian education of her youth, recruiting of her ministry and the propagation of her faith. Without invidious discrimination it is worthy of note that Hiram College has long had the largest Mission Study Class in the world, while the influence and inspiration of such men as President Bates ,and Professors Peckham, Dean, Wakefield, Snoddy and Paul, in her Bible Department and Ministerial Course are known and felt wherever Disciples of Christ exist. With this good record Hiram College should not appeal in vain to the church for the $50,000 which she still needs to enable her properly to perform her great and growing work.

CHICAGO

THE CONVENTION OF CHICAGO DISCIPLES EACH QUARTER A MOST INTERESTING AND INSPIRING EVENT. O. F. JORDAN, CHICAGO'S SECRETARY, WRITES OF LAST SUNDAY'S RALLY AND E. S. AMES' ADDRESS.

For those who are interested in the doings of the Disciples in Chicago, there is always a special interest in the rally of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society, which is held quarterly. Other cities where disciples are numerous and where distances are not so stupendous, have tried to hold such meetings but with meager success. George H. Combs, of Kansas City, in his address at our quarterly meeting a year ago, reported loyally the great undertakings of the Kansas City churches, but said this great central meeting at stated times could not be made a success in his town.

An Epoch-Making Rally.

The quarterly rally that was held last Sunday was epoch-making in many particulars. The attendance was the largest in years. By actual count there were nearly five hundred in attendance, coming from as far north as Evanston, from as far south as Harvey and from as far west as Maywood. Some of these people had to ride an hour on fast express trains to reach the place of meeting. The rally was unusual in its representative character. The largest delegation was from Monroe Street Church but that delegation numbered only forty-four people. The audience was the gathering together of the leading workers of the various churches. The rally was epoch-making in its spirit. If some outside of Chicago still grow hysterical at times over the theology and practices of Chicago men, Chicago itself is at peace, not in the peace of indifference and indolence, but the peace which comes to a people that has found its essential unity in a hearty acceptance of a common task and a common point of view. From the opening prayer to the closing benediction there was not a single note save that of good fellowship. It may well be doubted whether the Disciples of a single great city in the country are more united and fraternal than here.

The greatest thing in the rally, however, was not the crowd, nor the enthusiasm, but the defining of the ideals of the Disciples of Chicago in a way to command the approval of all. Perhaps no man in the city could have done the task so well as it was done by E. S. Ames. He is no novice. He knows the city through years of acquaintance. He knows the Disciples. He is in touch with the great human movements of the age and is contributing his part to them. We shall not hope to give a synopsis of Dr. Ames' address, but certain things in it are so significant that they have quite driven from our mind a different line of thought we had purposed to present.

We were interested, first of all, in the brief historical resume of the Disciples in Chicago. Lathrop Cooley was the first Chicago pastor and he is still living. Several times men were called who might have written the history of our cause differently in this city. W. T. Moore was called to the pastorate in Chicago in the early days and was offered a salary probably twice what any man in the city is now receiving. He realized the nature of the city problem and declined the call. The week before the Chicago fire, J. H. Garrison had made arrangements to establish the Christian publishing company in this city. "The saddest words of tongue or pen, are these, 'It might have been.'" Who can tell how the life of our city might have been influenced if these two godly and capable men had come here to give the full strength of their mature manhood?

Progress Since the World's Fair.

It has been only since the World's Fair that the new epoch of missionary expansion of the Disciples has begun. Since that time a training school for ministers has been inaugurated in the University of Chicago and two hundred of our men have gone out from it. A journal with a national influence has been established in the city. Various organizations to give opportunity for the people of our different churches to cooperate have grown up. A membership of over four thousand Disciples has been gathered together in our churches. This strength makes necessary the defining of the ideals of the Disciples in the future.

Dr. Ames found his listeners leaning forward in the seats as he asked the question, "What shall be our task, and what our ideals?" That question has often been raised among us to be a bone of contention and a source of discord. Could he speak for this diverse group of liberty-loving Disciples and find what was fundamental to the religious aspirations of them all? There was much interest in Dr. Ames negative answer to the question which he gave first.

Old Time Theological Controversy Forgotten.

"The significant heresies of Chicago are not the higher criticism of the Old Testament or the teaching of evolution." These have less bearing on life than many have thought. We can offord to ignore our differences on these subjects. It is clear that men of different tendencies with regard to these subjects are efficient agents for the bringing in of the Kingdom.

There is only one significant heresy in Chicago and that is the frank adoption of the point of view of social service and social redemption. More and more our ministers in Chicago are giving their attention to this subject and some have well-nigh forgotten the old controversies over the origin of the Pentateuch and over the possibility of our having had animal ancestors. Not that our men have gone back to older and less tenable positions as some may think. They have simply moved forward to more fundamental issues in construing the task of the Disciples.

Let us remark here, that we believe in this point of view lies the hope of the ultimate unity of all the Disciples in our country. Not all have the laboratory experience to agree with the latest pronouncements of science. Not all have access to great libraries to make a critique on the latest pronouncement in biblical criticism. But all are close to the great human problems of the age, and in the ushering in of the new era of brotherhood and the advancing of the Kingdom of God, the Disciples will find their great unifying principle. C. G. Kindred arose at the close of the address and said in his informal and hearty way, "And so that is what you mean, bless your heart! Why that's what we're doing out at Englewood!" He spoke for the great company of Disciples. If there are any who do not believe in the great work of ushering in the new civilization, and realizing the social ideals of the Kingdom of God, he is not of us, but there are few Disciples who do not so believe.

The Social Problem.

Dr. Ames showed that evangelism had a place in this new spirit of social redemption. We are not to despise the work of getting people to come forward in church. The kingdom needs its workers and society must be influenced by a man to man contact as well as in the mass. Yet much of our evangelism is fruitless in the end because the social environment makes it seem impossible to men to realize their Christian ideals. Many of us who are pastors in the city have men who are in a state of bad conscience over their work. Some men must work on Sunday and absent themselves from worship and from the work of the churches. Other men are in places of business where the methods are not always in accord with the Christian ideal. Not only must men be converted and given an individual experience of religion, but they must be given a social environment where they shall be able to work out their Christian ideals.

The Disciples must co-operate with all the forces that work for social redemption. Fortunately they have always been the leaders among the religious bodies of the city in insisting on a broadly tolerant attitude toward the various religious bodies. The Federation movement of Chicago has always had Disciples in prominent places. The Co-operating Council of City missions brings together Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Disciples. The union enterprises of the city always find the Disciples in hearty fellowship. Only by the closest association of all the forces that make for social regeneration can the goal be reached.

In the city there are many other forces outside the churches that are helping to do the work of the Kingdom. Even the city government, whatever corruption may exist in administration, is yet a minister of much that is good. Our streets are cleaned, our lives are preserved from contagion, our children are educated and many other social tasks are performed even with the present machinery of government. The Disciples must work in unison with these forces, and to co-operate with the city in preventing disease might be as great and good a project as establishing a hospital. We are the only great religious body here that has no hospital. Some time we shall erase this stigma, but until then we may do much in co-operating with the sanitary agencies that work on the greater task of preventing disease.

Restoration of Primitive Ideals.

We were interested in Dr. Ames' appeal to accept Jesus' own statement of the great teaching of the Old Testament. Jesus said the law and the prophets were fulfilled in the principle of loving our neighbor and of loving God. This is none other than the point of view of the new social movement. The parable of the good Samaritan, we reflected, fits this point of view. We remembered that even the Judgment parable of Jesus, of the sheep and the goats, taught that only those who fed the hungry, clothed the naked and did the other work of the kingdom would be received into the higher fellowship of the Father. Dr. Ames pleaded for the restoration of the primitive ideals of Christianity as the fathers pleaded and showed that the chiefest thing of all in New Testament Christianity was the realization of universal brotherhood and brotherliness. We said a few weeks ago that Dr. Ames "defended the faith once for all delivered to the saints." We have no reason to regret that statement.

Not too Remote for Our Effort.

Do any of our number feel that this new social ideal is too large and too distant to be realized? Dr. Ames called our attention to the statements of some leading neurologists that the trouble with many nervous sufferers was that they lacked the large idealism of religious people. They are being sent by the doctors to the preachers to be interested in the larger work of the Kingdom and to regain health in service. Perhaps, we reflected, some of our nervous Disciples would find the very kind of nerve treatment in the new social movement which they need.

If the church cannot clean the streets, it can furnish honest men to superintend and carry through that task. If the church cannot do the teaching in the schools, it can yet radiate an influence that will transform the school room. Apart then from our institutional ambitions, there is the still larger ambition and ideal of the church to leave the impress of the teaching of Jesus upon the whole of our modern civilization.

We do not pretend that what we have written is in any sense a resume of Dr. Ames' address. It was not intended for that. We have attempted rather to give expression to the growing consciousness of the whole company of Disciples in Chicago. Our people never had more promise of a glorious future than at this time when with true catholicity of spirit we are trying to find the basis of our fellowship in the comradeship of doing the work Jesus gave his disciples to do, the great work of seeking and saving the lost. Our churches are settling down to the solid and constructive work that will make them mighty forces for righteousness in the years to come.

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

Youngstown, Ohio

Having been asked by the editor of the Century to conduct a department of interest to men particularly, and believing (much as I enjoy a theological scrap) that the solving of practical social problems is fully as important as theological correctness (which is a better word than orthodoxy), I enter heartily into this task of helping to organize our men into a grand group of Christian workers.

This is a timely department. That princely fellow P. C. Mcfarlane has just begun his work among us. His paper, Christian Men, has just commenced its useful career. Our ideal layman, R. A. Long, is the president of this new and promising movement. A group of elegant men are with him on the committee. The movement begins splendidly. Other brotherhoods are already organized in other communions or are being organized now. Next to the Sunday-school this is the biggest thing that's on.

Men boast of their system. Some of us take "System," but the women whom we have been accustomed to deride, as having no conception of orderly ways of procedure have this year far outstripped even our greatest missionary board. There is no use trying to make excuses. The men ought to be ashamed of themselves. Our wives with their regular fifteen cents per month have shown the value of system and at the same time have revealed the pitiful stinginess or indifference of the men, whichever it is, or both.

The Layman's Missionary Movement will correct all this. Our men must be tied up with this efficient group. We shall soon come to see that a man is not measured by his income but by his out-go. This department will stand for generosity and missions.

The big things that challenge and hold men will be discussed here. The stirring achievements of heroic men in reform measures will be considered. Successful Bible classes, missionary organizations, clubs of every sort will be noticed. We will never win men unless we give them some big, worthful task to perform. Unless the modern church has such jobs women and children will predominate.

Next week we will consider this idea further. The topic will be, "A Man's Job."

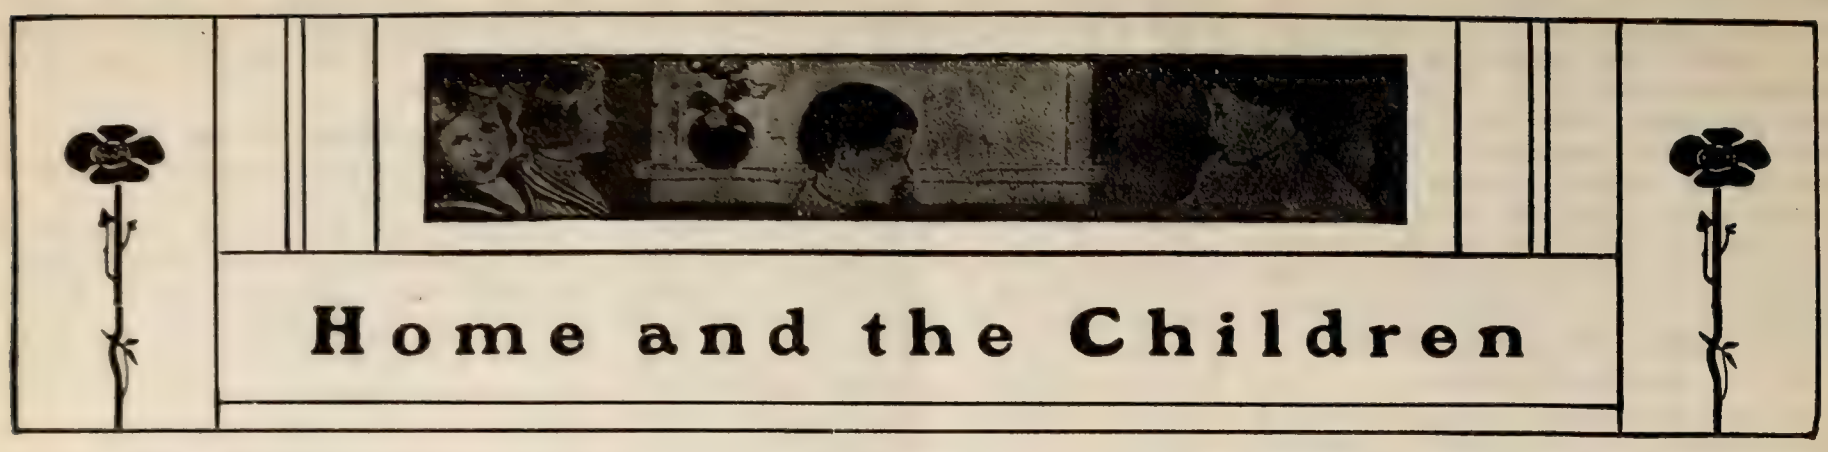
"SAN FRANCISCO BAY" DISCIPLES' AND MEN'S WORK.

As an expression of the almost unbounded esteem in which Brother Macfarlane, who at an early date is to take his departure from among us, to keep watch above the destinies of this new organization, is held, and with an earnest desire to acquaint themselves more perfectly with the ideals and purposes that it means to subserve, fifty of the men of the congregations on the Oakland-Alameda-Berkeley side of the bay recently assembled at a banquet, at which time Brother Macfarlane in most superb and splendid fashion made his initial bow to them in the interests of this new phase of our work.



And if the eagerness and enthusiasm with which they followed him as he unfolded the vast possibilities of this new enterprise before them, was in any sense an index of the interest that men are to take in this work all over the country, it is a movement that is long overdue, and one that is fraught with advantages to our work in general that are almost incalculable.

In surrendering his place among us in order to give himself to the larger interests to which he goes as the secretary of this new brotherhood idea, Brother Macfarlane leaves behind him, not only in the annals of his beloved Alameda Church, but in the larger annals of our whole Pacific coast work as well, a wealth of blessed memories.

It is with a genuine sense of loss that we see him go, and yet recognizing that in giving him up from this immediate field, we are "casting bread upon the waters" in the interests of a cause that knows no locality distinctions, we send him on his way—the Lord's own way.

We follow him with our prayers. He will be a mighty factor in swinging into coöperation the masculine energy of this whole Pacific coast country.

THE BEST DAYS OF ALL.

Thomas Curtis Clark.

These are the best days!
Stars were never brighter,
Hearts were never lighter,
Songs of birds and rippling brooklets
  Never were more sweet;
There were never fairer flowers
  Than those at our feet
In these fair days, these rare days,
  The best days of all!

These are the best days!
Skies were never bluer,
Friends were never truer;
There was never less of sorrow,
  More of joy and song.
Than we find beside our pathway
  As we trudge along
In these fair days, these rare days,
  The best days of all!

"THE LITTLE BLUE SHOE."

By Eva M. Turner.

The little blue shoes stood on the edge of the white ruffled dressing table in Rosalind's room. Rosalind was only seven, and blue shoes had been her "very hardest wish" every since mama had finished the dainty blue dress that was to be Rosalind's very best, to be worn only on great occasions. It was Aunt Margaret who had played the good fairy and had made "the very hardest wish" come true.

Only the day before the postman had brought the white package and the little note that told how the little blue shoes were for Rosalind's birthday and how she was to come to Wildwood to spend that day.

Now, no Auntie was ever quite so dear as Aunt Margaret and no place more delightful than her home at Wildwood—Wildwood, where there was not only Aunt Margaret, and Uncle Harry, who always had funny surprises in his coatpocket, but also a troop of merry cousins, and Bob, the pony, and Nigger Dick the dog who could do tricks and—but there is no use trying to tell all there was at Wildwood to make glad days for little people, especially if they were having a birthday.

It was now only two days until that happy day, and Rosalind had taken the shoes out of their dainty wrappings and had left them on the edge of the dressing table, and it was there that baby Harold spied them.

"Pity sho, pity sho," he said, and took one in his little rosy-palmed hand. Because it looked so pretty, Baby thought that it must be good to eat, so he bit the toe and tried each glossy button; but he wasn't at all satisfied with the taste, and carried the new plaything away into the dining room. A little wren, lighting for an instant on the ledge of an open window, attracted his attention and he ran to look out at it. The window was over the basement, and was framed in a heavy growth of vines. A saucy robin was busy helping his mate build a nest in the grape arbor. Little Jarold, resting his elbows on the broad sill of the window watched the happy birds with wide wondering eyes. At last he reached as far out as he could, thinking perhaps that he might reach them. He could not reach, but it was far enough to allow the little blue shoe to slip from the chubby fingers and fall outside.

When Rosalind came from school she soon discovered her loss and began to search. The next day the whole family joined in the hunt, Baby Harold following everywhere, looking very wise and saying, "Pity sho, pity sho." But all these searchings proved in vain. Rosalind was in tears and only the thought of the day at Wildwood and the hope that the precious shoe might be found, consoled her. But the long dreamed of day passed and the weeks went by, until the summer was gone and autumn had come, and still little blue shoe in the dainty tissue-lined box waited in vain for its mate.

One golden September day Rosalind was helping herself to the grapes that hung in purple clusters in the arbor. Jack Frost had been hard at work, and the leaves, crimson-yellow and brown, were falling about the little girl as she climbed to reach the finest clusters. Mama, sitting at the open dining room window, spoke a word of caution to the little climber. As Rosalind glanced upward toward her mother, she gave a little cry of surprise and delight, "Mamma, mamma," she called, "There is my little blue shoe," and sure enough there in the vines below the window hung the lost shoe. It had been hidden by the leaves since that spring day when Baby Harold had let it fall from the window. With the aid of the rake, Rosalind soon had the long lost shoe in her hand and when she looked into it, she was indeed surprised; for there inside the little rain-stained shoe was a tiny wren's nest.

The nest had long been empty, but Rosalind remembered the wrens that had darted about the window and had often wondered where their nest was hidden. When she recalled the sweet songs and thought how her little shoe had been such a safe cozy shelter for the little brown feathered singers she forgot to be sorry that it had ever been lost.

The Children's Pulpit

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER.

THE LITTLE SQUIRREL.

The little squirrel built a hole way down in a tree. For winter was coming on and the cold wind would go through even his warm coat of fur. Only the other day Jack Frost had been out and touched all the leaves with his icy finger. And the leaves had shivered and curled up, and turned a golden brown. Then they had decided to leave the branches where the wind blew so, and down they came in a shower to the ground.

The little squirrel saw it was time to go to work laying away his winter food. So he went rustling among the leaves which were hugging the earth trying to keep warm. Here and there he gathered nuts in his smooth, sharp teeth and piled them away in the hollow tree. Then when the wintry January days came on he nestled down in the heart of the tree and had his breakfast, dinner and supper all right there. The little squirrel must have gotten tired gathering nuts just one at a time, but he was a wise squirrel. He knew that in the winter every nut would count.

The little squirrel teaches every boy and girl that we ought to gather up small sums of money and save them for future use. One gets tired gathering pennies. It takes so long. But some day, if we keep adding them one at a time, there will be a great heap of them, and we will have them to buy useful things for ourselves, and best of all, for other people too.

Two school text books have come to the office of the Foreign Society from Bolenge press, on the Congo. They were printed and bound by the Christian boys. One of these books is a translation of the Epistle to the Collossians. The translations were made by Dr. and Mrs. Dye.

Leslie Wolfe, missionary of the Foreign Society at Manila has a class of eleven boys that he is training for preachers. He regards it as a most encouraging sign for our work that so many young men are anxious to prepare themselves to preach the Gospel. He is enthusiastic over the work in and about Manila.

Wings of a Dove.

At sunset, when the rosy light was dying,
  Far down the pathway of the West,
I saw a lonely dove in silence flying
  To be at rest.
"Pilgrim of air!" I cried, "could I but borrow
  Thy wandering wings, thy freedom blest,
I'd fly away from every careful sorrow,
  And find my rest."
But when the dusk a filmy veil was weaving,
  Back came the dove to seek her nest
Deep in the forest, where her mate was grieving—
  There was true rest.
Peace, heart of mine! no longer sigh to wander:
  Lose not thy life in fruitless quest,
There are no happy islands over yonder;
  Come home and rest.

—Henry Van Dyke.

WITH THE WORKERS

C. H. Altheide may be addressed at Marshall, Mo., for meetings during February.

H. H. Harmon, pastor at Lincoln, Neb., delivered a lecture at Wayne, Kan., recently.

Dean L. Bond, Atlanta, Ga., has entered upon his new work with the church at Mariette.

The Sunday-school of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., is pushing hard for an attendance of 600.

C. E. Mack, pastor, is doing the preaching, and Chas. E. McVey is singing in the meeting at Atlantic, Iowa.

The Sunday-school of the church at East Columbus, Ind., has doubled its attendance in the past six weeks.

The church at Mason City, Iowa, G. E. Roberts, pastor, will hold a meeting during the month of February.

The church at Lincoln, Nebraska, is rejoicing over being able to occupy the basement of their new building.

Thos. J. Thompson has closed his work at Pekin, Ill., and is located at Carthage. He is available for a few meetings.

Here comes the suggestion that there be badges for those going to the Pittsburg Centennial Celebration. "Where the Scriptures Speak, etc.," is suggested.

The young people of the church at Richland Center, Wisconsin, where F. M. McHale is the pastor, have organized "The Gleaners" to serve in the social, charitable, and Missionary work of the church.

David H. Shields, who has since his graduation from Eureka College thirteen years ago, been pastor of the church at Salina, Kansas, delivered the educational address at Eureka College a few days ago.

L. J. Marshall has been given a leave of absence by his church at Independence, Mo. He has gone to Orlando, Fla., on account of his wife's health, where he will remain for a time in the hope of securing her recovery.

A new church building, with class rooms, Sunday-school auditorium and main auditorium, has just been completed at Stafford, Kansas, and will be dedicated the first Sunday in February, with Geo. L. Snively in charge of the services. Ben D. Gillespie is the successful pastor.

R. A. Long, Kansas City, Mo., comes forward with the offer to give $50,000 to the Bible College, Columbia, Mo., provided an equal amount be raised by October 1. The State University is a most fruitful field for religious education, and we believe the Disciples will make it possible for our Bible College to have this additional $100,000 endowment.

Our pages are so crowded this week with other things that pressed for utterance that we have had to postpone the beginning of our serial story until next week. "Winston of the Prairies" is the name of it and Harold Binaloss the author. We have been to great pains to procure this high grade story from the owners of the copyright (The F. A. Stokes Company) and congratulate ourselves that we are now able to present it to our readers. In our next issue Professor J. W. McGarvey will answer the question, "Why do I say that it is silly to affirm that Moses wrote the last chapter of Deuteronomy?" Dr. Gates will make some interesting comments on Professor McGarvey's statements.

TELEGRAMS

Bloomfield, Iowa, January 25, 1909.—In third week of big meeting here. Fifty-four to date. Many men. People turned away. Ferrall fine pastor. Garmong splendid singer. Whole country aroused. Bruce Brown.

Des Moines, Iowa, Jan. 24-25, 1909.—Fifty added at Central today, 174 last week, 516 in twenty days of invitation. Three mass meetings today. 914 in Sunday-school, no invitation given in Sunday-school. Building packed at Womans' meeting this afternoon. Mammoth meeting for men only tonight. Meeting surpasses all records for soul winning in Des Moines for some length of time. Scoville and helpers by invitation are addressing all sorts of shops and factories, police force, fire department and street car men. Address marvelously impressive service in largest saloon in city Thursday night. Des Moines is witnessing a great awakening. We thank God and press on to larger victories. Finis Idelman, Pastor.

Marshall, Mo., Jan. 24-25, 1909.—Fourteen added today, fifty-three to date. For Marshall, so thoroughly churched, this is a great meeting. Evangelists George L. Snively and Singer Altheide preaching to packed houses nightly. We continue.

B. L. Wharton, Minister.

Dixon, Ill., Jan. 24-25, 1909.—House packed at second men's meeting and eleven added, twenty-nine during the day, one hundred and twenty-five to date. Scores turned away at many of the services. The whole city is aroused. William J. Lockhart and Lintt have laid hold of the hearts of the entire city and are ranked by many as the greatest evangelistic team that ever visited Dixon, William Sunday not excepted.

A. B. Spicer.

Rensselaer, Ind., Jan. 24-25, 1909.—Pending quarantine at Rushville came here at one days' notice. Glorious meeting from first. In two weeks' we have 113, twenty-three today. Business men unanimously close stores early for our meeting. Audiences often majority men. Scores turned away. George H. Clark and his people wanted a meeting. My every wish has been zealously followed. There is no nobler band. This meeting being unexpected must close to start at Rushville, Indiana, next Thursday, where Richard Abberley is making great preparations. Herbert Yeuell.

Columbus, Ohio, Jan. 24-25, 1909.—Great meeting today. Largest Bible school in history of organization by over one hundred. Eleven baptisms tonight. Our immense building packed full of people. We continue with Brooks Bros. leading.

Walter Scott Priest.

Fort Wayne, Ind. Third Church. Best attendance in B. S. last Sunday. Cannot longer work for numbers. All available space filled. One hundred in a Bible Training class meeting Wednesday afternoon. Three added Sunday night, making ten since last report. Fourteen added to C. W. B. M. in last two meetings. W. P. Shomhart in great meeting at the Second Church. Likens helping as singer. H. E. The Board of Trustees of Eureka College met in the parlors of the Central Church, Peoria, Ill., January 20. It is said by one who has been on the board for a long time to have been the best meeting of the board for several years.

C. J. Burkhart has just closed his work at Connersville, Ind. His last month of work there has been in many respects the most fruitful of his ministry with the church. There have been many additions to the church at regular services.

M. A. Hart has served for one year and three months as pastor of the church at Columbia, Mo. During this time there have been 199 additions to the church; $2,150 has been contributed to missions and benevolences, and every department of the church is doing excellent work.

The Central Church, Warren, Ohio, is in a good meeting. The pastor, J. E. Lynn, is doing the preaching, and Miss Anderson, of Springfield, Ill., is singing to the delight of the community. There were more than five hundred in attendance at the Sunday-school, the first Sunday of the meeting,

The Sunday-school of the Second Church, Warren, Ohio, is in a flourishing condition. Here is their report for January 10th: Attendance: Officers and teachers, 30; Primary Dept. pupils, 84; Intermediate and Senior pupils, 178; new pupils, 11; visitors, 1; total, 304. Offering: Primary Dept., $1.12; Intermediate and Senior, $5.47; total, $6.59.

In the formal installation service of William L. Fisher as pastor of the Fifty-sixth St. Church, New York, the welcome on behalf of the pastors was given by S. T. Willis; on behalf of the Missionary Union, Herbert Martin; charge to the congregation, L. N. D. Wells; charge to the minister, J. R. Lichtenberger. John L. Darsie presided at the meeting.

Atlanta, Ill.—Christian church observed Education Day very fittingly by having Pres. R. E. Hieronymus, of Eureka College, come and present the claims of Eureka and the work of Illinois Christian Education Association. To the large list of names already enrolled in the membership of the Association from Atlanta church, others were added, and an offering was taken also. Ralph V. Callaway is the minister.

WITH THE WORKERS

The church at Kaufman, Texas, is without a pastor.

The church at Cherokee, Okla., is without a minister.

A student preacher is wanted by the church at Harper, Kansas.

J. W. Marshall will hold a meeting at Italy, Texas, in March.

The churches of Oregon are working hard for the steamer for the Congo work.

The church at Wheeling, N. C., is in a successful meeting, with J. A. Hopkins as evangelist.

A. R. Spicer and W. J. Lockhart, evangelists, report a very successful work in their meeting at Dixon, Ill.

The church at Lampasas, Texas, where E. L. Bradley ministers, made a good offering to the cause of education.

The Carolina Evangel publishes a list of the churches and Sunday-schools of the state and their apportionment to state missions.

The Second Church, Warren, Ohio, has installed a new individual communion service. It was a present from the Sunday-school.

F. H. Groom, minister of the Central church, Tacoma, Wash., writes encouragingly of the outlook for 1909, in the rapidly growing city of the northwest.

Perry Gross will assist the church at Belton, Texas, in a meeting during February. L. W. Ogle will lead the singing. W. M. Williams is the pastor.

J. T. Ogle is beginning his fifth years' service with the church at Paris, Texas. The church is harmonious and pastor and people are happy in their relationship.

Otis Hawkins, lately of Lake Charles, La., has become pastor of the church at Denton, Texas, and will make a valuable addition to the preaching force of the state.

J. Fred Jones, Illinois secretary, dedicated the new church at Saybrook, Ill., January 3rd. H. L. Maltman is minister, and the church is being assisted in a meeting by W. H. Robertson of Colfax, Ill.

The church at Okmulgee, Okla., is taking on new life under the leadership of B. F. Hill. The Sunday-school has more than doubled its attendance. The church which is but four years old has a membership of 315.

F. W. Norton will spend most of February in Illinois in the interest of the Wharton Memorial Home. He is to speak on Sundays at Jacksonville, Bloomington and Champaign. More than $1,000 has recently been contributed to this work by its friends in Kentucky.

Central Church at Warren, Ohio, where J. E. Lynn ministers, observed Educational Day and raised $450 toward the endowment of Hiram College. Mr. Lynn is holding his own meeting during January, with Miss Edith Anderson, of Springfield, Ill., as special soloist. Her splendid singing and winning personality has captivated the community.

The Illinois Christian News for January gives its entire space to the Interests of Eureka College. It contains a message from President Hieronymus; one on "Lida Wood's Eureka Home for Young Ladies," by Prof. Jones; "The Church of Christ and Eureka College," by H. H. Peters, Field Secretary, with a page of encouraging words from many former students and friends of the institution. This is the day of great interest to the college.

The church at Larned, Kansas, is without a pastor.

G. W. Weimer is the new pastor at Blackwell, Okla.

R. E. L. Prunty becomes pastor of the church at LaBelle, Mo.

J. N. Cloe, Donovan, Ill., has accepted a call to the church at Kentland, Ind.

W. B. Crewdson, of Salida, Colo., is in a meeting with the church at Oakland, Ia.

Allen Wilson is in a meeting at Winchester, Ill., Lew D. Hill is the pastor.

The new church building at Findlay, Ill., was dedicated by L. L. Carpenter, Jan 25th.

The First Church, San Antonio, Texas, has called D. F. Bradford, of Val Alstine to become their pastor.

The church at Medicine Lodge, Kansas, has called C. H. Brown to become its pastor, and he has accepted.

Frank E. Mallory, who has for fifteen Topeka, Kansas, has accepted a call to the church at Parsons, Kans.

O. E. Hamilton and F. Thomas recently closed a meeting with the Central Avenue Church, North Topeka, Kansas.

J. M. Kersey has closed his work at Parsons, Kans., and entered upon his service with the First Church, Omaha, Neb.

J. A. Ragan, who has eight years been pastor at Sacramento, Calif., has accepted a call to the First Church, Portland, Ore. His work at Sacramento was most successful.

C. C. Hill, for the past four years pastor of the church at Roswell, N. M., has been elected Superintendent of schools for Cha- County. He will give not up the ministry but in addition to his school work will preach twice a month for the church at Carsbad.

Last week the Foreign Society received another pledge of $500 for the new Bible College at Vigan, Philippine Islands, and a direct gift of $100 from a friend in Colorado, which is to be applied on the college at Bolenge.

The Christian Union, Des Moines, Ia., pubpushed last week a history of the Central Church of that city, where Charles Reign Scoville is in a meeting. It was in 1864 that twenty Disciples met in a little room over a pork packing house on the east bank bf the Des Moines river, and formed the first organization of Disciples in the city. In 1864 J. E. Gaston, of Princeton. Ill., was called as pastor. The first church building was where the Union R. R. Station now stands. With the coming of the railroads in 1875, this was abandoned, and the church purchased a property of the Old School Presbyterian Church. Then D. R. Lucas held a meeting which so increased the membership of the church that additional room had to be built. The present building was begun in 1889. The church and grounds cost approximately $100,000. Large meetings have been held by D. R. Lucas, 1875; Prof. Black, 1889; later Updike and Easton. Then by Charles Reign Scoville. The pastors have been J. E. Gaston, 1864-67; A. I. Hobbs, 1867-71; Jno. Encell, 1871-72; J. C. Hay, 1873-75; J. W. Morse, 1775-76; D. R. Lucas, 1876-81; B. J. Radford 1881-83; H. P. Cobb, 1883-84; H. O. Breeden, 1885-1906; Finis Idleman 1906. This church may well be called "The Mother Church," for from it have come the eight other prosperous churches churches which we now have in Des Moines.

J. A. Shoptaugh is doing successful work with the church at Anthony, Kansas.

The church at Fort Scott, Kansas, is in a meeting led by the pastor, D. N. Manley.

The church in Texas will co-operate with the National Benevolent Association and erect a home for the aged in Dallas, as one of Texas' Centennial gifts.

The following series of sermons announced by T. S. Tinsley, Shelbyville, Ky., are worthy of thought:

"The Battle Front of Faith Today."

"A series of Sunday Night sermons offered as 'Helps to Faith' to such as may have honest thought struggles, and who weel a deep desire to be true and consistent and strong.

" 'Heresy'—Disease Germs in the Soul. Text—'A man that is a heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject.' Titus 3:10. Imagery—'A sick man with head downward.'

" 'Orthodoxy'—What is Right in Religion. Text—'Hold fast the form of sound words, which thou hast heard of me.' 2 Tim. 1:13. Imagery—'A man overboard holding the rescue rope.'

" 'Critcism'—Seeking Original Words of Inspiration. Text—'Prove all things; hold fast that which is good.' 2 Thess. 5:21. Imagery—'A man with crucible in a laboratory.'

" 'Miracles'—God's Work Above the Plain of Our Sense. Text—'God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles.' Heb. 2:4. Imagery—'A man touching an electrical botton.'

" 'Inspiration' — God's Spirit Breathing Through Men.' Text—'Not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Spirit teacheth.' 1 Cor. 21:3. Imagery—'A man with a tongue of flame on his head.' "

JOY WORK

And the Other Kind.

Did you ever stand on a prominent corner at an early morning hour and watch the throngs of people on their way to work? Noting the number who were forcing themselves along because it meant their daily bread, and the others cheerfully and eagerly pursuing their way because of love of their work?

It is a fact that one's food has much to do with it. As an example:

If an engine has poor oil, or a boiler is fired with poor coal, a bad result is certain, isn't it?

Treating your stomach right is the keystone that sustains the arch of health's temple and you will find "Grape-Nuts" as a daily food is the most nourishing and beneficial you can use.

We have thousands of testimonials, real genuine little heart throbs, from people who simply tried Grape-Nuts out of curiosity—as a last resort—with the result that prompted the testimonial.

If you have never tried Grape-Nuts it's worth while to give it a fair, impartial trial. Remember there are millions eating Grape-Nuts every day—they know, and we know if you will use Grape-Nuts every morning your work is more likely to be joy-work, because you can keep well, and with the brain well nourished work is a joy. Read the "Road to Wellville" in every package—"There's a Reason."

A CHURCH AND A BRAVE PREACHER.

In the spring election of 1907, and again in 1908 under the new Local Option law, the issue of saloon or no saloon was carried against the saloon in Champaign and Urbana; thirty-five saloons were closed, the first victory of such proportions in Illinois. Our church work is situated in the district where the two cities meet, and one which had been for years, at the time of the beginning of our activity six years ago, a chief saloon stronghold. Our church membership grew from a discouraged band of 200 to 1,000 aggressive workers within the period of 1903 to 1907. The saloon crowd has blamed us bitterly for ruining their business. Events show that when the count was in, both Champaign and Urbana were lost to temperance until the one time notorious second ward was heard from in Champaign, and the third ward in Urbana, the combined district in which our work is most effective. These wards, where the political bosses had always counted upon corrupting a considerable part of the student vote, and in which their henchmen had had the strongest hold, had committed the unpardonable sin of going dry so overwhelmingly that they turned the tide in the aggregate vote, and saloons and saloon dominance were at an end in the Twin Cities. In all this contest our minister, Bro. Stephen E. Fisher, was among the foremost as leader and organizer. The saloon interests have charged him with the responsibility, and have covertly sworn revenge.

During the recent general campaign Bro. F. B. Vennum, prohibition candidate for the legislature, published in the interests of his candidacy the "Lincoln Way." Bro. Fisher, together with two other prominent temperance workers were the literature committee of the party, locally. The saloon crowd of the Champaign city council pounced upon some of Bro. Vennum's utterances in this paper. He and all the committee were haled before the grand jury, and on January 15 an indictment was issued charging Bro. Vennum and Bro. Fisher with criminal libel. The animus of the whole matter is revealed when, after Bro. Vennum had sworn that no member of the committee was responsible for the utterances of the paper, a single member of the committee, Bro. Fisher should be singled out as their target; this action becomes the more transparent when it is noted that both the accused men are leaders in this church whose influence these enemies seek to destroy. Bro. Fisher had been warned before the grand jury convened that forces were seeking to manipulate its members to the end that this very result would ensue. Thus the old saloon forces are making one last desperate stand; they are seeking to overpower opposition by their old methods of vituperation and character blackening. Public indignation runs high; it is common belief that this move precipitates a fight which will end in the eradication of the last vestige of the saloon regime in the city halls of both cities. Mr. Vennum is traveling in Cuba; the most prominent men of the two cities, including Urbana's local-option mayor, W. S. Love, are on Bro. Fisher's bond. Our board of elders send these clippings and this explanatory note that you may make whatever use of them you think the interests of righteousness may justify.

Sincerely,
George R. Shawhan,
Secretary Board of Elders.

BY WAY OF THE CROSS.

Ministry.

The pastor sat with his head bowed low,
And his soul surcharged with prayer,
That the needs of the people he might touch,
And the message of God might bear.
And the sermon he wrote throbbed full of fire
For his heart's life blood was there.

The people sat in the hush of his spell,
To the weary he brought rest
And sweet peace found its way to troubled souls
And the sin-sick found God's way best.
And 'twas only the narrow, cynical few
His theology put to test.

But never a prayer did the critic pray
For pastor or message on that day.

Gethsemane.

Again the pastor sat bowed in prayer
And his soul was torn with pain
And his sorrowful eyes and tense drawn lines
Of his face, revealed again
That each throb, throb, throb of his breaking heart
Was for people he loved in vain.

'Tis human to love that child of thine,
But pastor for church bears love divine.

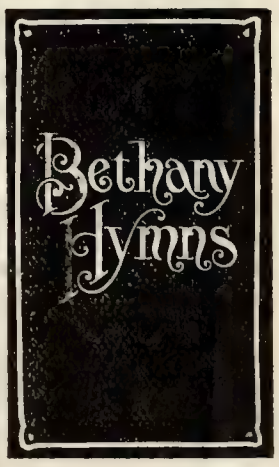
Betrayal.

But out on the street with holy mien
And air of righteous fervor
The critic, in the guise of friend,
The Church's life preserver,
Sowed seeds of doubt and discontent,
Shrewd hid from the observer.

And the imps of Satan laughed with glee
And danced all over his dignity.

Calvary.

Alone in his study the pastor stood,
For the critic had just gone,
And his pain-sad eyes were full of tears
For he knew that his work was done.
The critic had won,—for the pastor's friends
Had left him to fight alone.



And the imps of Satan shrieked with glee
And rejoiced at the critic's victory.

But weary and troubled and sin-sick souls
Missed the strength of his Christly life,
And the righteous longed for his fearless aid,
In a place where sin was rife.
And 'twas only the critics rejoiced with the imps
At the outcome of the strife.

The pastor went forth under Heaven's dome,
But the way of the cross leads home.

—Mary E. Blair.

A. McLean's New Book Free

Our proposal to give a copy of A. McLean's new book on "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher" with each new subscription of $1.50 has proved so attractive that we have decided to continue it beyond the date (January 2), which we had set for its expiration. During February the offer will hold good. Ministers may have the paper (new subscription), and the book for $1.20.

Annual Reports

Grand Rapids, Mich.

Lyon St. Church raised for all purposes $5,000, an average of $25 per member. Additions, 80, net gain, 67. Added elsewhere, 45. Bible school attendance doubled. C. E. grew from a membership of 28 to 80.—E. B. Barnes, Pastor.

Du Quoin, Ill.

Main St. Christian Church. There were 193 additions during 1908. The church raised for all purposes over $2,600. The Bible school had an average attendance of 324, and raised over $600. The church as a whole had the best year in its history. We began a meeting January 7.—Geo. W. Wise, pastor.

Prosser, N. M.

Doubled the membership in our regular work here last year. At the beginning of our second year thirty-two have been added the first month, in a meeting led by S. W. Jackson. Our membership, our service, our Bible school are all in the lead now.

Lee Ferguson, Pastor.

Warren Ohio.

Central Church raised during 1908, for local work, $5,488.69; for missions, $1,790.29, making a total of $7,278.98. There were 103 additions to the church, 76 of these by baptism.

Seventh Street Church, Richmond Virginia.

The Seventh Street Church, H. D. C. MacLachlan, pastor, has issued a twelve page "Annual Statement." It is the most comprehensive and complete report that has come to our desk. It contains reports of the Church Clerk and Treasurer, Financial Secretary, the Relief Committee, Ladies' Aid Society the "Circles," C. W. B. M., Young Men's Missionary Society, Young Women's Missionary Society, the Sunday-school, the Sunday-school classes, and the report of the pastor. From these pages we glean the following facts: Present membership, 648; collections: for current expense $5,073.93, for debt $1,076.00, for missions $1,094.17, for relief work $924.10, by the Ladies' Aid Society $715.29, by the C. W. B. M. $425.25; by the Young Men's Missionary Society (104 members) $215.25; by the Young Women's Missionary Society $53.70; by the Sunday-school $1,098.14. The Sunday-school enrollment is 337 as against 275 when the school was reorganized last October. The Pastor's Bible class had an enrollment of forty-five. H. D. C. MacLachlan has been with the church but ten months. During that time there have been twenty-five additions to the church. Nearly $3,100 has been raised for missions and the church support two "Living Link" missionaries—W. Remfrey Hunt in China, and T. J. Shuey in Seattle, Washington. New stained glass windows have been put in, the lecture room has been remodeled on strictly modern lines, and electric lighting installed. "The greatest advance has been in the Sunday-school, which has since October been placed on a thoroughly graded basis with results gratifying beyond expectation. Separate class rooms have been provided, and a modern equipment of maps, black-boards, etc., is being purchased as funds will permit. Within the last six Sundays there has been an increase of nearly seventy to the roll of the school. There are four organized adult classes, containing in the aggregate 150 members." This is one of the best reports we have seen and is worthy of study.

MISSIONARY NOTES.

W. M. White, Mexico, Mo., speaking of their March offering, says: "Together with our Bible School we expect to become a Livink-link in the Foreign Society this year.

Edgar S. Potter, Quincy, Ill., referring to preparation for a Missionary Rally says: "We propose to keep this fight up until Quincy shall be landed in the Living-link ranks."

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty days of January amounted to $4,949, a gain of $3,538 over the corresponding time, 1908. The receipts from October 1, 1908 to January 20, 1909 amount to $19,962, a gain of $9,491, or about 90 per cent. The prospects for a good year were never brighter. Let the friends not be over confident, however, but press the claims of the work upon the hearts and consciences of the churches with increased zeal and faithfulness.

The Foreign Society, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio is ready to send all necessary March Offering supplies, free of charge, to every church. It is important that supplies be ordered at once.

The growing church at Elyria, Ohio, John P. Sala, minister, becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society.

We must be a missionary people if we are to be really Bible people. Where the Bible speaks we speak. Upon no other one subject do the Scriptures speak with more clearness and distinctness than upon the subject of world-wide missions. Let us bear this in mind during these days of preparation for the March Offering.

A brother in California has made a bequest to the Foreign Society, amounting to $5,200. The liberality of the California brotherhood reflects a deep and vital interest in world-wide missions.

G. H. Watters, California, gives $5,000 on the Annuity Plan to aid in the establishment of a new Mission Station in the Congo Free State. Besides this, he supports a missionary himself on the foreign field.

L. W. McCreary, minister of the Hamilton Avenue Church, St. Louis, Mo. writes the Foreign Society as follows: "I am glad to report to you that the Committee appointed by our Board to bring recommendations to the church at our annual meeting of such work as ought to be undertaken for this year, recommended among other things that we become a Living-link in the Foreign Society. You may safely count on us for $500."

The churches must make careful preparation, as the approaching March Offering for Foreign Missions is a worthy one. The needs and importance of the work must be faithfully presented. The Foreign Society now has a larger army of workers to support at this time than ever before in its history. The work is being enlarged in every direction.

GLASSES UNNECESSARY.

Eye Strain Relieved by Quitting Coffee.

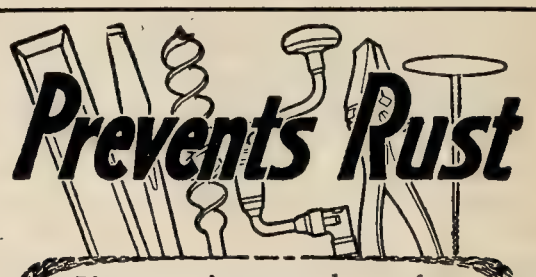
Many cases of defective vision are caused by the habitual use of coffee.

It is said that in Arabia where coffee is used in large quantities, many lose their eyesight at about fifty.

A N. J. woman writes to the point concerning eye trouble and coffee. She says:

"My son was for years troubled with his eyes. He tried several kinds of glasses without relief. The optician said there was a defect in his eyes which was hard to reach.

"He used to drink coffee, as we all did, and finally quit it, and began to use Postum. That was three years ago and he has not had to wear glasses and has had no trouble with his eyes since.



"I was always fond of tea and coffee, and finally became so nervous I could hardly sit still long enough to eat a meal. My heart was in such a condition I thought I might die at any time.

"Medicine did not give me any relief and I was almost desperate. It was about this time we decided to quit coffee and use Postum, and have used it ever since. I am in perfect health. No trouble now with my heart and never felt better in my life.

"Postum has been a great blessing to us all, particularly to my son and myself."

Proceedings of the Baptist Congress

AT CHICAGO, 1908

THE last Baptist Congress was a notable one in many ways. The movement for union among the three great branches of the church is in itself deeply significant; but aside from this, the topics discussed were of such vital interest, and the speakers so well known, that all intelligent church members will wish to possess the complete proceedings of the meetings. The University of Chicago Press has arranged to furnish them at the low price of 59 cents postpaid.

RICHLAND CENTER, WIS

The church at Footville where J. H. Bullock ministers, had a neat little house of four apartments and I was assisting there in an interesting meeting Sunday afternoon, January 10, when the fire alarm startled the little town and the church was discovered to be on fire. It was impossible to save anything and the buildings and contents were totally destroyed. The loss was about $4,000, and $1,800 insurance partially covers the loss. The Methodists kindly offered their building and we occupied it for two evenings. Under the leadership of Mr. Bullock the church will rebuild. F. M. McHale.

TEXAS NOTES

The Gulf District held a good convention at San Antonio January 9-12. There was a good number of delegates in attendance, some having come as much as two hundred miles—for this one district is as large as Rhode Island, Connecticut, Delaware and Alabama. One of the memorable things will be the announcement that the little new church will receive assistance till it gets a good start. They were to choose a lot at once and have called a minister for full time.

J. C. Mason was on his way to Monterey, Mexico, to hold a meeting for our English church there. Leroy Anderson from Dallas will go to lead the singing.

The State Board recently voluntarily raised Mr. Mason's salary to the extent of $300, commanding that it should not be put back into the work, and that he should take a real vacation.

Colby Hall, who has done such splendid work for Texas Christian University, has accepted the call to become minister to the University Church in North Waco. A happier arrangement could not well have been made.

Mr. Hawkins, from Lake Charles, La., has accepted a call to the church at Denton. Mr. Owen Livengood will come to the church at Forney.

The state secretary says that a hundred preachers have been brought into Texas from the outside in the past year, and that Texas has lost only ten to the outside.

J. C. Kern from Illinois is expected in Austin to take charge the first of February. During January the elders are to do the preaching.

The members at Central San Antonio surprised Mr. Cleaver on his birthday with many beautiful gifts, one of which was sixty-six dimes.

All eyes are centering toward the Waco Institute and Lectureship. A convention of the District fits in between.

The C. W. B. M. auxiliary at Greenville has grown from a membership of fourteen to one of eighty-six in less than a year and a half.

The beautiful new Bible Choir buildings at Texas State University are nearing completion. These buildings are on the corner just opposite the main school building and attract the attention of all who visit the public buildings of Austin.

COVENANT MEETING

On January 1 the church at Lewiston, Ill., held a covenant meeting on the plan originated by Chas. M. Fillmore and the Hillside church, Indianapolis. The meeting proved to be one of the most devotional and delightful in the history of the church. They used the "Covenant Service" prepared by Mr. Fillmore. The pastor, Walter Kline, testifies that the people enter into the spirit of this service and appreciate it remarkably. For annual meetings it is certainly just the thing. Mr. Fillmore will send a copy to anyone sending postage for it. Every minister will find it worth while to send for a copy for examination.

H. F. Kern, a student of Christian University, Canton, Mo., is now ministering to the congregation at Nichols and Atalissa, Iowa. He just closed a short meeting at Atalissa with six additions to the church.

H. A. Denton, of Cincinnati, Ohio, will dedicate the new house of worship at West Rupert, Vermont, February 3, 1909. This is a beautiful rock-faced marble edifice costing about $10,000. F. Richard Eaton is the pastor.

Evangelist Geo. L. Snively is in a good meeting at Marshall, Mo., with B. L. Wharton, pastor. Mr. Snively will dedicate the new church at Stafford, Kan., February 7. M. K. Milton is pastor there.

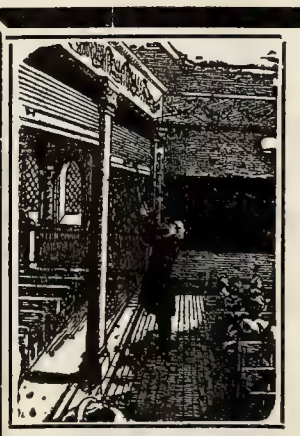
Pastor Craig of Ipala, Ill., has been called to the church at Hillsboro and will take up the work on March 1. The members of the Hillsboro church are expecting to build a new church house during the present year at a cost of about $10,000.

Charcoal Purifies Any Breath

And In Its Purest Form Has Long Been Known As the Greatest Gas Absorber.

Pure willow charcoal will oxidize almost any odor and render it sweet and pure. A panful in a foul cellar will absorb deadly fumes, for charcoal absorbs one hundred times its volume in gas.

The ancients knew the value of charcoal and administered it in cases of illness, especially pertaining to the stomach. In England today charcoal poultices are used for ulcers, boils, etc., while some physicians in Europe claim to cure many skin diseases by covering the afflicted skin with charcoal powder.



Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges go into the mouth and transfer foul odors at once into oxygen, absorb noxious gases and acids and when swallowed mix with the digestive juices and stop gas making, fermentation and decay.

By their gentle qualities they control beneficially bowel action and stop diarrhœa and constipation.

Bad breath simply cannot exist when charcoal is used. There are no ifs or ands about this statement. Don't take our word for it, but look into the matter yourself. Ask your druggist or physician, or better still, look up charcoal in your encyclopedia. The beauty of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges is that the highest pharmaceutical expert knowledge obtainable has been used to prepare a lozenge that will give to man tne best form of charcoal for use.

Pure willow and honey is the result. Two or three after meals and at bedtime sweeten the breath, stop decay of teeth, aid the digestive apparatus and promote perfect bowel action. They enrich the supply of oxygen to the system and thereby revivify the blood and nerves.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are sold everywhere in vast quantities, thus they must have merit. Every druggist carries them, price, twenty-five cents per box, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail, free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

THE SITUATION AT EUREKA.

The situation at Eureka is encouraging. Eureka College is entering upon a new era. We are nearing the end of the first semester with a good attendance and the students are working hard for an increase. The missionary spirit was never better. We have twenty-one in our student volunteer band preparing for missionary service. Dr. Royal Dyes' new home is almost ready for occupancy. We are to be blessed by the presence of his family while he is at work in Bolenge, Africa. Many of the Illinois churches are observing Education Day in the interest of Eureka College. We are expecting a good income from this source, and it can be used to an excellent advantage.

The field secretary's report for the first eleven months shows eighty-three churches visited; twenty-two conventions, institutes and rallies attended; 118 addresses delivered and more than 2,500 pieces of mail sent out. In addition to this work the Illinois Christian Association keeps a worker in the field all the time. Miss Cora Corrithers is doing this work very acceptably at present. She visits the churches in the interest of the college, secures new students, gets members for the I. C. E. A. and does many other things which will count finally in getting our work before the brotherhood of Illinois. All the forces are working together harmoniously.

But the big thing before us is our endowment proposition. We are raising $125,000 for Eureka College. We have given ourselves two years for this task, three if we need an extension of time. But we are not counting on needing it. We have been at this part of our work three months and have an excellent start. Many are waiting, however, until the movement gets a little more rapid. Here is one of the difficulties. But we have quite a number of good prospects and believe this year will be rich in its harvest for us. We are anxious to be in the line of march of our colleges toward better things.

H. H. Peters, Field Secretary.

A STATEMENT AND AN APPEAL.

The Missouri Christian Bible School Association has on its books over $500 in pledges for this year's work now due and unpaid. Because these have not been paid, we have had to borrow money with which to support our work. About 850 schools have sent us nothing this year, and collections are so slow that we are running behind. This is not just "make believe" talk, but an honest statement of facts.

Brethren, we cannot go on in this way without serious damage to this great work. All of our employes are working away diligently, doing their very best and waiting with what patience they can, a more liberal support of our work. We are going to continue to work with courage and hope, but I most earnestly appeal to every pastor, superintendent, teacher and member of every Sunday-school of our people in Missouri to see that the pledge made to our association for this year's work is paid up to date. You can afford to borrow a little money better than our association can afford to run deeply in debt. I mean every word of this appeal and statement in most dead earnest. Kindly attend to this today.

LOWELL'S THOUGHT OF GOD.

'Tis Sorrow builds the shining ladder up,
Whose golden rounds are our calamities,
Whereon our firm feet planting, nearer God
The spirit climbs, and hath its eyes unsealed.
True is it that Death's face seems stern and cold
When he is sent to summon those we love;
But all God's angels come to us disguised;
Sorrow and Sickness, Poverty and Death,
One after other lift their frowning masks,
And we behold the seraph's face beneath,
All radiant with the glory and the calm
Of having looked upon the front of God.
—James Russell Lowell.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL AS A PREACHER.

A. McLean's recent publication, "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," is a real Centennial contribution. The author was trained for the task. The book suggests the brevity of Holy Writ. Its grace and simplicity are charming. It is a marvel of compact power. The great preacher is sketched in large lines. The witness of distinguished men is placed in evidence—men who knew Campbell and heard his sermons. The critique on Mr. Campbell's style places his superiority in the clear presentation of truth with flawless logic and unrivaled power of persuasion, supported by a character illuminated with the Spirit of God. He lifted great audiences up because he lifted Christ up as the rallying point of all believers, and the Holy Scriptures as supreme over all human creeds and confessions and dogmas. "As all roads led to Rome, so all subjects were connected in his thought with Christ." The author's paragraph on Mr. Campbell's character and religious life is classic and of supreme excellence.

Every home in the brotherhood should possess this book, and the Centennial Committee should distribute it far and wide to the ministry of our religious neighbors.

A Plea for the Regnancy of Love

W. T. Moore has written a book with a message in it.

He has written several books. His "Preacher Problems" was such a concrete precipitant of a long and rich experience in the pastoral ministry that it has had a creditable sale among men who are meeting these problems every day. But we do not find a great message in that book. It is practical—one might say pragmatic. It helps a preacher to get along as sign boards help the traveler. But sign boards do not make the traveler travel. He must have a cause in his heart that urges him onward.

"Man Preparing for other Worlds" is another of W. T. Moore's books. This book we understand is not so widely read as "Preacher Problems." Dr. Moore says himself it is not an easy book to read. It assumes in the reader a pretty good equipment of knowledge to begin with. Consequently, while the book has received commendatory notices from the critics both in America and in England, it is not read widely by the public. We confess that we were not greatly interested in it. The argument was too close-woven for us to be satisfied the case had been proved. We are slow to accept a position for which there is no proof except logic. We find that our mind works in this order: first an insight or a strong conviction that something is true, and after that the proof. We see with our heart first and then the head comes along to prop up the conviction of the heart. This is our way of getting at truth. We may be queer, but we must be honest.

Now we cannot work up any insight or spontaneous conviction concerning the possibility of man's inhabiting the other heavenly bodies after he leaves this earth. And so any argument from proof texts or philosophy does not grip our editorial soul very firmly. We do not think that book didn't sell because it was too deep, but because it wasn't written upon a theme that the human soul is interested in.

We well remember another book of this author. It was a sweet little book. He called it "Views of Life." It was one of the earliest serious books we ever read and our mind has ever recognized an unpaid debt to the author.

But here at our hand is a book with one of the most fascinating titles that could be conceived and we say of it that it differs from the first two books mentioned because it has a vital, spiritual message, just such a message as this man should deliver to his brethren before the veil is drawn between him and us. It differs from the first book in that it has a message, and from the second in that its message is vital. It differs from the third book, which, we presume, was the author's earliest endeavor in literature, as the root differs from the flowers. What Dr. Moore has done is to dig down carefully under those sweet flowers called "Views of Life" and reveal to us the root from which they grew.

And this root is love.

"The Supremacy of the Heart; or a Plea for the Regnancy of Love," that is the prepossessing title his new volume assumes.

We think there is much significance in the fact that a man like W. T. Moore should write a book like this. A man who was all heart and no head might prate about the supremacy of the heart till doomsday and no one would take his judgment into account. But here is a soul in which the head and heart have no doubt been in conflict. So when he uses the word "supremacy" he means something. He doesn't say superiority; he says supremacy, which probably implies that in his soul's experience there has been strain and struggle and a life-long wrestle between apparent equals until now at the end he tells us the heart has triumphed, love is supreme.

The thesis of the book is something like this: Through the ages a conflict has been raging between love and intellect. The conflict began in Eden when the desire for "knowledge of good and evil like unto the gods" tempted Eve to disobey the Creator. The "fall" was a fall of the heart, the spiritual nature, and the enthronement of the intellect. The intervening history from the fall to the coming of Christ was one long struggle of heart and head, God's revelation gradually unfolding until at last in Jesus of Galilee the heart triumphed. He became the solution of the problem of evil in his own person and in his wonderful teaching. From him has proceeded ever since a stream of love growing wider and wider with the centuries until today vast enterprises are being carried on its bosom—social service, evangelism, missions, education, democratic government, the institutional church, every eleemosynary institution of Christendom.

The idea is not wholly unlike Benjamin Kidd's in "Social Evolution." Kidd conceives Christianity as a "growing fund of altruistic feeling" which provides a "super-rational sanction" for conduct which reason is powerless to sanction. Dr. Moore, however, treats the problem from the side of personal experience, while Mr. Kidd has in mind its sociological aspect.

It must be said that the book did not all spring out of the author's heart, but a good part of it from his head. It is really the head's tribute to the heart. For if you expect to find here an early summer day's diversion you will come to grief. Our criticism of the book is that it reads too hard! Too hard for us, anyhow. The author sweeps wide ranges in his thought. From primeval chaos to the Christian Endeavor Society his imagination runs. He discusses whether or not there was evil before the earth and man were created! He holds a brief for the personality of the devil. He brings to bear minute linguistic discriminations to aid his argument. He appeals to science and history with remarkable erudition.

One feels that if this particular head has yielded to the heart, the supremacy of the latter has been established indeed.

We do not agree with everything in the book. But the disagreement is always with some point the head makes, not with anything the author's heart affirms.

The earlier chapters of the book, we confess, we were not able to follow. But the chapter on the "Mission of Christ" was like falling on a fresh spring at the end of a long journey. Hear this utterance from this chapter:

> "The world has always regarded truth from the intellectual point of view. It has been measured by the head, and when Pilate asked, 'what is truth?' he evidently had in mind the popular standard. But Christ gave us a new measure. Truth with him had a personal relationship. Hence he said, 'Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice.' Truth with Christ was measured below the head. It was a heart matter. The new version gives us a better idea of what the heart is when it tells us that it has eyes. It is no longer 'the eyes of the understanding,' but 'the eyes of the heart.' This is practically a new revelation, but it is precisely the revelation the world needs. 'The pure in heart shall see God.' Christ's witness to the truth changes the whole attitude of the inquirer as to what truth is, and at once lifts the heart into regnancy where it properly belongs."

The message of this book is pertinent to the present hour. The clock is striking our Centennial. What more vital message could the Disciples of Christ hear today than this that their unity is in the truth of the heart and not upon any creed, or intellectual formulation whatsoever!

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

OSLERIZING THE OLD PROFESSOR

The University of Minnesota will hereafter retire all teachers at the age of sixty-five. Carnegie pensions will doubtless make the way easy for much of this kind of university and college enactment. If a professor is still hale and hearty at sixty-five, he will have won a rest and the general public can claim his pen and platform utterances to the greater common good and he will be released to use his matured powers in the larger service. If he is growing old and wots it not, he is relieved without hurt to his pride or a wound to his loyal heart.

BAMBINO AND THE EARTHQUAKE

The Sicilians have had the advantage of Roman Catholic enlightment for centuries and are a fine example of what that church will do for the Filipinos when it is given the task some of our statesmen think must be delivered over to it if ever the Philippines are led into the light. Here is a sample of their religious enlightment and their popular scientific conceptions in one. It is their custom to carry in grand procession the little image, Bambino, through the streets on New Year's Eve. While this image was being carried in holy procession last New Year's Eve, some men from Messina who had been drinking and gambling while waiting for the coming of the holy image, exasperated by their losses and made maudlin by wine, rushed upon the sacred idol and both threw it to the ground and spat upon it. A few days later Messina was destroyed, the country devastated, the courses of the sea changed, the fabled rocks of Scylla and Charybdis lost forever, and tens of thousands of lives lost. So great was the wrath of the Christian God of pious Sicily!

RECLAIMING THE "GRAFT"

One of the new issues that has suddenly burst upon public attention is that of conserving the national resources. We have long been giving away the vast public domain. Railroads were given grants the present day value of which staggers comprehension, in order that the unpeopled prairies might build and develop. The school was not forgotten, but there was little sense of the coming worth of prairie land and it was sold for a song in the earlier states. Kansas, Texas and the Dakotas profited by others' experience and are educationally rich. The public schools are veritable palaces of the prairies in Kansas. Suddenly Uncle Sam wakened to the fact that he would do well to conserve for home-making his countless millions of acres, and after millions had been made by speculators who bought vast tracts at the government price and then retailed it to home-seekers at a profit of from five hundred to two thousand per cent, he concluded to give none away, except to actual home builders. Then he began to spend millions to get homes by the "reclamation service" and after his prodigal youth becomes an economic paternalist. He is further designing to reclaim millions through drainage and is fighting for his forests, or what is left of them after the days of his economic spend-thriftiness.

Now Secretary Garfield startles us by asking for $1,000,000 to reclaim the graft in public lands and says it will be cheap to give it to him for he has found one hundred times that much fraudulently held. There are 33,000 cases in the course of investigation and prosecution unsettled. The lumber barons are the men of unknown wealth, and Weyerhauser is the Alladin among modern Croesuses in the art of finding and laying hold of the millions of Uncle Sam's uncared-for timber lands. The earth is filled with treasures that are rapidly being claimed by syndicates that alone can have the money and means for discovering where they lie and are rapidly fencing them in. The president vetoes bills granting perpetual water-rights and warns congress that here will soon be a monopoly that will outdo Standard Oil, for great syndicates are picking out the preempting water rights which promise usefulness for hydro-electric power, the cheapest power known and one limited to the fall of the useable streams not needed for rapid navigation. All this follows the change in our political philosophy from the idea that government exists to make the fewest possible laws consistent with public peace to the idea that it should procure the greatest good to the greatest number.

DO THE REPRESENTATIVES REPRESENT?

The legislature of Arkansas will submit an initiative and referendum amendment to the people. Every state that has submitted the question has seen it carried. S. Dakota, Oregon, Montana, Oklahoma, Maine and Missouri have each eubmitted the proposition and the people have made it law. Illinois asked the people what they desired and they voted for it more than four to one, but the legislature ignored public opinion. The people of Delaware asked for it by eight to one, but do not get it. The above question may be asked in these two states.

THE LAND FOR THE PEOPLE

Revolutions have been fought over the right of the masses to the land. It is one of the fundamental if indeed not the very fundamental problem of political economy. The right to the land has marked the history of social evolution from the days of the autocrat who owned all things, even the bodies of his subjects, through feudal days down to our own democratic times when any man who has the money may obtain himself a bit of mother earth in "fee simple." And thereby hangs the economic and social tale. "Fee simple" does not mean that it is really yours, but only yours "to have and to hold," and the government reserves the right of "eminent domain" and may either claim your land or give another the right to expropriate it for the public good, e. g. a railroad or other public servant. Many ask the question, "Is there any reason why the evolution should stop with individual property rights in the soil from which we must all live and which is the free gift of nature to all men?" and answer by saying we have preserved the principle in the right of the government (all the people) to expropriate your private right for the public good.

In Russia the problem is the most burning one of the hour. Stolypin asked for the dissolution of the "mirs" or village communes and insisted that he would resign from office if the bill failed. The more progressive members of the Duma do not like the principle but fear the accession of an anti-constitutional ministry, and so were constrained to pass the law. It involves Russia in a great economic and social revolution.

When the serfs were freed they were settled in "mirs" or village communes in which they held no land privately but were allotted a tract in common and were governed by law and the village elders in the yearly parcelling of it to individuals or families for farming. But the new era in Russia finds the "bread and butter" problem of the masses the most crying and in it, too, is seen the greatest menace to the monarchy and the evolution, instead of a revolution in the Russian reformation. They remember France and are warned. With her vast domains the working peasants are not allowed enough land to more than keep soul and body together, and it follows as the night the day that the peasants are ignorant, drunken and easily excited to lawlessness and riot—in the absence of the Cossacks.

So instead of enlarging the communes as the more liberal and progressive parties desired, the ministry forces through its bill for private ownership and must now engage in the stupendous task of seeing that the peasantry are enabled to buy, or else, under the cloak of helping them, see the communal holdings soon revert into the hands of the landlords. With the peasants untrained in business and many of them notoriously given to drink, it is freely predicted that their latter condition will be no better than the former and that they will lose what hold they have on the common heritage of man. Russia had the opportunity of the ages to preserve for her common people, free forever from landlordism, the soil from which we must all live, and establish, or at least make the experiment once and for all in attempting to establish, that middle ground between socialism and individualism by preserving the first of "natural monopolies" to the common right. But her "evolution" seems doomed to take the slower process of taking all the turns in the highway of progress with no cross-cuts by the shorter routes which might be learned by the experience of other peoples.

Russia now owns her own railroads and telegraphs and keeps a monopoly of the liquor traffic, and for military and financial reasons does paternalistically many things which reformers think ought to be done fraternalistically.

WIRELESS AND THOSE WHO GO DOWN TO THE SEA

The recent terrifying disaster off Nantucket has shaken the confident assurance of those who dream of sea voyages and tours of the world, the shocking nearness of more than a thousant souls to a grave in the waters. It has long been asserted that travel on the modern ocean paths was less dangerous than on the steel girded land and there are facts and figures that abundantly prove it. Perhaps it is because we are "land-lubbers" and fear the sea; perhaps it is the appalling greatness of the numbers; perhaps the swiftness of the cathastrophe that shocks us, but no railroad wreck of modern times has so demanded the headlines as did the collision of the Republic and the Florida. Sober study of the near tragedy however, begets only assurance for those who would go down to the sea. A few years ago the Republic would have gone down in her forty fathoms inside a few minutes and but a handful could have been saved in the life-boats. As it was, her water-tight bulkheads kept her afloat until all the great passenger list was transferred through darkness and fog to the less injured Florida and her wireless called great ocean leviathans from many leagues distance to the rescue of the dangerously overladen but heroic Italian steerage carrier. Being that accidents are bound to happen, what could be more assuring than the sequence of this collision in the dense coast fogs. It will doubtless result in all nations passing laws like unto that proposed in congress, viz.: that all ships carrying more than fifty passengers and clearing for a foreign port five hundred or more miles away must carry a wireless apparatus and a competent operator. It demonstrates to us anew that ocean journeys will be the safest travel in the world and, so say the dreamers, when gyroscopes are trained to frustrate the ground-swell, the most pleasant. Think of it—wireless, water-tight compartments, no rolling, the turbine, and a smooth ride of five days across the Atlantic in all kinds of weather!

THE LEGISLATIVE CONSCIENCE

Time was when the public domain was the legislative spoils of public men. Members of congress entered freely into schemes for private benefit pending legislative acts that would throw great land grants and other natural resources open to private ownership. No more apparent mark of progress in public conscience can be noted than the fact that it is considered a malfeasance of office for a legislator to have any private interests involved in any matter of public legislation. Roosevelt has greatly aided in this clarification of the legislative conscience. His course has been steady against the mixing of private interests and public duties, and no man dare allow himself to be discovered today if he is profiting in pocket by acts to which he is a party by virtue of being a representative of the people. Indeed we are brought to see through the episodes of Senator Bailey and Senator Foraker that he must not even be attorney for interests that are concerned in any act of the legislative body to which he belongs. We may pause to ask how long the people will tolerate attorneys of the liquor interests in our legislatures?

Senator Tillman illustrates the state of the public mind on this question. He is one of the most renowned of public servants for two reasons—one his unimpeachable honesty, and the other his wielding of the "pitchfork," i. e. his rabid manner of doing and saying things. Senator Tillman is a farmer. He became interested in some new lands in the Far West. There were some matters concerning them to be attended to in Washington. Tillman looked them up because they had nothing to do with his official duties, but were purely business matters. In so doing he suspected they were fraudulent and immediately withdrew his application. Thus his honesty cannot be questioned. But when the fraudulent nature of the business was under discussion in congress, Senator Tillman took a short cut to explanation by simply saying he had not negotiated for any of the lands under question. It was one of those situations that accident involves men in and which would require a great deal of explanation because of the circumstances and yet in which there was no culpability. Here was Tillman's mistake. He told a "white fib." But he has been too merciless with men he did not like for either public or private reasons and now he is hoist on his own petard. He dislikes Roosevelt and has not hesitated to see great wrongs in things others passed by as innocent. The "big stick" is just as vindictive as the "pitchfork." The battle is to the strong though the arts are foul. In 1894 Roosevelt said that "the worst offense that can be committed against the republic is the offense of the public man who betrays his trust; but second only to it comes the offense of the man who tries to persuade others that an honest and efficient public man is dishonest or unworthy." Tillman was not dishonest but is this very transaction showed his honesty by refusing to profit by what he suspected as fraudulent. Yet the "big stick" imprints that brand upon him because no explanation can go so far or sink so deep in the public mind as does an excoriation backed by the official position of president and that simply because the president is supposed never to use his position for personal reasons.

But it all illustrates our theme that the legislative conscience is immensely sharpened and the public will have its legislators as clean of private gain by the laws they make as its judges of private interest in the corporations whose cases they try. Cleveland coined, or at least made current, the phrase, "a public office is a public trust," and Roosevelt has performed a signal service in furthering the sentiment by demanding its enforcement.

JAPAN TO BE AN INDUSTRIAL EMPIRE

Prime Minister Katsura of Japan declares his intention to begin the task of converting Nippon from a military into an industrial empire. This can well be seriously received from the nation that so often surprises the world with her remarkable presence. Her transformation in a decade from age-long hermitage into a modern nation with a parliament is the most remarkable event in the history of political science. Her foresight and preparation for the war with Russia showed the world of statesmanship that she was not a mere imitator of other nations' policies, but endowed with a remarkable statesmanship. And this is true statesmanship—to be able to foresee accurately and to adequately prepare for the crises of the future. Her conduct of that war and the way in which she surprised the world with her moderation and wisdom in the treaty of peace marked her as not only one of the great military powers, but as one of the best governed of modern peoples.

Lately we have been harried by the hysterical predictions of jingos and that type of politicians that think the world moves by sign of the beast and not a few of the real statesmen who are yet wedded to the belief that we best prepare for peace by arming ourselves for war, with visions of a great war with the sons of the Rising Sun. They have not asked the hows and whys nor reckoned with the impoverishing debt that the late war forced upon Japan nor have they agreed with that greatest of modern authorities, Bloch, that wars today are less matters of men or even guns than financial resources.

Now comes the quiet Katsura to tell us his dream and quiet our nerves. And remember the Jap dreams in quiet but not idly nor in vain. He conducts the greatest of late campaigns by "prearrangement" and in winning has provided by the same sign for his industrial empire. He is tremendously in debt. His making of a nation in a day called for great expenditures. He had to outfit his household almost from the ground up and it was very expensive. His little islands are crowded with millions and, their moutainous character reduces the possibilities of sustenance from his own soil to impossibility. He must either overflow or starve or become the manufacturer for the world in the East. In this latter he is handicapped by competition from America with her cheap water rates and by England with her well anchored precedence in the commercial world of the Orient. But Korea is near and undeveloped and the vast plains of Manchuria lie just beyond with an inland empire of agricultural resources. And here is the land of Katsura's dream. He is not harried with our discrimination against Japanese labor. Indeed he will be glad to see them compelled to go to Korea and Manchuria, for they will then remain a part of Japan and help develop her wealth and broaden her empire. Korea and Manchuria will pay the interest, reduce the imperial debt, intrench the banner of the Rising Sun on the commercial ramparts of the new territory and prepare a storehouse of riches for trade with an awakening China, as well as make strong against the day when a new Celestial Empire shall grow haughty and contest the supremacy of the Far East with her.

Katsura's vision is after all not a mere dream. It is the well seasoned plan of an eminent statesman and derives strength from the needs that drive by importunity and the opportunity that leads by self-interest and the very logic of the situation. As Prime Minister he has greatly reduced the military budget this year and is preparing to still further reduce it. He says his nation will be greater by cultivating education, science, and the arts of peace than by military prowess.

Paragraphic Editorials

Do not fail to read our serial story, "Winston of the Prairie," whose first installment appears this week. It is a matter of principle with us to print only high grade stories, possessing not only true views of life, but literary quality as well. Harold Bindloss writes only the very best. There is a sort of comradeship set up among the readers of a serial story. We follow the varying fortunes of the people in the tale with augmented interest because we are aware of the many others who keep us company. Do not fail to get in at the start.

Are you studying carefully Mr. Maclachlan's course in Teacher Training? It is comprehensive, practical, vital, up-to-date. It is the cleanest-cut piece of writing on the Sunday-school that has come under our eyes. Combined with Professor Willett's studies of the Bible, which were run serially last summer, what a superb volume for Teacher Training courses it will make! It is our purpose to publish this book shortly.

Great preparations are being made in the City of Springfield, Illinois, for the revival to be conducted by Rev. William A. Sunday. The meetings begin about the middle of this month. Mr. Sunday has conducted similar meetings in many Illinois towns—Jacksonville, Bloomington, Decatur among them—with extraordinary results. Springfield is one of the largest cities in which Mr. Sunday has organized a campaign. It offers peculiar conditions for his work. With the legislature in session these characteristic features of our capital city are made the more pronounced. The entire state will watch Springfield with the greatest interest. A united ministry is behind the enterprise and a consecrated church membership. A large tabernacle is being constructed. The city is on the qui vive of expectancy. It is the purpose of the Christian Century to keep our readers informed of the meeting as it advances through its five weeks. Unless prevented by some unforseen cause it is our purpose to attend the meetings and to present in three articles, a description of it at its beginning, in the middle and at its close.

Here is a new way to get an attendance at the Sunday night service: just charge an admission! We see an advertisement of a Sunday night service in a church in our vicinity with the statement at the close that ten cents will admit you. And, strange to say, the house is filled each time. This same church was well-nigh empty at night until a tax was put on attendance there. We think P. J. Rice, of Minneapolis, has a better plan. On a card announcing a series of Sunday night sermons there is a picture of the church, and under the picture this word:

This Ticket With a Smile
Will Admit You.

We can see that congregation gathering, in gladness paying the price of a cheerful face and heart to get into the house of God. The church will do well to assume that it is a cheerful place so that when the distressed and the downcast come they cannot help being caught in the joy of the worship. "I was glad when they said unto me, let me go into the house of the Lord."

The great religious event in Chicago this winter is the coming of the Religious Education Association to this city for annual conference. The dates are February 9-11. The association was organized here five years ago with President Harper as the leading spirit. Since then its annual sessions have always been rich with the wisdom of the leading educators of our land. The array of speakers next week includes nearly one hundred addresses in thirty separate meetings. All papers and addresses will center on the general theme of religious education and social duty. The speakers include representatives of nearly every great movement in American educational and moral life—Ambassador Bryce, President Eliot, Prof. Francis G. Peabody, D. D., Cyrus Northrop, LL. D., Charles F. Thwing, LL.D., George B. Stewart, LL.D., Miss Jane Addams, Henry S. Pritchett, LL.D., Rabbi Hirsch and Pres. S. C. Mitchell. Nearly all the state universities of the Central States and practically all the larger colleges and universities are represented in the program by their presidents or deans of schools, and many other leaders in religious and educational life are expected.

Like all interdenominational gatherings, these meetings tend to strengthen the bonds between churchmen of various types and creeds. In addition, they help to create a new alliance between church and school. The social workers are a significant factor in harmonizing the representatives of conservative ecclesiasticism with the leaders of the aggressive secularism characteristic of the larger educational world in the United States. The right and left wing of the body would find it difficult to get along together except upon the common ground of social Christianity. It is expected that a goodly number of Disciple ministers and teachers and thoughtful laymen will be in attendance.

To W. T. Moore

Dr. Moore, you have been with us, as you facetiously like to remark, "from the beginning." Can you get us Disciples of Christ to see that the message of your last book * is the very kernel of the plea our fathers made? Can you get us to see that in breaking away from creed religion we were striving to make the heart supreme over the head? Can you make us see that personal faith in Jesus Christ and personal obedience to him as Lord and Savior is a matter of the heart and will, and not primarily or essentially a matter of the head? Can you make us see that the attempt to set up any man's opinion about the origin of the Bible or the interpretation of its pages as a test of fellowship is a radical denial of the one distinctive principle for which we Disciples of Christ stand? Can you not only make us see that personal allegiance to the divine Christ is the basis of the union for which we plead, but can you inspire us to practice that kind of union among ourselves? This is the most important question, so we think, that concerns us today.

Shall the heart controlled by the personal Christ be supreme in our body? or shall the head controlled by a certain theory of that concerns us today:

There is no more important task before you, Dr. Moore, than this, and it should be accomplished before you lay down your pen.

A. McLean's New Book Free

Our proposal to give a copy of A. McLean's new book on "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher" with each new subscription of $1.50 has proved so attractive that we have decided to continue it beyond the date (January 2), which we had set for its expiration. During February the offer will hold good. Ministers may have the paper (new subscription), and the book for $1.20.

YOUR OWN PAPER FREE

FOR A LITTLE WORK.

Any minister (who is not in arrears to us) can have his subscription date set ahead one year by sending us 2 New Yearly Subscriptions with $3.00. This applies to ministers who are not now subscribers as well as to those who are.

The Centennial Watchword

The new watchword, the Centennial watchword, is $400,000 for Foreign Missions. We have assigned ourselves a worthy task. Now with unity of purpose and with an enthusiasm born from the skies let us strive for its accomplishment. This is an enterprise in which we are all interested. All classes, all ages in all parts of our land are interested in seeing success won. It is the Lord's work. The nations of the earth are perishing for the bread of life.

No less than the following should prompt us in the undertaking of this Centennial year:

1. God expects no less of us. We are dealing with Him. Beyond any Society or Committee or agents, is the God of all the earth. He gives us life and health and money and open doors, and the gospel of His grace. He saved us for this one specific purpose: To make known the gospel of His Son to all who know Him not. This is the one great purpose in our redemption. These lives with all we have are His. He expects us to do our best.

2. We are able to raise $400,000. Our people have money almost without limit. We have never even dreamed of our possessions. We add about $40,000,000 annually to our already prodigious wealth. After we have housed ourselves, fed and clothed our families, met all our incidental expenses, and after spending $10,000,000 on many unnecessary luxuries, still the members of the Christian Church have $40,000,000 clear savings left. The $400,000 is only ten per cent of our net savings. We have one thousand men able to give $1,000 each, ten thousand could give $100, one hundred thousand could give $10, two hundred thousand could give $5 each. This could be done and none of them would even feel it. But we ought to give even beyond this point. We have fine churches. Plenty to spare is seen on every hand. We are able.

3. We ought to raise this amount if we are to be worthy successors of the grand men who first gave themselves to the Restoration movement. They gave their time and some of them gave their fortunes. The heroism of the fathers should completely possess us. We may not suffer persecution as did they. But we can dare and do with our dollars. We can prove to the world that we have the same clear and lofty faith as had the good and great who have gone before. We can hand down to oncoming generations a spirit of loyalty that will bless the world and hasten its speedy evangelization. What we do this year, 1909, will be recounted in the lives and reflected in the deeds of all our people for the next one hundred years. If we would honor our fathers and commemorate the great things for which they stood, we must make the record of the year register the best things we have ever known.

4. The needs of the work call for $400,000. These needs are pressing down with the weight of a ton to the square inch. At this moment many of our missionaries are not properly housed. They are not even comfortable. In some cases their health and even their lives are endangered. Our schools are crippled for want of funds. The hospitals are not near so useful as we are able to make them. The demand for new stations in close proximity to the work we are already doing, is most urgent. Doors are open to us. They will be closed if we do not enter. If we are equal to the responsibility which looks us square in the face, we must raise the reasonable amount suggested. This we must do if we make permanent the victories we have already won.

5. Our loyalty demands it. "Where the Bible speaks we speak" has been our slogan for a hundred years. On no other subject does the Bible speak oftener and more emphatically than on the duty of liberality. We must be liberal to be loyal. To say and to do not is inconsistent. It is well that we practice what we preach. The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible is our standard and guide. Our loyalty must be reflected in the size of our offerings. If we fall short of $400,000 for Foreign Missions this year, we can make no great boast of our fidelity at the Centennial Convention at Pittsburg in October.

The call is of God. The work is a spiritual work. Much must be said about plans and money, and both are needed. But the great need is such a grasp upon the unseen and eternal as will enable our people to readjust their expenditures, to put first things first, and become in reality citizens of a world-kingdom.

The Visitor

The church in Ionia, Mich., is one of the oldest of our congregations in that state. With the exception of the churches in Detroit and Muir, there is probably none that goes further back. It was in 1859 that Isaac Errett, then residing at Muir, came to Ionia and held a series of services which resulted in the organization of a group of Disciples. For some time the church was dependent upon itinerant ministers, but gradually grew into self-supporting strength, and now looks back upon a half century of history closely connected with the life of our cause in the Peninsular State.

In the course of this experience it has enjoyed the pastoral services of such men as Isaac Erret, Eli Regal, O. Ebbert, L. R. Gault, A. S. Hale, R. S. Groves, Enos Campbell, W. H. Scott, W. B. Taylor and G. W. Moore. The list of its surviving charter members grows smaller yearly. In that list easily the most conspicuous name is Clark A. Preston, whose leadership during the entire half century has been potent for good. Mrs. Mary E. Willett, now of Chicago, is another whose name was upon the original membership list. The influence of the Ionia Church in the state work has been marked. It has always been active in its missionary tasks. It has sent out a company of preachers and missionaries which includes F. P. Arthur, H. L. Willett, Errett Gates, Royal Dye and his wife, Clarence Daniels, W. F. Ward, Frank Taylor and others.

During the week of January 17-24 the Ionia Church enjoyed a "Home-coming" experience. Several former ministers and many former members came to enjoy the hospitality of the Disciples there. The event was organized by the pastor, G. W. Moore, with the efficient coöperation of C. A. Preston. The invitation, which was sent out to all former members of the church whose addresses could be found, stated that "All Disciples who have been members of this church, whoever or wherever they may be, are cordially invited to come home and spend a few days under the old roof tree. The church cannot come to you. Will you come to your Christian alma mater?"

The formal exercises began on Wednesday evening with an address by F. P. Arthur, now state evangelist, on "The History of the Disciples of Christ in Michigan." Bro. Arthur is greatly loved by the church in Ionia, as well as by all the Disciples in the state, and his message was greatly enjoyed. On Thursday afternoon Prof. W. B. Taylor, who had come from Bethany, W. Va., with his wife to attend the reunion spoke on "Our Plea." In the evening Herbert L. Willett gave an address on "The Church and the Brotherhood," under the auspices of the Men's Club of the church. Later in the evening the same organization gave a banquet to the men of the church and the city, which was one of the notable events of the week. On Friday afternoon there was a meeting at which short talks were made by visitors present, and letters read from former members and ministers. This was followed by a church dinner at which the congregation entertained its guests.

In the evening Dr. W. T. Moore gave his lecture on "The Reformation of the Ninteenth Century," and on Sunday evening he lectured on "Isaac Errett." The other services of Sunday were of special interest. W. H. Scott, a former pastor, now of Marshalltown, Iowa, preached in the morning, and at 7 p. m. Clark A. Preston read a "History of the Ionia Church."

Thus closed a week of great interest in the life of this historic church. Its members will long recall the messages and good fellowship of these days, and the guests will bear the memory of a hearty welcome back to the old place. May its second fifty years be even more blessed than the past. May its ministers be children of the day, with a message that shall be both a testimony and an inspiration, and may the company of young men sent forth to the ministry be worthy of the church and their opportunity. The pastor has already begun a meeting, assisted by M. J. Grable as evangelist and Miss Una Delle Berry as soloist.

Sunday, January 24, found the Visitor in New Haven at Old Yale. The changes that have come to this institution under President Hadley's administration have been notable. One looks in vain for some of the familiar land marks of former days, while new features of great importance have been added to our second oldest American university. Yale is progressive in its ideas of education, but conservative of its traditions. One of its interesting features is the required attendance at chapel and at the Sunday services. Most universities have given up this custom, but even the boys at Yale registered their protest against any such innovation as its abandonment by voting down recently a proposition to substitute optional for compulsory attendance. It is an inspiring sight to see Battell Chapel filled to its capacity on the Sunday morning. A small percentage of the audience is from the faculties and the city, but for the most part the place is filled with solid rows of young men. A choir of fifty men leads the singing, and the preacher has a chance to speak to the heart of the coming generation such as few occasions afford him. At three o'clock he meets informally any of the young men who wish to speak with him upon personal problems or other matters of interest, and at seven there is an evening service in Dwight Hall under the direction of the Students' Y. M. C. A., at which a brief address is made.

The Disciples in Yale number more than twenty, of whom some sixteen are in the Seminary. It was a delightful privilege to meet these men at a luncheon given by the Visitor's host, Prof. J. L. Deming. Dean Curtis of the Seminary was present and spoke with appreciation of the Disciples in the institution. Prof. Hiram Van Kirk, who is teaching in the department of Systematic Theology, is a valued member of the group, in which most of our colleges have representatives. The Alexander Campbell Club holds monthly meetings, and the men who are pursuing their advance studies in this admirable institution will go out to the churches with the breadth of view and earnestness which only such an experience can give. There are in this group at Yale, as the other groups now at work at leading universities, some of the future leaders of the Disciples, preachers, teachers, editors and college presidents.

It was a pleasure to meet once more the leaders of the New York churches at a dinner in the church at West Fifty-sixth street on the evening of January 25, and later in the evening at the gathering of the Disciples' Social Union of Greater New York. J. P. Lichtenberger has recently taken the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at Columbia, and goes to the University of Pennsylvania in the autumn. Herbert Martin, pastor of the Sterling Place Church in Brooklyn, is president of the Disciples Social Union. S. T. Willis is devoting much of his time to lecturing under the direction of the city Board of Education. W. L. Fisher has recently begun his pastoral service with the West Fifty-sixth Street Church, for which J. L. Darsie has ministered with great acceptance during recent months. W. S. Rounds of Brooklyn is president of the Ministers' Association. There is a group of Disciples at Union Theological Seminary, and another at Columbia University. Both gatherings, the ministers' dinner and conference and the meeting of the Social Union which followed were full of interest and enthusiasm. It is always a satisfaction to meet the New York Disciples.

A hurried stop in Philadelphia, in connection with a morning lecture, gave opportunity to meet two or three of the Disciples there, and learn not only of the good work being done by the churches, but of the helpful results of the recent Federal Council of the Churches. Of the work of the Disciples in that city the letters of Arthur Holmes now appearing in the Christian Century give report.

Spiritual Dangers of the Minister

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

III Unreality.

This is perhaps, the greatest of all. It is certainly the most subtle, because it is the exaggeration of the minister's very virtues. It arises from the demand made upon him by his calling. If he be faithful to that, he cannot avoid this temptation.

First of all, there is demand of talk. The minister can by no means escape that. He elected to be a talker when he became a minister, and the church probably chose him as their minister because he excelled in that one particular. Now the danger of all talk about religious things, is that it shall become merely verbal and mechanical, having "the form of sound doctrine," but lacking the spirit that giveth life. It is certain that very few ministers are deliberate hypocrites but it is equally certain that there is a subtle all-pervasive insincerity that attaches itself to the repetition week in and week out of stereotyped phrases, sentences and formulas, many of which may never have had root in the heart. It is the minister's business to preach primarily out of his own personal experience of God and his gracious dealings. "No experience, no message," is his absolute rule. Assuredly he has no right to parade the experiences of others as though they were his own.

"Thou must be true to thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must over-flow,
If thou another soul wouldst reach;
It takes the over-flow of heart,
To give the lips full speech."

Yet precisely here lies the minister's temptation. He is a professional talker. Whether he has any fresh revelation from God, or not, he must talk. Whether his heart is in it, or not, he must make sermons and deliver addresses. He must speak familiarly of all the spiritual graces, whether he has them or not. He may be fresh from the seminary, but he must know how Paul, the aged, felt. He may be practical as St. James, but he must be able to deal familiarly with the mysticism of St. John. He may be a mere boy, but he must be able to preach on: "I am now ready to be offered." What then does he do? Too often he goes to his devotional books and repeats the experiences he finds there. He uses images and phrases, and speaks familiarly of spiritual mysteries, many of which have no more value for him than so many algebraic signs. Nor is this the worst. By a familiar law of psychology, the thing oft repeated comes to be held as true, and before the man has been many years in the ministry, he may come to fancy himself in the possession of spiritual gifts and graces, that have never got within striking distance of his heart.

In his wonderful picture gallery, John Bunyan did not omit this type. Talkative is the very image of us poor preachers in many a sermon:—"Well then, said Faithful, what is that one thing that we shall at this time found our discourse upon? Talk what you will; I will talk of things heavenly, or things earthly; things moral, or things evangelical; things sacred, or things profane; things past or things to come; things foreign, ot things at home; things more essential, or things circumstantial, provided that all be done to our profit."

Hear what Dr. Alexander White, the pastor of Scottish preachers, has to say about the matter: "But of all the religiously loquocious men of our day, your ministers are the chief. For your ministers must talk in public, and that often at great length, whether they are truly religious men at home or not. We hard bested ministers must go on speaking continually about the most solemn things, and if we are not extraordinarily watchful, and extraordinarily and increasingly conscientious; if we are not steadily growing in insight and real spirituality of mind and life ourselves, we cannot escape—our calling will not let us escape—becoming as sounding brass. There is an awful sentence in Butler, that should be written in letters of fire on every minister's conscience, to the effect that continually going over religion in talk, and making fine pictures of it in the pulpit, creates a profound sensibility to personal religion that is the ever-lasting ruin of multitudes of eloquent ministers."

The demands of popularity also press hard on many a modern minister. There was a time when people came to church; now the church must come to them. Its services must be attractive, its sermons interesting, its ministers "good fellows." People will not join a church with a minister they do not like. The preacher must be socially popular. He must be able to mix with all sorts of people, and leave a good impression. He must make many friends. What then? Too often professionalism, professional interest, professional sympathy, professional friendships. The ministerial hand-shake is typical and symptomatic. It is typical of the artificial interest in that the preacher must take in things and people that don't interest him; of the zeal for "souls" that too often is a zeal for "additions;" of the masked flattery he must indulge in, in order to get Tom, Dick and Harry "into the church." I say "must" because there are few of us strong enough to be quite real in our social intercourse. In order to be unreal, it is not necessary that we should tell every housewife in our congregation that her pies are the best we ever tasted. We need only parody friendship. We need only asume an interest and sympathy and complacency that in our hearts we do not feel. There are few ministers who, after spending an afternoon in pastoral calls, have not felt the relief of that hour or two with the one real friend whom they can greet without the professional mask. But the worst is when the very interest of sympathy turns into its opposite. Most of us have felt at least the approach of this terrible danger when we have successfully ministered to the sick and unfortunate. We have felt almost glad that there were sick and unfortunate people to minister to. This is the pure professional interest of the surgeon when he has used the knife with skill. It is right for him; but not for the minister. At the bottom it is selfish and callous, and the death of true Christian sympathy.

Concerning this Josiah Royce says somewhere: "Such people, (the professional sympathizers) are apt to be intolerable companions for you unless you have a broken leg, or a fever, or a great bereavement. Then they find you interesting because you are wretched. They nurse you like saints; they speak comfortably to you like angels. They hate to give the little comfort that can be given from day to day to those who are enduring the ordinary vexations of healthy and prosaic life. They rejoice to find some one overwhelmed with woe. The happy man is to them a worthless fellow. High temperature is needed to soften their hearts. They would be miserable in Paradise, at the sight of so much tedious contentment; but they would leap for joy if they could but hear of a lost soul to whom a drop of water could be carried. To them the most blessed truth of Scripture is found in the passage: 'For the poor ye have always with you.'"

The Gate of the West

BY BURRIS A. JENKINS

It is harder to save a letter-carrier from the error of his way than to make a brand-new convert. By this is not meant a mail carrier; but the bearer of a church letter commending him as in good standing and full fellowship. Recently I read one to my congregation dated 1876, and I am persuaded that only the approach of the great reaper brought that letter in. I know a man whose sweetheart's father carried a letter intended for the young man a paltry thirty days and never got forgiveness. These church-letter carriers are not carrying their own letters but the King's. Most kings would have their head, but ours is kind.

Can we not get rid of this whole letter business, or alter it? This present system is a nuisance, borrowed—where did we borrow it?—from the Methodists, I think. We have borrowed far more than we are aware. Some things good, some bad, some only indifferent, good or bad. But this, at least is largely bad, as most experienced pastors are ready to admit.

Now comes our Kansas City Ministerial Alliance, here at the Gates of the West, with a recommendation to their churches, that the letter be sent to the churches—the pastor and officers—and that the individual be notified that his membership has been transferred. As soon as it is definitely known that a member has removed to another town, this course of procedure is to be carried out; and willy, nilly, whether or no, the removee is taken upon the rolls of the church nearest to him by the simple reading of the letter from his former church. If the churches of Kansas City adopt the recommendation of the pastors, as they likely will, it is hoped that the example will be followed in other churches of the West, and possibly elsewhere.

A committee from the alliance has drawn up forms of letters to be sent, both to the church and the individual concerned, which will be printed and uniformly used in all cases. Were this method to become largely used, it would, I venture to say, increase our membership in this city fifty to seventy-five per cent. There are fully that proportion of letter-carriers—or those who have never asked for letters, but are "supporting (?) the old church at Slab-Side Cross Roads"—living round about our churches. Instead of seven thousand in our local Israel, there should be, and there could be, twelve thousand at least, if for a decade people had been taught that they cannot carry a letter, but become, by the very fact of removal, members of another church.

All this, to say nothing of the numbers of their children who have grown to maturity, or at least to adolescence, since the change of home. The family of this letter-carrier of 1876 have all grown up and married; they are not church attendants, and one or two of the connection have died. All these might have been saved to the church by the adoption of such a system as that proposed. But those are sad words, "might have been." Let us not make them sadder; but make haste to try anything in reason that will remedy existing evils.

Kansas City.

Miss Edna P. Dale will visit the Christian Temple Church, Peter Ainslie, minister, at Baltimore, Md., before the March Offering. She is a missionary of the Foreign Society to China, and this church supports her.

Yesterday's Heresy Today's Orthodoxy

By Clark Braden

The writer, in youth, heard only the most extreme of traditional claims for the Bible. When he learned the truth, he rejected the Bible on account of the gross falsehoods in such claims. Calvin Smith, who had passed through a similar experience, started the writer on his life and career with the motto, "Learn what the language of the Bible, itself, when fairly interpreted, teaches. Accept and teach that, and that alone."

The writer can give place, date, opponents, topics of one hundred and thirty-four debates, in which he was disputant—twenty more than J. S. Sweeney could give. He has had forty regular debates with infidels, ten with spiritualists, twenty with materialists, more such debates than any other person living or dead; and with champions of infidelity of Britain and of America. He has been endorsed for debate more than two hundred times, where opponents did not materialize. He has delivered more than five thousand lectures on scepticism, in the United States and Canada. He has debated the issue: "Were the books of the Bible written by the persons to whom the Bible ascribes them, and in the generations to which the Bible assigns them?" more times than any man living or dead; and has delivered more lectures on that issue.

While brethren have called the writer to such work and have indorsed him for such work, because, as they often declared, he could do it better than any other person, and often said that he was the only one who could do the work, he has had this experience.

When opponents would demand scriptural authority for certain things, the writer would declare that they had none, and were of a class for which none should be demanded. Brethren in those days insisted that all things must have spiritual precedent, claim such precedent could be given, and denounce the writer as failing to represent, as misrepresenting brethren. We have outgrown this, or have gone to seed in Antiism.

When the writer made the statement in regard to creeds, given in another article, brethren like B. Franklin, who used to thunder, "I do not preach what I understand the Bible to teach, what I believe the Bible teaches. I preach what I know the Bible teaches: I preach the Bible;" of course were dissatisfied and denounced the writer for failing to represent the brotherhood or misrepresenting them. The writer's position is rarely assailed now.

The writer could surprise readers with statements on papers by preachers, declarations in conventions, in regard to the "sects." Few can realize the mingled indignation and horror with which the writer's position, that the "sects," like the Corinthian Church, were Christians in error, and should be treated as Paul treated the Corinthians, as brethren in error. The writer has never reached the point of "federating" or co-operating with other religious bodies in any way that ignores truth, requires silence in regard to truth or requires co-operation in error. He will co-operate in all in which others are right. Then he stops.

In regard to the issue, "By whom, when was the language of the Bible written, and what language was inspired? In what language of the Bible do we find the inculcations of the Bible? the very work the writer was expected to do, there was most dissatisfaction. The writer could never be moved from the query, "What does the language of the Bible, when properly interpreted, teach, by expression, or clear implications? What does the language of the Bible claim for the speakers, writers, actors, whose acts and utterances it records?

There is where he parts from higher critics who approach the Bible with a priori assumptions in regard to inspiration, the superhuman, what cannot be true. And there is where he parts from the traditionalists, who come to the Bible with a priori theories in regard to what God must have done. The writer insists that fair treatment of the Bible demands that the question should be: "What does the Bible purport to be? What claims does the Bible make for the speakers, writers, actors, whose acts and utterances it records?" So long as these can be sustained, the writer will accept the Bible. When they cannot be sustained, he will reject it.

Before H. L. Willett reaches the years of the writer he will have the experience of the writer. Many who now assail him will be ashamed of such assaults, and of many things they now say, as the writer's assailants in Eureka in 1878, are of such assault, and of much they then vociferated so fanatically "The whirligig of time brings its revenges."

A Correction by Dr. Crandall

To the Christian Century: In my address at the Baptist Congress in Chicago, I quoted from memory from a letter received from Rev. J. H. Shakespeare of London, in which I reported him as writing that "if the Disciples in America hold to baptismal regeneration as do the Disciples of Great Britain," he would not favor inviting them to join in the Baptist World Congress to be held in this country in 1911. Mr. Shakespeare's letter had been destroyed when I wrote the address, and I simply expressed the impression which it made upon me. As a general rule, I strive to tell the truth, but it seems that I failed to do so in this instance and so did a beloved brother an injustice. What Mr. Shakespeare wrote was this: "You will know better than I as to the wisdom of asking the Disciples to join. We do not reckon them now in our Baptist World Statistics. My view, with my present knowledge, is that those Disciples who regard immersion as necessary to salvation are further removed from the Baptists than any other church except the Roman Catholics. If it were simply a question of immersion as a pre-essential to church membership, then they ought to be included; but I do not understand this to be the case."

I greatly regret having attempted to quote the expression from Mr. Shakespeare without having his exact language before me, and trust to your courtesy to give space to this effort to set him right.

Most fraternally yours,
Lathan A. Crandall.

HEARD IN THE DIVORCE COURT.

"Your Honor, I don't think I should be obliged to live with this woman any longer," said the dispirited and dyspeptic little man who was the plaintiff in the case. "Her cooking is something dreadful, biscuits like clods and her coffee is mud! Why, to every cupful there is half a cup of grounds!"

But the judge's ruling was that half a cupful was insufficient grounds for divorce.—January Lippincott's.

Winston of the Prairie

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the West," etc.

CHAPTER I.

Rancher Winston.

It was a bitter night, for the frost had bound the prairie in its iron grip, although as yet there was no snow. Rancher Winston stood shivering in a little Canadian settlement in the great lonely land which runs north from the American frontier to Athabasca. There was no blink of starlight in the murky sky, and out of the great waste of grass came a stinging wind that moaned about the frame houses clustering beside the trail that led south over the limited levels to the railroad and civilization. It chilled Winston, and his furs, somewhat tattered, gave him little protection. He strode up and down, glancing expectantly into the darkness, and then across the unpaved street, where the ruts were plowed a foot deep in the prairie sod, towards the warm red glow from the windows of the wooden hotel. He knew that the rest of the outlying farmers and ranchers who had ridden in for their letters were sitting snug about the stove, but it was customary for all who sought shelter there to pay for their share of the six o'clock supper, and the half-dollar Winston had then in his pocket was required for other purposes.

He had also retained through all his struggles a measure of his pride, and because of it strode up and down buffeted by the blasts until a beat of horsehoofs came out of the darkness and was followed by a rattle of wheels. It grew steadily louder, a blinking ray of brightness flickered across the frame house, and presently dark figures were silhoueted against the light on the hotel veranda as a lurching wagon drew up beneath it. Two dusky objects, shapeless in their furs, sprang down, and one stumbled into the post office close by with a bag, while the other man answered the questions hurled at him as he fumbled with stiffened fingers at the harness.

"Late? Well, you might be thankful you've got your mail at all," he said. "We had to go round by Willow Bluff, and didn't think we'd get through the ford. Ice an inch thick, any way, and Charley talked that much he's not said anything since, even when the near horse put his foot into a badger hole."

Rude banter followed this, but Winston took no part in it. Hastening into the post office, he stood betraying his impatience by his very impassiveness while a sallow-faced woman tossed the letters out upon the counter. At last she took up two of them, and the man's fingers trembled a little as he stretched out his hand when she said:

"That's all there are for you."

Winston recognized the writing on the envelopes, and it was with difficulty he held his eagerness in check, but other men were waiting for his place, and he went out and crossed the street to the hotel where there was light to read by. As he entered it a girl bustling about a long table in the big stove-warmed room turned with a little smile.

"It's only you!" she said. "Now I was figuring it was Lance Courthorne."

Winston, impatient as he was, stopped and laughed, for the hotel-keeper's daughter was tolerably well-favored and a friend of his.

"And you're disappointed?" he said. "I haven't Lance's good looks, or his ready tongue."

(Copyright, 1907, by F. A. Stokes Co.)

The room was empty, for the guests were thronging about the post office then, and the girl's eyes twinkled as she drew back a pace and surveyed the man. There was nothing in his appearance that would have aroused a stranger's interest, or attracted more than a passing glance, as he stood before her in a very old fur coat, with a fur cap that was in keeping with it held in his hand.

His face had been bronzed almost to the color of a Blackfeet Indian's by frost and wind and sun, but it was of English type from the crisp fair hair above the broad forehead to the somewhat solid chin. The mouth was hidden by the bronze-tinted mustache, and the eyes alone were noticeable. They were gray, and there was a steadiness in them which was almost unusual even in that country where men look into long distances. For the rest, he was of average stature, and stood impassively straight, looking down upon the girl, without either grace or awkwardness, while his hard brown hands suggested, as his attire did, strenuous labor for a very small reward.

"Well," said the girl, with Western frankness, "there's a kind of stamp on Lance that you haven't got. I figure he brought it with him from the old country. Still, one might take you for him if you stood with the light behind you, and you're not quite a bad-looking man. It's a kind of pity you're so solemn."

Winston smiled. "I don't fancy that's astonishing after losing two harvests in succession," he said. "You see there's nobody back there in the old country to send remittances to me."

The girl nodded with quick sympathy. "Oh, yes. The times are bad," she said. "Well, you read your letters, I'm not going to worry you."

Winston sat down and opened the first envelope under the big lamp. It was from a land agent and mortgage broker, and his face grew a trifle grimmer as he read, "In the present condition of the money market your request that we should carry you over is unreasonable, and we regret that unless you can extinguish at least half the loan we will be compelled to foreclose upon your holding."

There was a little more of it, but that was sufficient for Winston, who knew it meant disaster, and it was with the feeling of one clinging to the last shred of hope he tore open the second envelope. The letter it held was from a friend he had made in a Western city, and once entertained for a month at his ranch, but the man had evidently sufficient difficulties of his own to contend with.

"Very sorry, but it can't be done," he wrote. "I'm loaded up with wheat nobody will buy, and couldn't raise five hundred dollars to lend any one just now."

Winston sighed a little, but when he rose and slowly straightened himself nobody would have suspected he was looking ruin in the face. He had fought a slow losing battle for six weary years, holding on doggedly though defeat appeared inevitable, and now when it had come he bore it impassively, for the struggle which, though he was scarcely twenty-six, had crushed all mirth and brightness out of his life, had given him endurance in place of them. Just then a man came bustling towards him, with the girl, who bore a tray, close behind.

"What are you doing with that coat on?" he said. "Get it off and sit down right here. The boys are about through with the mail and supper's ready."

Winston glanced at the steaming dishes hungrily, for he had passed most of the day in the bitter frost, eating very little, and there was still a drive of twenty miles before him.

"It is time I was taking the trail," he said.

He was sensible of a pain in his left side, which, as other men have discovered, not infrequently follows enforced abstinence from food, but he remembered what he wanted the half-dollar in his pocket for. The hotelkeeper had possibly some notion of the state of affairs, for he laughed a little.

"You've got to sit down," he said. "Now, after the way you fixed me up when I stopped at your ranch, you don't figure I'd let you go before you had some supper with me?"

Winston may have been unduly sensitive, but he shook his head. "You're very good, but it's a long ride, and I'm going now," he said. "Good-night, Nettie."

He turned as he spoke, with the swift decision that was habitual with him, and when he went out the girl glanced at her father reproachfully.

"You always get spoiling things when you put your hand in," she said. "Now that man's hungry, and I'd have fixed it so he'd have got his supper if you had left it to me."

The hotel-keeper laughed a little. "I'm kind of sorry for Winston because there's grit in him, and he's never had a show," he said. "Still, I figure he's not worth your going out gunning after, Nettie."

The girl said nothing, but there was a little flush in her face which had not been there before, when she busied herself with the dishes.

In the meanwhile Winston was harnessing two broncho horses to a very dilapidated wagon. They were vicious beasts, but he had bought them cheap from a man who had some difficulty in driving them, while the wagon had been given him, when it was apparently useless, by a neighbor. The team had, however, already covered thirty miles that day, and started homewards at a steady trot without the playful kicking they usually indulged in. Here and there a man sprang clear of the rutted road, but Winston did not notice him or return his greeting. He was abstractedly watching the rude frame houses flit by, and wondering, while the pain in his side grew keener, when he would get his supper, for it happens not infrequently that the susceptibilities are dulled by a heavy blow, and the victim finds a distraction that is almost welcome in the endurance of a petty trouble.

Winston was very hungry, and weary alike in body and mind. The sun had not risen when he left his homestead, and he had passed the day under a nervous strain, hoping although it seemed improbable, that the mail would bring him relief from his anxieties. Now he knew the worst, he could bear it as he had borne the loss of two harvests, and the disaster which followed in the wake of the blizzard that killed off his stock; but it seemed unfair that he should endure cold and hunger too, and when one wheel sank into a rut and the jolt shook him in every stiffened limb, he broke out with a hoarse expletive. It was his first protest against the fate that was too strong for him, and almost as he made it he laughed.

"Pshaw! There's no use kicking against what has to be, and I've got to keep my head just now," he said.

There was no great comfort in the reflection, but it had sustained him before, and Winston's head was a somewhat exceptional one, though there was as a rule nothing in any way remarkable about his conversation, and he was apparently merely one of the many quietly-spoken, bronze-faced men who are even by their blunders building up a great future for the Canadian dominion. He accordingly drew his old rug tighter round him, and instinctively pulled his fur cap lower down when the lights of the settlement faded behind him and the creaking wagon swung out into the blackness of the prairie. It ran back league beyond league across three broad provinces, and the wind that came up out of the great emptiness emphasized its solitude. A man from the cities would have heard nothing but the creaking of the wagon and the drumming fall of hoofs, but Winston heard the grasses patter as they swayed beneath the bitter blasts stiff with frost, and the moan of swinging boughs in a far-off willow bluff. It was these things that guided him, for he had left the rutted trail, and here and there the swish beneath the wheels told of taller grass, while the bluff ran black athwart the horizon when that had gone. Then twigs crackled beneath them as the horses picked their way amidst the shadowy trees stunted by a ceaseless struggle with the wind, and Winston shook the creeping drowsiness from him when they came out into the open again, for he knew it is not advisable for any man with work still to do to fall asleep under the frost of that country.

Still, he grew a trifle dazed as the miles went by, and because of it indulged in memories he had shaken off at other times. They were blurred recollections of the land he had left eight years ago, pictures of sheltered England, half-forgotten music, the voices of friends who no longer remember him, and the smiles of a girl's bright eyes. Then he settled himself more firmly in the driving seat, and with numbed fingers sought a tighter grip of the reins as the memory of the girl's soft answer to a question he had asked brought his callow ambitions back.

He was to hew his way to fortune in the West, and then come back for her, but the girl who had clung to him with wet cheeks when he left her had apparently grown tired of waiting, and Winston sent back her letters in return for a silver-printed card. That was six years ago, and now none of the dollars he had brought into the country remained to him. He realized, dispassionately and without egotism, that this was through no fault of his, for he knew that better men had been crushed and beaten.

It was, however, time he had done with these reflections, for while he sat half-dazed and more than half-frozen the miles had been flitting by, and now the team knew they were not very far from home. Little by little their pace increased, and Winston was almost astonished to see another bluff black against the night ahead of him. As usual in that country, the willows and birches crawled up the sides and just showed their heads above the sinuous crest of a river hollow. It was very dark when the wagon lurched in among them, and it cost the man an effort to discern the winding trail which led down into the blackness of the hollow. In places the slope was almost precipitous, and it behooved him to be careful of the horses, which could not be replaced. Without them he could not plow in spring, and his life did not appear of any especial value in comparison with theirs just then.

The team, however, were evidently bent on getting home as soon as possible, and Winston's fingers were too stiff to effectively grasp the reins. A swinging bough also struck one of the horses, and it plunged and flung up its head the man reeled a little in his seat. Before he recovered the team were going down-hill at a gallop. Winston flung himself bodily backwards with tense muscles and the reins slipping a trifle in his hands, knowing that though he bore against them with all his strength the team were leaving the trail. Then the wagon jolted against a tree, one horse stumbled, picked up its stride, and went on at a headlong gallop. The man felt the wind rush past him and saw the dim trees whirl by, but he could only hold on and wonder what would take place when they came to the bottom. The bridge the trail went round by was some distance to his right, and because the frost had just set in he knew the ice on the river would not bear the load even if the horses could keep their footing.

He had not, however, long to wonder. Once more a horse stumbled, there was a crash, and a branch hurled Winston backwards into the wagon, which came to a standstill suddenly. When he rose something warm was running down his face, and there was a red smear on the hand he lighted the lantern with. When that was done he flung himself down from the wagan dreading what he would find. The flickering radiance showed him that the pole had snapped, and while one bronco still stood trembling on its feet the other lay inert amidst a tangle of harness. The man's face grew a trifle grimmer as he threw the light upon it, and then stooping glanced at one doubled leg. It was evident that fate which did nothing by halves had dealt him a crushing blow. The last faint hope he clung to had vanished now.

He was, however, a humane man, and considerate of the beasts that worked for him, and accordingly thrust his hand inside the old fur coat when he had loosed the uninjured horse, and drew out a long-bladed knife. Then he knelt, and setting down the lantern, felt for the place to strike. When he found it his courage almost deserted him, and meeting the eyes that seemed to look up at him with dumb appeal, turned his head away. Still, he was a man who would not shirk a painful duty, and shaking off the sense of revulsion turned again and stroked the beast's head.

"It's all I can do for you," he said.

Then his arm came down and a tremor ran through the quivering frame, while Winston set his lips tightly as his hand grew warm. The thing was horrible to him, but the life he led had taught him the folly of weakness, and he was too pitiful to let his squeamishness overcome him.

Still, he shivered when it was done, and rubbing the knife in the withered leaves, rose, and made shift to gird a rug about the uninjured horse. Then he cut the reins and tied them, and mounting without stirrups rode towards the bridge. The horse went quietly enough now, and the man allowed it to choose its way. He was going home to find shelter from the cold, because his animal instincts prompted him, but otherwise almost without volition, in a state of dispassionate indifference. Nothing more, he fancied, could well befall him.

CHAPTER II.

Lance Courthorne.

It was late when Winston reached his log-built house, but he set out once more with his remaining horse before the lingering daylight crept out of the east to haul the wagon home. He also spent most of the day in repairing it, because occupation of any kind that would keep him from unpleasant reflections appeared advisable, and to allow anything to fall out of use was distasteful to him, although as the wagon had been built for two horses he had little hope of driving it again. It was a bitter, gray day with a low, smoky sky, and seemed very long to Winston, but evening came at last, and he was left with nothing between him and his thoughts.

He lay in a dilapidated chair beside the stove, and the little bare room through which its pipe ran was permeated with the smell of fresh shavings, and hot iron. A carpenter's bench ran along one end of it, and was now occupied by a new wagon pole the man had fashioned out of a slender birch. A Marlin rifle, an ax, and a big saw hung beneath the head of an antelope on the wall above the bench, and all of them showed signs of use and glistened with oil. Opposite to them a few shelves were filled with simple crockery and cooking utensils, and these also shone spotlessly. There was a pair of knee boots in one corner with a patch partly sewn on to one of them, and the harness in another showed traces of careful repair. A bookcase hung above them, and its somewhat tattered contents indicated that the man who had chosen and evidently handled them frequently, possessed tastes any one who did not know that country would scarcely have expected to find in a prairie farmer. A table and one or two rude chairs made by their owner's hands completed the furniture, but while all hinted at poverty, it also suggested neatness, industry and care, for the room bore the impress of its occupier's individuality as rooms not infrequently do.

It was not difficult to see that he was frugal, though possibly from necessity rather than taste, not sparing of effort, and had a keen eye for utility, and if that suggested the question why with such capacities he had not attained to greater comfort the answer was simple. Winston had no money, and the seasons had fought against him. He had done his uttermost with the means at his disposal, and now he knew he was beaten.

A doleful wind moaned about the lonely building, and set the roof shingles rattling overhead. Now and then the stove crackled, or the lamp flickered, and any one unused to the prairie would have felt the little log-house very desolate and lonely. There was no other human habitation within a league, only a great waste of whitened grass relieved about the homestead by the raw clods of the fall plowing, for, while his scattered neighbors for the most part put their trust in horses and cattle, Winston had been among the first to realize the capacities of that land as a wheat-growing country.

Now, clad in well-worn jean trousers and an old deerskin jacket, he looked down at the bundle of documents on his knee, accounts unpaid, a banker's intimation that no more checks would be honored, and a mortgage deed. They were not pleasant reading, and the man's face clouded as he penciled notes on some of them, but there was no weakness or futile protest in it. Defeat was plain between the lines of all he read, but he was going on stubbornly until the struggle was ended, as others of his kind had done, there at the western limit of the furrows of the plow and in the great province farther east which is one of the world's granaries. They went under and were forgotten, but they showed the way, and while their guerdon was usually six feet of prairie soil, the wheatfields, mills, and railroads came, for it is written plainly on the new Northwest that no man may live and labor for himself alone, and there are many who realizing it instinctively ask very little and freely give their best for the land that but indifferently shelters them.

Presently, however, there was a knocking

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

On Pastoral Calling

The Correspondent: "Do you think any minister can do his work well without doing much visiting? Our minister seldom enters our homes; and is not at all backward to let it be known that he regards pastoral visitation as a waste of time. He acts as if the people bored him. For myself I want a preacher that is a good pastor. It is the personal contact that helps most."

Before a minister can give the spiritual medicine needed he must first diagnose the condition of their souls. In order to do this he must know them in their homes. He will have to hear a great deal of small talk before he can take accurate measurements of his parishioners. What are their chief interests in life, what their deepest desires, what their foibles and prejudices, what their visions, what their practical use of Christianity, what the support of their faith, what their greatest weakness and sin, what their estimate of the church, and what their spirit of fraternity? These can only be known in any satisfactory way by coming face to face with them individually. It is not the preacher's business to preach abstract truth, but truth that his hearers need and can apply to their work-a-day life.

I can well understand how a man of delicate construction can be initiated in his pastoral calls. He probably pulls himself away from a good book to make the round. The book dealt only with lofty principles; but now in his visiting he has dropped to the realm of trivial talk. There are three planes of conversation. On the lowest, personalities are discussed. On the second, things are talked about. On the highest, principles are considered. Much of the conversation the minister hears in his visits is of the first and second kind. The pastor in order to keep up spirit in his calling needs ever to be alert for an opening to contribute something helpful. He is not there to be entertained, but to help and be helped in his work. Below every garrulous talker and below every superficial talker there is a real soul. The minister seeks to reach this deeper reality.

Pastoral Visiting is Fun.

Then the minister to be happy in his calling needs the spirit of the novelist. He must be serious indeed, but serious with a large appreciation of humor. Calling is earnest work; but it is also fun. It is part of the genuine work of every true minister; but it is also just as fascinating reading as The Bonnie Briar Bush, or any other good character sketches. To live long and be happy the minister must not take himself too awfully seriously. I myself am not a good visitor. I am too much under the control of the one on whom I am calling. I do not direct the conversation. The personality talking to me seems to overwhelm me. I cannot enter a house and dominate the conversation and almost bind the occupants to the church by the magnetic influence resulting from the brief call. I meekly listen to all they have to say and every once in a while succeed in saying "yes." Too much, I think, I become absorbed in the interests of the one talking to me. Some are good proselyters, but to me all people seem too natural and good for any aggressive proselyting on my part.

However, being now away from their magnetic presence I am hard-hearted enough even to attempt to classify some of the people I have met and loved in my pastoral work.

The Frank Friend.

There is first the frank friend. He prides himself in showing himself just as he is. He usually has a loud voice. If a woman, there is a shrill or metallic tendency. He believes in "speaking my mind." He boasts, "There is no deceit in me. What I think, I am right out with it. Others may use soft soap, but not me." He would consider it effeminate and unmanly to indulge in the language or manners of courtesy. He thinks because he is blunt, that therefore he is ruggedly honest. He identifies his brusqueness with simplicity of soul. He feels, as far as he has feeling, that if his words do not carry a sting, he is not doing his whole duty. His conscience is allopathic in its vitriol. He is often a very proud man; but deceives himself into thinking he has no pride because he does not make the effort to be gracious. Good manners to him are the accomplishments of the proud. He will likely tell you some harsh report he has heard; because "I think you ought to know. Others will not tell you, but I never cover up." The sensitive and delicate soul does not lend wings to that which ought never to have been said in the first place. But the frank friend must be heroic. He cannot be daunted by any unpleasant task. Indeed to him the unpleasant task is a sweet mission.

What shall be done with "The Frank Friend?" Don't be disturbed by him. Educate him. Do not expect too hasty results. Love him. Enjoy the enconiums he passes upon himself. Regard him with the eye of a novelist. Be gentle with him, for he is very sensitive. You will offend him grievously if you talk to him as he talks to you. Think on the patience of his wife.

The Good Promiser.

How often heartened in my work I have been by the good promiser. She is so kind. She never refuses any work I ask of her. Here is one of the many conversations I have had with the good promiser:

"We are in need of a Bible-school teacher and I thought Miss Promiser you might be pleased to take the class."

"Yes, indeed, I have been thinking I ought to do more church work."

"I am indeed glad to hear you speak so."

"I decided yesterday that I would start in next Sunday and never miss a Sunday."

"Well, I am exceedingly pleased. Regularity of attendance is most encouraging. It helps build up the church.

"I was selfish in the decision. I miss the church so much when absent. I do not feel right all week. Your sermons are such a help to me."

"The class is one of boys about ten years of age."

"Oh, how glad I am, that is just the class for me. I just love boys of that age."

"You feel that you can be regular, do you?"

"Oh, yes, indeed, I will not miss a Sunday."

Miss Promiser took the class, was present the first Sunday, absent the second, present the third, absent two Sundays, and then a new teacher was secured.

What, fundamentally, is the matter with Miss Promiser? What can be done to make her regard her word to the church as she would regard her signed business obligation?

She is a woman of quick and good impulses. She was born so. Convictions come with the second birth or through education. Miss Promiser has not had any experience that has reached her deeper self. Nor has she known the discipline of education. Her life's direction is dependent upon the chance influences that play upon her. She is good-hearted, but not strong-hearted. She does not control, but is controlled. How shall she be changed? It may be necessary to wait for life to bring to her some experience that will strike deep into her soul. Motherhood may do it. Some disappointment may do it. Some book or sermon may do it. God has many ways of getting to the nature that lies below the surface; but his ways cannot be timed or measured.

Not Like the Old Home Church.

The parishioner who laments the fact that the church he is now attending is not like the old home church is met with frequently. He had been active at home, but does not now have the heart to work. This man is usually a provincial soul. He is the kind out of which ardent sectarians are made. His creed is the customs of his boyhood. He lacks imagination. At the time he united with the church his soul experienced its greatest emotion. Since then his life being barren of any great joy in religious work he yearns for the church of his early ecstacy. What shall be done with him? He must be re-converted, re-interested. Joy depends upon work. He is hopeless unless he can be led to commit himself again to the service of the Master. He must be lifted out of his selfishness and made to see that the work of the kingdom is as near to him now as it ever was in the old home church, and as important, likely much more important.

Those Who Would Shock the Minister.

The minister, if he is to be happy in his calling, must not forget to look at his parishioners, at least at many of them, with the eye of the novelist. Of course, he must not forget that he is a minister, but at the same time remember that his members are entertainingly human. One of the interesting species of church members are those that attempt to shock the minister. Instead of asking him about something that pertains to his calling and thereby getting from him some spiritual service they proceed to relate some experience they had at card playing, something they think will startle the innocent preacher, or relate how intimate they are with certain very worldly people. This species express by every manner their great pity for the unsophisticated dominie. They, it is, however, that are poor character readers. The minister may be bored, but he is not so dull as supposed.

What shall be done with this class? Well, what?

Those You Never Come to Know.

Although I have called upon some people scores of times I do not know them better than immediately after the first call. We talk freely, but we never unmask to each other. We have common interests and these we talk about fully, but we never look into each others faces. I mean our real faces—soul faces. Much of meeting is a process of covering up. Much of conversation instead of revealing is concealing. Just here I think is the great field for the pastor. It is found in the opportunity to know his people. We would like our fellows better if we really knew them. We ought not to pry into the innermost places of our people's hearts, but we should give them every opportunity to reveal to us their real selves, their difficulties, their defeats, their aspirations and all that may be of interest to them.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Prof. McGarvey Answers

Brother Gates: In the Christian Century of January 9, and also in that of the 16th, you devote a whole page to setting me forth in a very unfavorable light. To the most of what you have said of me I propose no reply. You are at liberty, if it suits your taste, to say what you will of my character, my motives, and the results of my work. On these topics I have no debate. But you claim that I should answer certain questions which you put to me in a former issue, and this I propose to do, hoping that you will permit what I say to be seen by the same readers.

First, as to the word "whale," as used in our Lord's remark about Jonah. I referred you to the revised version for evidence that this word is a mistranslation. You replied that it is found in the text of that version. This is true, but not the whole truth. You must have observed that the revisers, while retaining the word "whale," placed opposite to in margin "Greek, sea-monster," thus plainly showing that the word "whale" does not correctly represent the original. You learned, when a school boy, that it is wrong to translate a generic term by one that is specific. If, for instance, the original had been the Greek word for quadruped, it would have been a mistranslation to render it dog or a cow. The revisers then do show that the rendering whale is incorrent, and that Jesus did not specify the whale as the fish which swallowed Jonah. This fact was pointed out by critics and commentators before the revised version was made.

You claim, in this matter, to stand with Jesus against Jonah and McGarvey; but the term sea-monster used by Jesus, and the term "great fish," used in the book of Jonah, are exactly equivalents; so that you stand alone against Jesus and Jonah, while I stand with the other two against you.

As to the last chapter of Deuteronomy, as it contains not only an account of the death and burial of Moses, but the statement that "no man knoweth of his sepulchre to this day"; and also a comparison of his career with those of later prophets, I do not believe that Moses wrote it because he could not have done so without a miracle, and I think of no reason why such a miracle should have been wrought. The ascription of a book to a certain author never implies that it contains no interpolations or additions by later hands. Whether it does or not, is a legitimate question for criticism, either textual or historic or both, and is to be determined by the evidence in each individual instance.

Now as to the remark of Jesus, that God "makes his sun to rise on the evil and the good." I am of the opinion that Jesus understood the solar system as well as you do; and it is just as unreasonable to charge him with teaching that the sun goes round the earth, as to charge you with teaching it, when you speak of the sun rising and going down.

I have said, and perhaps this is the occasion of your question about the sun, that although every writer in the Bible thought that the sun revolves round the earth, not one of them ever says so. No one of them says what necessarily implies this thought. And this is no mean evidence that they were restrained by the spirit of God from saying what they thought. When Joshua commanded the sun and the moon to stand still, he spoke precisely as he would if he had been a modern astronomer. So of every similar expression found in the Bible. David, in writing the 19th Psalm, may have been greatly tempted to say of the sun, the moon and the stars that they revolve around the earth, but he avoided it; and it is a remarkable fact that Joseph Addison, who understood astronomy, inadvertently makes David say what he refrained from saying. For Addison, in his inimitable poetic version of that Psalm, makes David say of all the heavenly bodies,

"What though in solemn silence all Move round this dark terrestrial ball."

This shows that Addison, with all of his knowledge of the solar system, if he had been in David's place, would have said what David believed but was restrained from saying.

Don't forget, Bro. Gates, that phenomenal forms of expression are unavoidable in many departments of science. J. W. McGarvey.

Dear Brother McGarvey: It affords me the greatest pleasure to lay before the readers of the Christian Century the foregoing communication. I venture to predict that it will be regarded with surprise and delight, not only because of its amiable spirit, but because of its liberal position, by many who have found constant reason to disagree with your position and to find fault with the spirit of your editorial writing. If the spirit of this communication shall in the future characterize your critical treatment of the opinions of your brethren, the young men of this generation who have turned away from you will rise up to bless you in your last days.

The Spirit of Discussion.

We younger men who do not agree altogether with your critical position, and have thought your editorial spirit harsh and derisive, have nevertheless respected the purity of your motives, the integrity of your character, and your loyalty to our common Lord and Master. If some things I have recently written concerning you have seemed severe, they have been directed not at your personal character and motives, but at your editorial writing which is public property. Some of us, who have been honored with a slight personal acquaintance with you, have felt that you have misrepresented your real self in your editorial work—not your intellectual position but your Christian spirit. It has been a common remark by some who knew you well, that the Professor McGarvey of the department of Biblical Criticism is not the Professor McGarvey of the class-room, the home and the friendly circle. We have regarded this as unfortunate and unjust to yourself. We have not believed that you would speak to men face to face, in the quiet of brotherly discussion or upon the public platform, as you have sometimes spoken to them in the columns of the newspaper.

Discussion and Unity.

It has always seemed to me that discussion of differences of opinion between brethren, in public or private, ought to be carried on in such a spirit and in such terms as would leave the disputants brethren when the discussion was over; and would leave all who heard the discussion and took sides one way or another, still brethren in Christ Jesus—loving Him and His work, and one another in His work. There is scarcely a week passes that I do not engage in such discussion in which neither our fellowship nor the work of Christ is made to suffer; but on the other hand, charity is strengthened, liberty is broadened, and unity is more deeply grounded. And I see no other way to a secure and an abiding unity except through brotherly discussion of differences. If we are going to suspect each other with every difference of belief, traduce each other with every variation of opinion, and hate each other after every discussion, I see no hope for unity among the Disciples, much less among all the people of God. Like some men who are said to be ready to fight at the drop of the hat, so some of my brethren seem to be ready to excommunicate at the drop of a new idea.

As to the Whale.

Granting, as I readily do, that the original Greek word "katos," which is translated "whale" in the statement of Jesus, means "sea-monster," and ought not to be translated "whale," yet neither should it be translated "great fish." The word "sea-monster" does not mean either whale or fish; it may refer to a mythological sea-serpent or dragon. As to what it really was that swallowed Jonah—whether fish, whale, or a serpent—the word used by Jesus does not indicate. So that I was as correct to say "whale" as you were to say "great fish"; it might have been one or the other, or neither. Just as when I say "quadruped," you cannot tell whether I mean an elephant or a mouse, for both are quadrupeds; so when Jesus used the word "katos"—sea-monster, you cannot tell whether it was fish or whale, for both are sea-monsters. We have at last agreed in this painful and heart-rending discussion, and doubtless the brotherhood will breathe a sigh of relief.

As to Moses' Death and Burial.

You say: "I do not believe that Moses wrote it, because he could not have done so without a miracle, and I can think of no reason why such a miracle should have been wrought."

There are many good Christian men who will thank you most heartily for that statement; for there are such who find it difficult to accept the doctrine of the virgin birth of Jesus because they "can think of no reason why such a miracle should have been wrought." On the contrary, they think of many reasons why such a miracle would not have been wrought. They call attention to the normal, human childhood and youth which followed the birth, for "he increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men." They cannot see how it could have any bearing upon his divine nature to have been excepted but partly from the law of human generation in respect of a father, while following that law as any other human being in respect of a mother. But further, it is difficult for them to see how an immaculate conception of the physical body could produce a divine being, unless the divine grows out of the human.

Another principle you lay down will help him still further. You say: "The ascription of a book to a certain author never implies that it contains no interpolations or additions by later hands. Whether it does or not, it is a legitimate question for criticism, either textual or historic or both, and to be determined by the evidence in each individual instance."

If this man, who wants to be a Christian, but cannot accept the doctrine of the Virgin Birth, is confronted with the record of it in the Gospel of Luke, and is told that it is infallibly inspired and must be believed as a condition of becoming a Christian, he finds relief in the thought that this record may be "an interpolation or addition by later hands"; or at least it is "a legitimate question for criticism, either textual or historic, or both, and is to be determined by the evidence."

McGarvey among the Higher Critics.

This principle lies at the foundation of all modern biblical investigation and is identical with the higher criticism. I am not sure, Brother McGarvey, that your friends will be pleased to have you included among higher critics, but I regard it as an honor to be proud of. I do not forget that in other connections you have spoken approvingly of the higher criticism; but that science of biblical study has been given such a black name in the theological circle in which you are supposed to move that to say of a man that he is a higher critic is to condemn him without benefit of clergy. Perhaps your reputation for soundness is so firmly established that it will not hurt you with your own circle; but to say of a young man coming out of any university that he is a higher critic, is to spoil his chance of a position in some schools and churches. Perhaps it will help some now if we are able to say of such young men that they are higher critics like Prof. McGarvey of Lexington. And really that is the only kind of higher critic any of us can be said to be. You cannot imagine how happy I am to be able to cite your name in approval of the higher criticism we use here in the University of Chicago. We ought to have a better standing in conservative circles from this time on. It ought to be no longer creditable to a college among the Disciples for its president to advertise it for favor by saying, "We have no use for the higher criticism here." You certainly can have no respect for a divinity school that has no use for the higher criticism, any more that you can respect a school that has no use for grammar or arithmetic.

Kent's History of the Hebrews.

Holding as you do to this modern principle of the higher criticism, you are willing to grant to other men as sincere and devout as yourself, are you not, the right to pursue investigations and reach conclusions concerning the books of Scripture, without impugning their motives or putting their books upon the Index.

This is not a new principle with you, is it? If not new, then how could you justify yourself in saying concerning Kent's "History of the Hebrew People" that it should not be used in colleges "unless the professor wanted to spread infidelity"? At that very time that history was being used and recommended by a professor in one of our best colleges. The implication of your statement was that that professor must want to spread infidelity, and be doing it in using that history as a text book.

In making that charge did you not foresee that you might injure both the professor and the college? If this principle of the higher criticism to which you give your approval is something new with you, and you are willing to allow other men the same freedom you enjoy in its use, would it not be fair for you to retract that statement concerning Kent's History and restore the good name of the college and professor whose standing in the brotherhood you disturbed?

Are you not willing to allow Kent the privilege of using your own principle in the study and construction of the history of Israel, and come to conclusions differing from your own? Why then call his work "infidel" and not your own work?

As to the Sun Rising and Setting.

So you think Jesus understood the Copernican system of astronomy, and knew that the earth moves around the sun as well as I do, but kept it back.

Suppose it should come to pass in a few years that some astronomer should make the discovery that Ptolemy was right and that the sun revolves around the earth as it appears to do. Then what would you say of Jesus words, "He maketh his sun to rise and set"? That he "understood the solar system as well as I do" and meant what he said? That would be to make Jesus teach concerning astronomy and every other science just what each generation believes, and change his mind with each change in scientific theory.

Or, do you mean to say that Jesus affirmed nothing, one way or the other, concerning the motion of the sun, in his statement, and therefore no astronomical doctrine can be put in his mouth? That seems to be your position when taken in the light of the statement, "Don't forget, Bro. Gates, that phenomenal forms of expression are unavoidable."

"Phenomenal forms of expression"—that is, there are expressions that do not mean what they say. Jesus said, "He maketh his sun to rise and set." That does not mean what it says literally; it is simply a "phenomenal expression"—the language of appearance, not of scientific fact. We cannot tell what Jesus thought about the motion of the heavenly bodies from this expression.

Brother McGarvey, if you had lived in Martin Luther's time and had taught that view of the language of Jesus, they would have burned you at the stake, or forced you to recant. That passage was one of the proof texts against Galileo. He saved his life by recantation.

Forms of Literary Reference.

It has probably occurred to you that as there are "phenomenal forms of expression" in the language of Jesus, so there are "literary forms of expression." We are accustomed to say concerning the lines of Shakespeare, "To be or not to be," etc., that they are Hamlet's soliloquy. As a matter of fact no such man as Hamlet ever lived and spoke that way. We speak of Macbeth, or King Lear, or David Copperfield or some other literary character saying so and so; when as a matter of fact none of these persons ever lived and spoke those words.

Jesus said: "How then doth David in the Spirit call him Lord," referring to the 110th Psalm. And again he said: "Have ye not read in the book of Moses," referring to Exodus 3:6. Are we obliged to take these statements of Jesus to mean, in the one case, that David actually wrote the Psalm, and in the other case that Moses actually wrote the book of Exodus and the entire Pentateuch? Is one an infidel if he chooses to take these statements of Jesus as "literary forms of expression" and not statements of fact?

Why is not this question of the authorship of the Pentateuch and of the Psalms a "legitimate question for criticism, either textual or historic, or both, and to be determined by the evidence in each individual instance"? Literary forms of expression in referring to literature are just as unavoidable as "phenomenal forms of expression" in referring to physical phenomena; and why is it not just as reasonable to suppose that Jesus used literary forms of expression in referring to Old Testament literature?

Did Jesus mean any more to affirm a fact when he said, "David said" or "Moses wrote," than he meant to affirm a fact when he said, "He maketh his sun to rise and set"? Can we tell from these casual forms of literary reference what Jesus actually believed concerning the authorship of Old Testament books?

Did he in his teaching ever raise a literary question any more than a scientific question?

What difference does it make anyway, in my acceptance with Christ, or my fellowship in the church, what I believe about the date and authorship of Old Testament books? "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another."

Chicago and Lexington Agree.

Chicago and Lexington are not so far apart after all.

1. Both believe in the use of reason in the valuation of the Scriptures.

This has never been more strikingly illustrated than in your own free and critical valuation of the Song of Songs as quoted in this paper last week. You wrote concerning this book of Scripture several years ago in your "Guide to Bible Study," page 76, as follows:

> "The title which the short poem assigns itself is 'The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's. If there be any book in the Bible which found a place in it by a mistake or a misjudgment of those who put the inspired book together, it must be this; for it is so totally unlike all the rest that it is difficult to see what connection it can have with the general design of the whole. Many interpreters have affected to find in it a parabolic meaning, and even a foreshadowing of the love of the church for Christ; while others have regarded it as nothing more than a love song with a very obscure connection of thought. According to either view, it has afforded little edification to the great majority of Bible readers; and unless significance can be found in it hereafter which has not yet been pointed out, it will continue to be but little read, and of but little practical value."

Chicago never surpassed this statement in free critical handling of Old Testament literature. But if such rational treatment can be accorded one book of Scripture, why not another? Why should any book or passage be taken except after passing the test of reverent, scholarly, and sane criticism?

You have set the example for any freedom of study Chicago or any other school could ask. If now, Chicago should exercise this freedom which you have exercised, may we not count on you to defend our right to it?

2. Both believe in pursuance of the above method, in the principles of the higher criticism, in the investigation of Scripture.

3. Both believe in brotherly discussion in the search for truth.

There are doubtless many other points of agreement but these have appeared in the present correspondence. One other principle ought to be agreed to, and that is to regard each other as equally sincere and disinterested lovers of the truth, and disciples of Jesus Christ. We ought also to agree that no permanent good can come either to the truth or the church by the suppression of freedom in either thought or speech. If we chain down conviction in our generation, it will go free in the next; if we crush truth to earth in this age, it will rise to power in the next. Nothing but the truth should satisfy us; and nothing but freedom can bring us the truth.

Anything short of heroic giving for world-wide missions on the part of our congregations during this Centennial year will be a sad reflection upon our sense of gratitude for past Centennial benefactions.

Buffalo, N. Y. B. S. Ferrell.

A. L. Ogden, Bethany, Neb., referring to the March Offering, says: "All other years should be forgotten and this one should be made magnificent with its splendid giving. It is worth an heroic effort."

THE PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

Christ and Our Gifts. Topic, Feb. 10, Mark 12:41-44.

The careless multitudes that thronged the temple on the day when Jesus sat over against the treasury little suspected the presence of one whose judgment on their acts would receive the reverence of succeeding generations. They doubtless were busy in thought with commonplace, personal affairs. They counted themselves religious people. They had no disposition to question the existence of God or his activity in history. It was a part of their program to contribute for the support of the temple and the care of the poor. At this they did not murmur. But the one who sat over against the treasury found their ideals defective. It was not their great sin that they failed in this or that duty. They were without a vision of true national glory and of personal dignity. They had a keener sense of the wrongs they were enduring than of the oportunities of service to which their history and training pointed. Perhaps we of the present have great need to guard against the same error. We are jealous of our rights. Are we earnest with respect to our duties? There is something of the despot in every one of us. If we are comfortable, our resentment is aroused by the cry of distress. The social order suits us; why should any one wish to change it? The creed harmonizes with my views; surely no one but a lover of notoriety would change it in the shortest article. Jesus came to disturb every man who tries to be satisfied with things as they are. The rest he offers is that of useful activity, not that of stupidity and sloth. In most unexpected places and at most unusual times he comes upon us to pass judgment upon our use of what we have. We cannot escape the shame of his rebuke. Ignorance and prejudice may salve our consciences for a while but these will fail us at last.

Material Values.

It was not to their credit that the rich cast large sums into the treasury. I do not understand that there is anything in the teaching of Jesus to justify the belief that the smaller the gift the greater is the benefit it confers. Great resources are needed by the church in order that its full measure of service may be reached. University presidents are beginning to talk about one hundred million dollar endowments. They see that the demands made on their institutions require an enormous increase in material equipment. The marvelous changes that are reported from Unganda were made possible by large gifts of money. We cannot evangelize the cities of America with a few dollars. We can say all we please about the eloquence and consecration of preachers but the results will be meager if men of wealth have no part in the effort to save the city. While we are spending millions upon millions for battleships and for pleasure and an occasional dollar for missions, we cannot hope to make an impresion on the world that is proportionate to our numbers and power. Hospitals, schools, boats, and books are neeeed in every land where the missionary is found. From every field there is a call for larger equipment.

Spiritual Values.

The moral value of the giver is not measured by the amount given. This is the significance of the saying, "This poor widow cast in more than all they that are casting into the treasury." She denied herself that she might give. Others gave of their surplus. She took of her living and cast it into the treasury. The power of such a gift is far in excess of its material value. The widow had the spirit of service. What she gave was her own. She had earned it. We may doubt that all the others had earned what they offered. Men must give themselves when they cast their money into the contribution box or else there is no true giving. Loafers and parisites who happen to control houses and lands cannot contribute toward the spiritual progress of the world. Good men may persuade them to release their hold on some of their goods and these may be used with splendid results but let no credit be assigned to the loafers and parisites. Spiritual values cannot be created by the non-entities. Only workers count in the spiritual realm. If among those who came to the temple there had been one with a larger gift and a greater love of God and man, the Lord would have pointed him out as worthy of the highest praise. How much of faith and hope and love do you contribute with your money?

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

February 14, 1909.

Subject:—Life Lessons For Me From The Book of Job; Job 42, 1-6; 10-17.

Suggestive Readings; John 9:1-3; Matt. 14:22-36.

Suggestive Thought: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness—"

Some one has said that poetry is the highest form of truth. Certainly the book of Job presents to us a dramatic poem full of truth for our own time. It is a story of faith triumphant in the midst of sufferings.

Our lesson of last week showed us how Israel gradually climbed to a belief in universal salvation and redemption. No doubt one of the chief factors which thus broadened and softened her religious life was the age long period of suffering through which she passed. The Egyptian taskmaster and the Philistine warrior were the dread figures in her early history. Later, "The Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold," and the Exile gave a climax to all these centuries of tragedy. It is hard to think that the author of Job did not have in mind this painful panorama as he depicted the personal sufferings of Job.

Read through the book as closely as possible and then by way of review scan the following outline. I. Job, a man both wealthy and pious, prosperous and happy in his family life. 2. In a council of Heaven Satan is given permission to test with outward sufferings the religion of Job. A series of calamities follows, each worse than the rest. But Job remains faithful. 3. Another council ensues. Inward sufferings are allowed to Satan. Job suffers loathsome diseases and the severest bodily pain. Job remains faithful. 4. But finally human nature bends before the storm and Job "opened his mouth and cursed his day." Three friends attempt to convince him that his suffering is the result of sin, but his righteous soul cries out in revolt. Repeatedly and passionately protesting his own innocence, he fights his way to a position where he throws his soul upon God and drifts into still waters of peace. The closing verses of the poem present in material way the truth that joy ultimately follows faith.

This ancient poem brings out some life lessons, both positive and negative, which we will do well to engrave upon the tablets of our hearts. It teaches that suffering is not necessarily a result of sin, and God a Judge alone; that the mystery of God's ways is too deep for us. "I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful for me which I knew not." Collier's Weekly of recent date prints a photograph of great iron electric light poles at Messina bent inward by the earthquake wave. Awful catastrophe!! Why must suffering be the common lot of us all? We know not. Lastly, the poem teaches that faith in the midst of hardships is the noblest and most joyful state that man can attain. He is the true sailor who hears and heeds his captain above the wave beats of the storm. "So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning." In the mystery of it all Job knew one thing for certain, that faith is the highway to blessedness, and that God was very near. "I know not where His islands lift their fronded palms in air; I only know I cannot drift beyond His love and care."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR MEMBERSHIP CAMPAIGN.

Beginning with Christian Endeavor Day the first Lord's Day in February, the month is to be devoted in all Christian Endeavor Societies to a concerted and enthusiastic campaign for the increase of membership. Outside the societies are more young people who ought to be in and can be brought in than have ever been enrolled, and in the members that are now in the fellowship is the ability to bring in all who should be won.

Following the new resolves, the week of prayer and the evangelistic services of January, February offers the most favorable time of the year for this enterprise. Apply the "Each One Win One" method and double the membership of your society. There are thousands of young people who are just waiting for an invitation to join. See that they have it at once. There are other thousands who will not be so ready to come in. Make each of them the object of a well-planned and faithfully maintained campaign.

The same work of enlargement being taken up and prosecuted at the same time by Junior, Intermediate and Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, each will help the other and all will be ably and efficiently assisted by the older members of the church if they are given a chance.

One of the principles of Christian Endeavor was stated by the Apostle Paul, "I seek not yours but you." Let this be duly emphasized in the Christian Endeavor Day Service and in the February Campaign and all the more easily the financial aims of Christian Endeavor will be splendidly realized.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

MISSIONARY NOTE.

C. P. Hedges of the Foreign Society reached Bolenge, Africa October 9. He is delighted with the outlook at that important station. Miss Mamie Longan reached Manila early in November and began her work at once. Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Wilson have begun their work among the Chinese, Japanese and Portugese in Honolulu.

CHICAGO

WHAT OUR RELIGIOUS NEIGHBORS ARE DOING IN CHICAGO MISSIONS—SECRETARY JORDAN VISITS THE PRESBYTERIANS—A COLUMN OF CHURCH NOTICES WHICH IN THE FUTURE WILL BE MORE THAN THE SKELETON IT IS THIS WEEK.

We have been going about recently visiting the offices of the superintendents of missions in the different denominations. We wanted to see how the thing was done by people who have made a success of the work of building up religious institutions in our city. We have been impressed with the system to be found in these offices. Everywhere there was the great wall map of Chicago hanging from ceiling to floor on which was marked the location of the churches of the denomination and its missions. In each office was an extensive filing system and a card index system to keep record of the details of the work. The task of city missionary work is prosecuted with the same energy and system with which the managers of corporations promote great enterprises.

In the work of the Presbyterian denomination, there were the evidences of the greatest effectiveness and this denomination we have selected to serve as an example of what may be done at the great task of winning the city to Christ.

Splendid Correlation of Forces.

To the student of religious conditions, there is great interest in the forms of government and coöperation in religious work. There can be no doubt that the Methodists have given up more individual freedom for the sake of the organization than any of the five leading religious bodies of the city. It is evident, however, that they are not as effectively coöperating as are the Presbyterians. The Presbyterian Church Extension Committee of the Chicago Presbytery, as its name implies, is the Presbytery itself at work at the task of city missions. There is no such thing as conflict between the missionary forces and the church for they are one and the same. The Presbyterians have greatly solidified their work by getting all their interests in the city under one roof. The new Ohio building at the corner of Wabash and Congress is the home of the denomination in Chicago. In this single building we find the Westminster book store, the offices of the Interior and the offices of the various societies. The societies having offices in the building are as follows: The Woman's Board of the Northwest, the Woman's Home Missionary Society, the field secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, The Presbyterian Brotherhood of America, The Church Extension Committee, The Chicago Presbytery and the Chinese Mission. These various societies have a common waiting room and their office forces coöperate in countless ways to their mutual profit. Even the Methodist denomination with its centralization of authority in the Bishop has not been able to correlate its forces in Chicago so effectively as this.

Presbyterians Spend Sixty Thousand Dollars.

The income of the Church Extension Committee of the Chicago Presbytery last year was fifty thousand dollars. This money was all raised from the Chicago churches. Ten per cent of the money is turned over to general home mission work and the remainder is used in the city of Chicago under the direction of the committee. Last year twenty-four thousand dollars of this money was raised on a single afternoon at a rally of the society. The officers believe that at the end of the year that is soon to close they will be able to show receipts of at least sixty thousand dollars. This sounds strange in the ears of the Disciples who are spending not over seven thousand dollars a year in the evangelization of Chicago and sometimes very much less.

One asks the question immediately, how are the Presbyterians of Chicago able to raise such a sum of money? The answer is to be found in their history and their methods. They have been here from the very beginning. They have gathered in their churches the substantial element of the population. They now have ninety-six regularly organized churches and eight or ten missions not yet organized into churches.

The methods of spending money by this committee are full of interest. Twenty-four churches have received aid in the support of the pastor. In the mission work of the denomination, the committee takes the offerings of the missions and assumes financial responsibility for the bills, taking any sense of financial pressure off the infant group. Adding these two items together, it will be seen that they are engaged in the support of not over thirty-four places in whole or in part with an income of fifty thousand dollars. This looks extravagant to the Disciples who do not average an expenditure of over one-third that amount per mission. Are they wasting money on large salaries and on administration? There is no evidence of this as the average aid given to the pastors is somewhere around six hundred dollars per year.

CHICAGO CHURCH NOTICES.

For Week Begining Sunday, Feb. 7.

SHEFFIELD AVENUE, corner of George street. Rev. Will F. Shaw. 11 a. m. and 7:45 p. m.

SOUTH CHICAGO. Rev. A. J. Saunders. 11 a. m. and 7:45 p. m.

WEST END, corner Congress street and Forty-second avenue. Rev. C. M. Kriedler. 10:45 a. m. and 8 p. m.

WEST PULLMAN Rev. Guy L. Hoover. 10:45 a. m. and 8 p. m.

The most significant way in which this committee is spending money is in paying off church debts and in helping in the erection of new buildings. The money is not loaned but given outright. A struggling church is put on its feet and given a chance for its life. It has no after-demands from the church organization for either interest or principal.

Unselfish Evangelism.

The evangelistic side of the work of the Presbyterians is significant. They have an evangelist employed to give his whole time to evangelism. Tent meetings are held in different parts of the city with good results. Six hundred conversions resulted from the work of the committee the past year.

The committee is not afraid to undertake the real missionary problems of the city. They are not engaged in merely making nice homes for nice people, the Presbyterians, but are busy at the task of winning men of alien faith or no faith. They have a successful Chinese mission and last year they opened four new missions among foreigners. The students in the McCormick Theological Seminary are put to work in the different missions of the city and the seminary is able to furnish many men that are equipped for work in the languages.

The church is modern in its methods. Kimball Hall was purchased by the committee the past year for the inauguration of institutional work. The Presbyterians have been the pioneers in studying the labor problem from the point of view of the church. They are probably doing more than any other Protestant force in the city toward a reconciliation of the labor interests and the church.

Here are some of the ideals that are set by the committee for its future: $100,000 to endow a training school; $25,000 to extend work among the foreigners; $50,000 to inaugurate hotel and rescue work; $25,000 for new buildings; $50,000 for the development of missions and settlements; $25,000 for home mission work outside of Chicago.

Advantages of the Disciples.

The Disciples have many advantages over the Presbyterians. They have a ministry that has no creedal limitations except the very broad New Testament one. They have a history that with few exceptions teaches tolerance and breadth of view. They have a simple and rational evangelism which is fast outgrowing its legalism without losing its definiteness, and this with the plea for the reunion of God's people is a heritage that ought to make them especially effective in the city. Our only difficulty is that we are here fifty years late. We have no wealth in our churches. Perhaps not a single man in a Chicago church would be counted rich in the good churches down state. We are poor. We have been exploited as monsters of heresy for the promotion of a journalistic propaganda. United at home we are suspected abroad. Zealous in all good works to the forgetting of theological hair-splitting, we are regarded in some quarters as a menace. When suspicion gives way to hearty fellowship and the brotherhood at large realizes the tremendous nature of the problem here, we too shall do great things, and, who knows, we may be written up in the Interior as examples of consecrated good sense in the building up of Christian institutions in a great city.

(Chicago Church News on page 21.)

WITH THE WORKERS

The church at Harlan, Ia., is without a pastor.

The work at Ames, Ia., is prospering under the leadership of J. T. Hauser.

B. F. Hall is just rounding out the fourth year of his service at Woodbine, Iowa.

Pres. Hieronymous of Eureka presented the claims of the college at Atlanta, Ill., January 17.

J. A. Lord did the preaching in a recent meeting at Columbus, Ind., where W. H. Book is pastor.

B. E. Youtz is in a meeting at Parry, Ia., where Rev. Ingram, the pastor, has things in good condition.

There are frequent additions to the church at Hoopeston, Ill., where L. R. Hotaling is doing excellent work.

J. Madison recently gave an address in the church at Shannon, Ia., on "The True School for the Here and the Hereafter."

W. W. Denham, at Carthage, Ill., has organized a training class which is studying the history of the New Testament church.

E. E. Hollingworth, pastor of the church at Fitzgerald, Ga., writes, "There were three additions to the church here January 24."

O. W. Lawrence, pastor of the church at Decatur, Ill., preached for the First Church, Springfield, Ill., January 24, supplying for the pastor, F. W. Burnham.

The two churches in Ottumwa, Iowa, are in meetings following the meeting held by "Billy" Sunday. It is thought that 500 people will unite with the two churches.

The attention of our Chicago readers is called to the full announcement of the meetings of the Religious Educational Association, to be held in this city next week.

F. A. Sword, "Living Link" evangelist, is in a very successful meeting with the vigorous young church at Lanark, Ill., where S. J. Epler the pastor, is entering upon his fourth year of service.

R. A. Staley has been called to become pastor of the church at Kingman, Kansas, and will begin work at once. In the two Sundays he was with the church, before the call was extended, there were six additions to the church.

F. W. Emerson, who has been with the church at Redlands, Calif., just two months, reports twenty-five additions at regular services; an adult Bible class of forty charter members organized. He is preaching a special series of sermons to men.

At the close of the meeting at Warren, Ohio, the pastor, J. E. Lynn, held a special evening service in the interest of unbroken homes. Special effort was made to get every member of every home present at the service, and the sermon preached by Mr. Lynn was, "Things that Make and Break the Home." This would seem to us a most wise and effective way of reaching a rather general condition in our churches.

Bruce Brown has just closed a meeting at Bloomfield, Ia., in which there were more than seventy additions to the church, and more than half of these were men. During the two and one-half weeks of the meeting, not an invitation was given without some one responding to it. There were large audiences, people coming forty minutes before the service that they might secure seats. F. D. Ferrall is the pastor of the church.

TELEGRAMS.

Belding, Michigan, Jan. 25, 1909.—Evangelistic meetings are now being conducted in our church by Wm. A. Ward of St. Louis, Mo. Nine additions yesterday. Outlook encouraging. Attendance growing and interest deepening. O. W. Winter, Pastor.

Elmwood, Neb., Jan. 23, 1909.—Began a meeting here January 3 with the assistance of Robert O. Noah and wife in song. They have organized a chorus of more than fifty voices and are doing splendidly. Many of the leading citizens in this community are coming into the church. The pastor, L. A. Chapman, is doing the preaching, and the whole membership is keyed up to concert pitch. The meeting will continue another week. L. A. Chapman.

Atlantic, Iowa, Jan. 25, 1909.—Just closed a successful meeting here with the pastor, E. E. Mack. The meeting lasted twenty-two days and there were twenty-six additions. I assist in a meeting at Mason City, Iowa, through February, with Evangelist W. F. Shearer and Pastor G. E. Roberts.

Charles E. McVay,
Song Evangelist.

Havana, Ill., January 28, 1909—One hundred and twenty-seven added the first nineteen days of our meeting. Sixteen tonight. All young men seventeen to twenty-five years of age, but three. All confessions but two. We will continue to February 5. The greatest meeting previous to this was held by H. E. Monser when 101 were added in six weeks. We have the largest Bible-school in Mason county. J. Wade Seniff is leader of song and I commend him heartily to the churches and preachers.

Cleveland, Ohio, Feb. 1.—Closed meeting of eighteen days here with Brother Tisdall preaching. Seventy-seven additions. Splendid interest manifested. Brother Tisdall is a great leader for Evangelistic services. His sermons go home with power. I assist him at Crawford Road. T. Alfred Fleming.

Des Moines, Iowa, January 31.—Fifty-five added at Central today. Two services and exceedingly cold weather following blizzard of Friday and Saturday which stopped street cars and all traffic. One hundred and twenty-three added last week, 645 in twenty-five days. The meeting has awakened this capital city of 90,000. Vancamp and Rockwell rendering most excellent service in song. Brother Idleman has made his way into the hearts of this great church membership. He is greatly beloved by all. Church is jubilant and meeting goes grandly on.

Chas. Reign Scoville.

Columbus, O., Jan. 31.—Good day today. Total of forty additions. The revival closes Thursday night with lecture by W. L. Brooks on "The New Citizen." We begin at Moundsville, W. Va., Friday night.

Arthur K. Brooks.

P. A. Cave has accepted a call to the church at Charleston, W. Va.

S. P. Telford has begun work as pastor of the church at Maxwell, Iowa.

The church at LeRoy, Kansas, has called C. E. Booth to become its pastor and he has accepted.

Brooks Brothers are assisting Walter Scott Priest and the church at Columbus, Ohio, in a meeting which began January 15.

Violett and Charlton are in a meeting at the great church, Akron, Ohio, where George Darsie, the pastor, has things in fine shape.

There is a remarkable advance in the work of the church at Atchison, Kansas, under the leadership of Z. E. Bates.

Dr. Layton, formerly of Bolengi, Africa, gave an illustrated lecture at the church in Evanston, Ill., on "A Night in South Africa."

Geo. L. Snively is having large audiences in his meeting at Marshall, Mo. The ministry of B. L. Wharton has been most efficient.

S. B. White has begun work with the Central Church at Moberly, Mo. There is a large Bible school, and a good responsive people to encourage the minister.

Edward O. Beyer, singer, of Chicago, is assisting in a meeting at Lowell, Ind., where J. F. Dungleberger, the popular pastor, is doing the preaching to large audiences.

Rev. O. F. Jordan, pastor at Evanston, Ill., is delivering a series of Sunday morning sermons on the "Sermon on the Mount," thus seeking to show the emphasis Jesus placed on life.

The report of J. F. Findley as pastor at Fort Collins, Colo., shows: sermons preached, 414; addresses, 44; lectures, 29; additions to the church, 398; funerals, 48; weddings, 31; calls, 5,383. A busy pastorate.

The Kansas Ministerial Institute will meet at Manhattan, April 13-15. F. D. Power will be the chief speaker. There will be an address by a representative Baptist preacher on "Union of Baptists and Disciples."

"We have a wide-awake young minister who gives short and effective sermons," is the comment of a member of the church at Boston, Mass. There are many additions to the church and $1,000 has been raised to pay on the church debt.

The Texas Christian Lectureship is now in session at Waco, Texas. Among the speakers are: Prof. H. L. Calhoun, J. W. Holsapple, Pres. Lockhart, W. T. Hilton, Hugh McLellan, C. M. Schoonover, Cephas Shelbourne, A. L. Clinkenbeard, J. C. Mason, E. C. Boynton. J. J. Morgan is president.

During the five years of C. S. Medbury's work at University Place, Des Moines. 1,604 people have been received into the church, which now has a membership of 2,105. The missionary offerings for the past year were $5,640.98. The C. W. B. M. has 425 members. S. W. Brown is assistant pastor and Earle Roberts, Boy's Secretary.

John Ray Ewers, pastor of the First Christian Church, Youngstown, Ohio, is doing the preaching in a series of "Decision Meetings" which his church is holding. This is the third meeting which Mr. Ewers has held with his church since the beginning of his pastorate, three years ago last October. In the two preceding meetings there were about 150 accessions to the church.

Regarding the meeting at the Capitol Hill Church, Des Moines, Iowa, we have this word: "Twenty-eight accessions yesterday, 187 to date. Just beginning the fourth week. Will hold the meeting five weeks. The greatest meeting in the history of East Des Moines. Reaching a fine class of people, and the whole community is stirred. Bro. Brandt is preaching sermons such as never have been heard in a series of meetings here. Each one is a gospel gem. Bro. Burditt has captivated the people with his singing. A flash light picture was taken of the chorus of seventy-five last night. It is hoped that the meeting will result in a new church, the finest upon this side of the river."

WITH THE WORKERS

E. J. Harlow has begun work with the church at Corona, Calif.

Oscar Ingold is in a meeting with the church at Helena, Okla.

H. O. Breeden dedicated the new church building at Alameda, Cal., January 17.

The church at Hobart, Okla., is being assisted in a meeting by Evangelists Fife and Son.

A reception to the members of the church, given by the pastor, was a feature of the life of the First Church, Seattle, early in January.

The church at Table Grove, Ill., where F. S. Nichols is the pastor, has begun the publication of a weekly paper, for the closer fellowship of the church.

O. F. Jordan is delivering his stereopticon lecture on "The Slums and Boulevards of Chicago" in many places. He is in the First Church of Danville, Ill., this week.

Sunday, January 24, was observed as educational day by the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y. The address was delivered by L. C. McPherson, vice-president of Keuka College.

F. B. Sapp, the North Dakota Secretary, calls our attention to a misprint in his article in the issue of January 23. Instead of saying Fargo "has more saloons" we should have said "no saloons." Mr. Sapp continues, "I am greatly pleased with 'Alexander Campbell as a Preacher' by A. McLean. The gifted writer stops too soon."

I. J. Cahill, pastor of the Central Church of Christ, Dayton, Ohio, is preaching a series of Sunday morning sermons on the following themes: "The Declaration and Address;" "The Sermon of the Law;" "The Magnitude of the Disciples' Work, At Home;" "The Magnitude of the Disciples' Work, Abroad;" "The Disciples' Opportunity for Leadership;" "A Church that Can Not Be Downed."

C. R. Stauffer has been attending lectures at Auburn Theological Seminary during the past few months. He writes: "I am very much pleased with the spirit of the seminary. I never heard a Disciple minister make a more earnest plea for Christian Union than Pres. Stewart made one day before his class of seniors. The other professors lay little stress upon creed or dogma and emphasize the more essential things. It is gratifying to know that the leading spirits of all denominations are thinking along the same lines. There are three of our men in the seminary and they give us the most courteous treatment."

F. F. Walters, on the first Sunday in March will enter on the pastorate of the First Church, Joplin, succeeding W. F. Turner, who has been there ten years. This is our largest church and best equipped plant in Southwest Missouri. Bro. Turner closed there January 24. During the two years of Mr. Walters' services at Springfield he has served at 39 funerals, 25 weddings, preached 289 sermons, attended 1,222 meetings, made 2533 calls, received into the church 558, of the number, over 300 were by primary faith. The building has been redecorated and many repairs made and all debts paid, missionary offering increased from less than $100 to over $600 last year. C. W. B. M. and Woman's Union have been organized and all departments have been almost doubled. Church membership is now about 700, Sunday-school average almost 300. These are second only to one other church in Springfield.

A new $40,000 church will be erected by the congregation at Salina, Kansas.

Austin Hunter, Indianapolis, Ind., is available for meetings in March or April.

C. C. Atwood, pastor, is doing the preaching in a meeting at Soldier, Kansas.

There are sixty preachers studying in Oklahoma Christian University at Enid.

The new church at Stafford, Kan., will be dedicated February 7 with Geo. L. Snively in charge.

G. B. Kellum, of Dexter, Mo., has been called to the pastorate of the church at Ponca City, Okla., where he succeeds S. S. Phillips, who goes to Eureka, Kan.

Miss Annette Newcomer, state secretary of the C. W. B. M. of Iowa, is spending a month's vacation in Texas. Mrs. Slayton will receive and answer the mail during the absence of the secretary. The Iowa C. W. B. M. is entering upon a campaign for 2,000 new members before the Pittsburg convention.

A new way of creating interest in missionary work is being tried by the Endeavor Society of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb. It is a reading contest, which began February 1. The Society was divided into two sections, with a leader for each, who provides the readers with a list of books. The contestant reading the largest number of books will be awarded a prize.

Eureka, Ill., January 28, 1909—Since moving to Eureka, L. R. Thomas has spent twenty-three Sundays with the church at Brownstown, Ill., and twenty-nine Sundays with Baders. There were fifty-five added at Brownstown, and thirty-four at Baders. He also spent seven Sundays at Joliet with sixteen added, making a total of 105 in fifty-nine weeks.

Dr. W. R. Dale, who has been serving the Christian Bible School of Sumner, Illinois, for twenty years, has been re-elected for the ensuing year, and with his usual zeal and earnestness he is leading his school to the front in attendance and interest. Dr. Dale is an elder and also chairman of the Official Board of his church, president of the local Sunday-school Superintendent's League of the city, superintendent of the temperance work in his county, a faithful member of the Board of Education, a splendid optician, druggist and salesman, and with all these duties has time and money for his Master's service.

Concerning the work at Rowland St., Syracuse, N. Y., we quote from a personal letter: "We have everything in our disfavor as far as equipment is concerned, yet have added 71 members to a membership of 57 in eighteen months. Our Bible school has grown from an average attendance of 50 for the year just preceeding my coming till during 1908 we have averaged throughout the year 114, and at present we are averaging 140. We have not had a contest nor a boom, but have simply worked steadily. We have new scholars nearly every Sunday and I think have a remarkable school when you consider that our seating capacity is only about 100 in the main room of our chapel, and our school has to meet in two sections at different hours. Last year, in spite of the hard times, we raised $2,651, in comparison with $750 during the year preceding my coming. We bought a new site on a much better street and have it about paid for now. Plans are on foot to build in the spring if we can finance the proposition."

The church at California, Pa., is in a meeting, assisted by Edw. McKinney.

The church at Little River, Kan., is planning to erect a new house of worship.

A "Boys' Christian Endeavor Society" is another unique feature of the work of the First Church, Warren, Ohio.

There were 663 present in the Bible-school of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, January 24. The school at once set the mark for 700 the following Sunday.

Joseph L. Garvin, pastor of the First Christian Church, Seattle, Wash., has been given a weekly corner on the editorial page of the Seattle Daily Star. The department is called, "Garvin's Corner," and enables Mr. Garvin to give a weekly message to the paper's 40,000 readers each Saturday.

The annual report of the church at Grant Park, Iowa, where John McD. Horne ministers, shows the church to be in a very prosperous condition. There are twenty-six members of the C. W. B. M.; Christian Endeavor Society, ninety-four; during the year there were one hundred additions to the church; present membership, 450. The C. W. B. M. has organized a relief department to care for the needy of the community.

There were 501 additions in the meeting at Central Church Des Moines. Chas. Reign Scoville and his helpers won a great victory. Of the meeting the editor of the Christian Union says:

"Des Moines is experiencing a marvelous awakening. The influence of the meeting has gone into different denominations, and many of the big down town churches reported many converts yesterday, something very remarkable for some of them. Evangelist Scoville and his helpers, are holding noon day meetings at some shop or factory every day, have spoken at the county jail, held a mammoth service in Bob King's saloon Thursday night, and have arranged to speak to the street car men and policemen this week, besides addressing the student body of Drake and Highland Park College, and the Still College of Osteopathy, and last Sunday the men at the Y. M. C. A., with Mrs. Scoville speaking at the Y. W. C. A. The largest meeting ever held in the state of Iowa, was that held by Evangelist Scoville at the University Church eight years ago.

CHICAGO CHURCH NOTES.

Mr. Charles E. Hauck, the secretary of the Cook County Sunday-school Association, spoke briefly at the ministers' meeting on the "Church Membership Instruction Class." This is a modern adaptation of the catechism class.

The chief address at the ministers' meeting last Monday was by Dr. E. E. Carr, editor of the Christian Socialist. He showed what seemed to him the socialistic tendencies of the Bible.

Parker Stockdale was taken suddenly ill with appendicitis a week ago Monday and rushed to Park Avenue Hospital for operation. He is now doing nicely. The prayers of his brethren go up in his behalf.

Earle M. Todd recently of Manchester, New Hampshire, visited the ministers' meeting Monday.

The Ashland Avenue Church has raised money enough to be self-supporting the coming year. J. E. Futcher, the pastor, is preaching Sunday evenings in a hall to get room for his audiences.

PUSHING OUT THE WALLS.

As an indication of the development of the Sunday-school work in Missouri, the following incidents are given:

The school at Centralia has outgrown the house and in order to accommodate the organized classes, arrangements are being made to use the offices of the City Hall until the new church building is completed.

At Paris, the Young Men's class taught by the pastor, F. W. Allen, has been kept from growing beyond a membership of thirty because of the lack of a special room. They are planning for a new building and in the meantime the class will hold its session in the Boys' Club Room, where it can grow. The room is a block from the church house, but the class will march up in time to join in the closing exercises of the school. The school at Lancaster has outgrown the house and arrangements are being made to use some of the law offices in the neighborhood, or the court house, until their new house is completed this summer.

Kirksville's church house is entirely inadequate to accommodate the school, and the prospects of growth which come from the Adult Bible Class, compel them to build an addition which will be especially adapted to adult classes.

The Carrollton school which has met in the Sunday-school room for years, has been compelled to move into the main auditorium.

The Mexico church, although it has a magnificent new building, is hunting for more room to accommodate its classes.

The First Church at St. Joseph will soon be compelled to build a new house to accommodate its growing Sunday-school.

Oh, for an architect that could design a church house which would be adapted at once to adult Bible class work, and as an auditorium for public worship and preaching.

Deaths

STOUT—Dora Jewell Stout, wife of John Arthur Stout, minister at Artesia, N. M., died at the home of her husband's parents in Kansas City, on the 29th of December. Mrs. Stout has been declining for over a year, and her life is offered up as one more sacrifice to the awful white plague which holds America in a vise-like grip. In the lingering months when it was a fight against such strong odds, "Dora" as all who knew her had come to call her, never voiced a word of complaint. She was brave, and her thoughts were always of those who were helping her. Her memory is a benediction to her many friends through the Central West. Funeral services were conducted the last day of the year by W. L. Bowen, and D. Y. Donaldson, both of Kansas City, Mo. The lonely and heart-crushed husband has returned to his field of work in Artesia, but the vision of "Dora" will always beckon him on to higher aiming, nobler purpose, and keener sacrifice for the Christ whom both so dearly loved. NELSON HASTINGS TRIMBLE.

BETHANY, NEBRASKA.

Last year the Bethany church raised $3,000 for current expense, $2,000 for missions and paid $7,900 into the building fund. The church membership is 669, Bible school 395, C. W. B. M. 147, Juniors 86, Intermediate 40, C. E. 184. The new church building is about half completed. The main auditorium with galleries will seat 1500 and the basement about 1,000. The building will cost $35,000 and will be finished next fall. It is 85x110 feet on the ground.

THE HUB OF THE EMPIRE STATE.

Just now Educational Day has the 'right of way' in our state, and because of the new enterprise at Keuka College a number of the churches throughout have sent in offerings, and others promise to follow. Jefferson Street, Buffalo, with $116.00 heads the list. In addition to this, one of the members made an individual gift of $200.00, so that this good church is not falling behind in any degree during the centennial year.

Affairs at the college are moving along nicely. The work for next year is being outlined, and will probably contain a Bible Department. The Trustees from the Disciples hope to be able to suggest a man for the office of President before Commencement.

Several new ministers are assuming the duties of churches in our state for the first time. M. E. Chatley comes to Wellsville from Ravenna, Ohio, where he has had a very successful pastorate.

William L. Fisher, the new pastor of the First Church (West Fifty-sixth St.), New York, comes well equipped for the arduous duties of that field. Graduating from Bethany in the class of 1899, he has received the Bachelor of Divinity degree from Yale, in which institution he was awarded an Oxford scholarship. He has just finished a course of study in England, prior to his taking his present charge.

New York will probably have two Centennial churches this year: Kehr Street, Buffalo, and the Auburn mission. Both of these are in excellent localities and give promise of steady and permanent growth. Roy E. Deadman bids fair to repeat his record of the Cincinnati church in the Kehr Street mission. There he made a living-link church in Foreign Missions out of a mission chapel in one year.

W. C. Prewitt of Niagara Falls has been assisting Arthur Braden in a meeting with the Auburn Church in which there were about thirty accessions in the three weeks of meetings.

L. N. D. Wells is very busy in his church work in East Orange, N. J. There have been more than sixty accessions to the church there since the new building was dedicated. Z. T. Sweeney begins a meeting there February 28, and Marion Lawrence is with him March 14.

Before we can do any effective work among the immigrant or the foreigner in New York it is necessary to have a basis from which to work, and this Joseph Keevil is attempting to establish through his Brooklyn church. He is attempting to erect a three story mission building this spring and has sent out an appeal to the brotherhood for aid. It is a good work and deserves hearty support.

Lowell C. McPherson of Keuka College will hold a meeting for the Flatbush (Brooklyn) Church in February.

The New York churches miss the rallies which have been held by the Foreign Missionary Society for some years. These gatherings have been looked forward to with a good deal of interest as opportunities for coming in touch with the workers from the foreign fields. It is hoped that next year the plans may permit the trips among our churches as before.

The State Convention of the New York Christian Missionary Society will be held in Syracuse June 30, July 1, 2 and 3. The arrangements for entertainment will be handled by the Men's Leagues of the two churches of Syracuse.

Syracuse. Jos. A. Serena.

APPEAL TO NEW ENGLAND DISCIPLES.

The New England Board is striving earnestly to establish new churches wherever a nucleus of sufficient strength is found to warrant the expense of locating a missionary.

The board appeals earnestly to all established churches in New England to make a most liberal offering for the extension of our home work. Most of our church papers are in sympathy with the New England work and are using every effort to forward its interests and have solicited items of news, and the Century particularly urges every Disciple Church in New England to appoint a correspondent to send a news letter at least once a month recording the general conditions and urging the general extension of the work.

Let every Disciple who has a church home use every effort and make every reasonable sacrifice to extend our cause and thereby provide church homes for those who are less fortunately situated.

Address all communications referring to the New England work to the undersigned.

John A. Gardner, Cor. Sec.

RECENT ANNUITIES.

The American Christian Missionary Society has recently received annuities as follows: $500 from a friend in Richmond, Va; $500 from a friend in Iowa who already was on our books as an annuitant; $300 from friends in Ohio who had previously given us money on this same plan; also $300 from a sister in Michigan, and $100 additional from a sister in Greencastle, Ind.

The fact that several of these who have already given us money on this plan, send in other gifts, is the best possible evidence of their satisfaction with the manner in which the American Christian Missionary Society handles these trusts. We heartily commend their example to many others in our brotherhood. By making bequests for educational and missionary work it is by no means an assurance that it will ever reach the organization for which it was intended. Wills are being tested and broken daily. Here is a splendid investment with assured income to those who need it, and likewise with the certainty that the money will be used according to your intention.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE.

at the door, and though this was most unusual Winston only quietly moved his head when a bitter blast came in, and a man wrapped in furs stood in the opening.

"I'll put my horse in the stable while I've got my furs on. It's a bitter night," he said.

Winston nodded. "You know where the lantern is," he said. "There's some chop in the manger, and you needn't spare the oats in the bin. At present prices it doesn't pay to haul them in."

The man closed the door silently, and it was ten minutes before he returned and, sloughing off his furs, dropped into a chair beside the stove. "I got supper at Broughton's, and don't want anything but shelter tonight," he said.

Winston had no esteem for his visitor, but men are not censorious upon the prairie, and Western hospitality is always free.

"Where have you come from, Courthorne?" he said quietly.

The other man laughed a little. "The long trail," he said. "The Dakotas, Colorado, Montana. Cleaned up one thousand at Regent, and might have got more, but some folks down there seemed tired of me. The play was quite regular, but they have apparently been getting virtuous lately."

"And now?" said Winston, with polite indifference.

Courthorne made a little gesture of deprecation.

"I'm back again with the rustlers."

Winston's nod signified comprehension, for the struggle between the great range-holders across the frontier and the smaller settlers who with legal right invaded their cattle runs was just over. It had been fought out bitterly with dynamite and rifles, and when at last with the aid of the United States cavalry peace was made, sundry broken men and mercenaries who had taken the pay of both parties, seeing their occupation gone, had found a fresh scope for their energies in smuggling liquor, and an opportunity transferring cattle, without their owner's sanction, across the frontier. That was then a prohibition country, and the profits and risks attached to supplying it and the Blackfeet on the reserves with liquor were heavy.

"Business this way?" said Winston.

Almost as Good.

Little Ikey came up to his father with a very solemn face.

"Is it true, father," he asked, "that marriage is a failure?"

His father surveyed him thoughtfully for a moment.

"Well, Ikey," he finally replied, "if you get a rich wife it's almost as good as a failure."—January Lippincott's.

CHILD SAVED
By Simple Change to Right Food.

When a little human machine (or a large one) goes wrong, nothing is so important as the selection of food which will bring it around again.

"The Doctor, and I also," writes an Ills. woman, "consider that we owe the life of my little four year old niece, to Grape-Nuts food.

"From the time of her birth, her stomach was so weak she could not digest milk or any food we could think of, although we tried about all the Infant Foods known. The doctor gave me no hope—called the trouble Intestinal consumption.

"At 18 months the child could barely sit alone, her body was so weak, and her brain did not seem to be properly developed.

"One day, having some trouble with my stomach, I brought home a package of Grape-Nuts and started to use it. The thought came to me that a very little of the food made soft in some cream might be good for the little one.

"I gave her some Grape-Nuts thus prepared and she soon became so fond of it that she would reach out her little thin hands and cry at the sight of a saucer with a spoon in it.

"She ate Grape-Nuts not only in the morning, but at night also and since the first has never missed a day. She is now, at four years, a strong, healthy child with a good straight back, fine bones, and firm muscles. Her mind is bright also.

"We stopped all medicine, so we know that it was Grape-Nuts and not medicines that saved her."

HERBERT YEUELL AT RENSSELAER, INDIANA.

Rensselaer's most wonderful meeting has just closed. Never has the town been so quickly and so thoroughly aroused and so deeply moved as it has in the seventeen days' meeting just concluded by Evangelist Herbert Yeuell.

There was no time for preparation, for he came on short notice and went to work. Bro. Yeuell's motto was "do it now," and consequently every one got busy at once. The press was busy, hurrying feet and busy hands carried invitations of the services to every house in town, while window cards and street banners announced that Yeuell was preaching at the Christian Church. Interest was immediately created and people came flocking to see and hear. Soon the audiences were overflowing the great building and penitents were filling the front seats at every service.

Discouraged churches said there is little hope of a revival in Rensselaer, for three or four others meetings had practically failed. They did not count on the church that was pushing the meeting and the evangelist that was leading the forces. They did not know that wherever Bro. Yeuell went there had to be a revival.

All of the fine compliments that have been passed on Bro. Yeuell are true. He is a great preacher because he has a message that must be delivered even at the cost of his own life. He does not spare himself, for souls are worth the sacrifice. He knows how to get along with the religious neighbors. He preaches the gospel in love and shuns not to declare the whole truth, yet he retains the friendship of all. The business men closed their stores earlier than usual to attend the services, a thing they had never been know to do before.

To properly finance a meeting is usually a problem, but not so in the Yeuell meetings. Offerings are taken every night and on Saturday nights he gives an illustrated lecture that is of such great merit that the most highly educated people of town crowd in to see and hear and leave a substantial remembrance in the basket at the door. Mr. Yeuell is a masterful lecturer and is one of the best equipped men on the road.

Many things contributed to the success of the meetings; among them was the work of Mrs. Yeuell. She at once proved herself an indispensable adjunct to her husband. She organized a "smile chorus" that gave most valuable service. Her personal work in and outside of the meetings was exceedingly commendable. Her pleasant and effective way of approaching persons out of Christ made her easily the most successful soul-winner of all the personal workers.

Bro. Yeuell brought into the meetings as singing evangelist Bro. Wm. Speer, of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago, now of Frankfort, Ind. Bro. Speer is a singer who loves the Lord with his whole heart and sings for souls. Every service was prefaced with an earnest prayer to God for his blessings on the meeting, then he would lead the chorus and congregation to the most spirited and spiritual songs in the book.

In many respects this was an ideal meeting. It was too short to permit of all the harvest being gathered, is the one imperfect part of it, but it was intensely spiritual; it was adapted to local needs; it won the respect of all classes of people; it brought 124 persons forward to either confess Christ or to place their membership with the church; it was larger than the church in which it was held, for other churches had additions during the meeting. Among the number that came forward, 92 were by confession—many of them heads of families. The church is greatly strengthened and now will have an enrollment of about 500 members.

Bro. and Sister Yeuell deserve the great success that crowns their efforts in every place. They unite with us in giving glory to God for the splendid victories that have rewarded their efforts while in Rensselaer.

NEWMAN MEETING.

Thirty-nine responses to invitation first three weeks at Newman. Bro. Bloom continues. 274 in Sunday-school January 24. Sixty-five in pastor's class of men. Twelve graduates of Teacher Training addressed by Supt. Miller, of Rantoul, and diplomaed by their teacher, Charles Bloom. After a short sermon in the morning, Bro. Bloom called for pledges to cover $2,100 indebtedness. About $2,400 came in response, afterward raised to $2,600. Entire church and community hold Charles Bloom in highest esteem. His downtown office for men is a model of attractiveness and usefulness. Sister Bloom's Juniors hold state banner for 1908. A great people and pastor are doing things here. Brother J. G. McNutt, of Oklahoma, was the master workman under whose lead the splendid edifice was erected. Bros. L. R. Thomas and Lyons are among the beloved pastors of recent years in Newman. All have contributed to, and all will rejoice in the recent victories under the leadership of Charles Bloom.

SPRINGFIELD, MISSOURI.

Geo. L. Peters, of South Joplin Church, succeeds F. F. Walters in the Central at Springfield. He graduated from Eureka College in 1897, taking A. M. degree later. His pastorates have been in Girard and Taylorville, Ill., Mound City and South Joplin, Mo., where in three years he has added nearly 300 to the church, made a Sunday-school second only to one in Joplin and a C. E. one of the best in this district. On the last Sunday in February, I humbly, lovingly, bow myself down and out of the pastorate of the Central Church, giving way to that princely fellow, Geo. L. Peters. I assure him the loyal support of hundreds here who have been our strength and arm of power in wielding the gospel sword. F. F. Walters.

DIDN'T KNOW
Coffee Was the Cause.

Many daily habits, particularly of eating and drinking, are formed by following our elders.

In this way ill health is often fastened upon children. A Ga. lady says:

"I had been allowed to drink coffee ever since I can remember, but even as a child I had a weak stomach which frequently refused to retain food.

"The taste of coffee was in my mouth all the time and was, as I found out later, the cause of the stomach rebelling against food.

"I now see that it was only from following the example of my elders that I had formed and continued the miserable habit of drinking coffee. My digestion remained poor, nerves unstrung, frequent headache, and yet I did not suspect the true cause.

"Another trouble was a bad, muddy complexion for which I spent time and money for creams, massaging, etc., without any results.

"After I was married I was asked to try Postum, and would you believe it, I, an old coffee toper, took to Postum from the very first. We made it right—according to directions on the pkg. and it had a most delicate flavour and I at once quit coffee, with the happiest results.

"I now have a perfectly clear, smooth skin, fine digestion and haven't had a headache in over two years."

"There's a Reason."

Pimples Cannot Live

When The Blood Is Purified With Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

Trial Package Sent Free.

Pimples, blotches, eruptions, etc., simply disappear like magic when you shut off the supply of impurities which cause them.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers go into the blood through the same channel as food. They stimulate and nourish it. They destroy foreign and unnatural bodies found there and remove all impurities very quickly.

In many cases pimples and eruptions disappear from the skin in five days.

These little wafers are so strong that immediately after they go into the blood their beneficial effects make themselves known. The blood is cleansed rapidly and thoroughly, the impure is separated from the pure blood and the waste matter and poisons are carried from the system.

The person who suffers the humiliation of pimples, blotches and eruptions should know and feel that the blood is in bad condition and delay is quite dangerous, and is liable to effect many organs quite seriously.

Purify your blood and you give nature the means to successfully fight all manner of disease. Calcium Sulphide is one of the ingredients from which Stuart's Calcium Wafers are made, and it is the strongest and most powerful blood invigorator known to science. This wonderful purifier is endorsed by the entire medical profession and is generally used in all doctor's prescriptions for the blood and skin.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers peculiarly preserve the strength of Calcium Sulphide better than other methods—thus giving the most rapid cures owing to the purity of the ingredients and their freedom from decay, evaporation and chemical weakness caused by many latter day modes of preparation. Stuart's Calcium Wafers are sold by every druggist. Price 50c, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. DEDICATION IN DUNREITH, IND.

The third Sunday in January L. L. Carpenter dedicated the new Christian Church in Dunreith, Ind. He raised easily far more money than was needed. This veteran of the gospel is still vigorous and effective in appeal and has dedicated to date 735 churches. He stated that he had less money to raise in Dunreith than on any former occasion. This consecrated and active band of workers there had practically raised it all in advance. Some two years ago, the writer held a successful meeting there, thoroughly reorganized the church, and the new building came as a fruitful result. The congregation is now highly elated and will move forward to the accomplishing of larger things. Several members of the New Castle Church and pastor were present to assist and give. Monday evening, following the dedication, the writer preached, and there were three splendid additions.

S. S. Offutt, of Lawrenceburg, Ind., who has entered the general evangelistic field, took hold of the meeting Tuesday evening and will continue it indefinitely.

There have been large crowds, growing interest and additions from the start. The situation omens a large ingathering. Evangelist Offutt is preaching a plain, direct gospel, and the people are hearing with deep conviction.

Work moves along prosperously in New Castle, Ind. This county seat church hopes to accomplish many worthy "Centennial Aims," and to supervise and assist the county churches. Dunreith has been greatly aided by the members here. Five good additions since last report—one young man who we hope will study for the ministry. We have an urgent "crusade" on now to pay off some indebtedness that accrued under my predecessor, and are succeeding nicely. We burned a note for $650.00 on the first Sunday and hope soon to reach the end of the debt, and then launch out for an elegant, modern new church. Our city has started a "Men's Movement" among all the churches with great Sunday afternoon mass meetings. H. G. Hill lectured here to men only recently, and captivated all hearts with a plain, straightforward message. All goes well.

T. C. Howe, Minister.

Walla Walla, Washington—Central Church, sermons and addresses, seventy-eight; funerals, thirty; weddings, thirty-eight. Added to the church: By letter and statement, ninety-six; by confession, 116; total, from all sources, $10,922. Of this, by Building fund, $5,883, by Ladies Guild $517 on organ fund; by missions and Benevolences, $850; by local work, $3,672.

Noblesville, Ind, January 25: We just closed a three weeks' meeting with the little church at Pendleton, which will result in fifty-four additions, mostly by confession of faith, and probably a major part of them men, some being the best business men in the community. We are now in a meeting at Noblesville, Ind., with C. W. Clymer.

"Not a Technical Christian"

Mrs. Lincoln once said that Mr. Lincoln was "not a technical Christian."

The impression has gone abroad that Lincoln was an infidel. In his earlier years his mind was prejudiced against Christianity by reading Thomas Paine and Voltaire. He never united with any church. His dissatisfaction with the churches of his day is implied in his much-quoted saying, "When any church will inscribe over its altars as its sole qualification for membership the Savior's condensed statement of the substance of both law and gospel, 'thou shalt love the Lord, thy God, with all thy heart and soul and mind, and thy neighbor as thyself,' that church will I join with all my heart and soul."

No, the accoutrements of religion he never wore. The technique of religion he never learned. He could not converse in the vocabulary of the creed. About many things of which men talked with assurance, he was agnostic. Certainly if we judge him by any external sign he was not a Christian.

But not even the most pronounced dogmatist feels that the last word concerning Lincoln and Christ has been said when it has been registered that he was not a church member nor a subscriber to the creeds.

The great thing about Lincoln is his soul. And how can a man have soul and not have religion?

Shelving all definitions and labels, however, it should be profitable to inquire after the great principles which wove themselves into his soul's experience making the warp and woof of that experience. Only after we have examined a man's inward experience and discovered what are the principles by which he is upheld in the burden-bearing and griefs and problems of life are we in a position to say whether or not he is a religious man and whether his religion is a Christian religion.

Lincoln believed in God and leaned upon him. We do not have a conspicuous figure in our national history who so manifestly reckoned God into his life as did the great Emancipator. With whatever doubts he may have been possessed in his earlier life his maturing soul felt the need of God and acknowledged the fact of His companionship and support. After his election, facing the probability of a rebellion, his spirit was burdened with the sense of his own helplessness and his need of the resources of divine aid. His farewell address as he was leaving Springfield pleaded for the prayers of the people, a plea that was repeated in a score of cities at which his train stopped enroute to Washington. Later in receiving a deputation of Evangelical Lutherans he said, "In taking up the sword this government declared that it placed its whole dependence upon the favor of God. I now, humbly and reverently, in your presence, reiterate the acknowledgement of that dependence."

His wrestlings in prayer while battles were in progress were an open secret to his generals and secretaries. Napoleon's aphorism about God being on the side of the heaviest battalions was contradicted by Lincoln's deep concern to be "on the Lord's side."

Lincoln believed that God ever discloses His will in the progress of events. He was no far off king to be talked about, but a present active power. God was the real Commander in Chief. Therefore Lincoln was alert to catch His orders. "Whatever appears to be God's will, I will do it," he said.

Here is the secret of his wonderful patience. He was charged with hesitation, timidity, lack of "backbone," cowardice, even insincerity. Delegations representing now one plan, now another, pulled at his coat tails. All the while his ear was listening for God's plan. He therefore could wait. He interpreted a battle won or lost as significant of the divine will. He studied always to act in such a course as would give him the backing of God's forces. Therefore he never attempted the impossible.

He was no fanatic. Led by the impulse awakened as a youth at the sight of slave-selling in New Orleans, he had said, "If ever I get a chance to hit that thing, I will hit it hard, by the Eternal God." With this passion he might have grasped his first chance of power to emancipate the slaves. But no, that would have proved ineffectual, for the north was not ready for such an act. The border states were not ready. To have acted too soon would have lost the cause. God had not yet gathered His forces behind His servant. When God's strategem was made plain the servant's pen signed the great paper. The fanatic wins no victories because he does not co-operate with God. But to Lincoln's soul the battle was the Lord's and he would wait on Him.

Lincoln's soul had this rare quality that what faith it had was its own and not the copy of another's. His mind was poisoned against technical and conventional religion by his early reading of anti-Christian books. He is said to have written an essay of considerable ambition against the Christian faith. No argument could make him a believer. Only life itself could teach him. And the wondrous simplicity of his nature is nowhere better illustrated than in his willingness to sit at the feet of this teacher. The vast problem of his office drove him to God. It was too big for him alone. His great heart could not endure the responsibility except for the witness in him that God, too, shared it.

So while lacking the phrases of the creeds he possessed the essential experience of which creeds are but the petrified remains. His religion has the more significance in that it was not a profession of his intellect, but a necessity of his soul. He saw God because his heart was pure. Without accepting the dogma about Christ probably no more Christ-like soul has ever stood in the white light of national leadership. At first learning the Bible's words to attack the theory of the book's inspiration, he later learned to know the intrinsic richness and inspiration of these words without avowing his acceptance of any dogma about them.

None of us can help the regret that Lincoln was not a "technical Christian," that he did not attach himself to the church. What an enrichment of the church's history could he have made! How appreciably would the addition of his great life to the church have augmented the power and usefulness of the church! But while we regret the isolation of his religious life from the great company of those who together strive to know God and teach Him to others, let us not charge the responsibility wholly to Lincoln. Let the church itself confess the main responsibility. In setting up the creeds of men as terms of fellowship, not Lincoln alone, but multitudes of men with the mind of Christ have been forbidden to walk with Him.

And let us Disciples of Christ increase our efforts for the reestablishment of that simple, undogmatic, un-technical faith once for all delivered unto the saints, within whose large fellowship Lincoln would have been glad to have found a place.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

WHY CORPORATIONS ARE CALLED SOULLESS

The following was the greeting the stokers, trimmers, and host of minor employees of the White Star Co., who worked heroically to save the Republic and its passengers, received upon landing in New York City: "You men will receive your pay slips on Thursday morning at 11:00 o'clock. Your wages will date up to the time the Republic sank on Sunday night." If cash was needed a small amount was promised, to be deducted from their pay when they reached Liverpool. No pay could be received until back in Liverpool and the company is required by law to return stranded sailors to the port of departure. A New York World reporter tried to get the men to say what they thought about it but all but one or two declined on the plea that they would be blacklisted if they said anything.

BUSINESS MANAGEMENT FOR CITIES

The Iowa legislature is considering an enlargement of the application of the famous Des Moines "commission plan" of city administration by extending the privilege to cities of one thousand or more. Many of the smaller cities of the country are adopting it. It makes city administration a matter of business instead of politics and governs by means of a small board, each member of which is at the head of a department of the city's administrative affairs. Each of these officials is held accountable for his bureau and large powers are given the people by referendum rights. Spoils of office are despoiled by large civil service applications to the system. With power of "recall" i. e. the right of the electorate to recall from his office one who proves recreant, the system becomes the most nearly non-partisan and business like yet proposed. In Germany the office of mayor is as purely a business affair as that of president of a railroad system and the mayors are chosen by the corporation as a railroad president is chosen by the board of directors. Mayoring is an occupation and men are called from one city to another and promoted or demoted according as they show ability. There is no politics in it.

THE CREEP OF THE TIDE

As surely as the tide creeps over the victim that cannot move off its sands does the rise of temperance legislation slowly creep upon its foul victim, the un-American saloon. Idaho bids fair to soon be in the local option list of states, Washington promises to follow, Tennessee outlaws both the saloon and the brewer, Indiana surprises even the most sanguine by the sweep of great majorities in the counties as fast as they vote, and state prohibition is being considered in nine state legislatures.

Last year 11,000 saloons were abolished and territory equaling in extent the states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Missouri, Kentucky, and Tennessee was added to "dry" territory, and then we shall have to throw in West Virginia, to tell the whole truth. About 40,000,000 people are now granted the boon of bringing up their boys away from the yawning temptations of the open saloon and last year bestowed that Christian right upon 4,300,000 of them. This year of grace bids fair to make its chief laurel that of making more "dry" territory than any other in history.

Chas. Stelzle is in England studying, among other things, the new movement for temperance in British Trades Unionism. The recent national meeting of the American Federation of Labor strangled every effort of "personal liberty" (the alias of saloon license) to get even a hearing. At the next convention there will probably be a great temperance rally. The great leaders of labor are all for temperance.

EPILEPTIC FARMS

There is no more pitiable unfortunate than the epileptic. A thousand times more pitiable is it when he must be confined with the insane. There every suggestion of his surrounding is depressing and calculated to hasten him to the same end. His misfortune was once counted uncurable, but like all other bodily ills it is yielding to the scientific arts of the specialists. The National Association for the Study of Epilepsy recently held its eighth annual meeting in Indianapolis. They report that seven states have made special provisions for these unfortunates and thus care for five thousand of them. Iowa has an "Epileptic Farm" where the precious medicine of work out-doors and an occupation that leaves a feeling of independence is combined with expert treatment for their cure. They are the inmates of a hospital instead of an asylum. They are surrounded with curative suggestions instead of the depressing environment of hopeless dementia. They largely pay their own way. Here is another evidence of the coming of benevolence in our governmental charity. Some day we will shudder at the pictures of our spoils delivered system of caring for society's unfortunates.

Illinois has ten thousand epileptics. The legislature is asked for an appropriation to provide the best separate care of them. When they get through with factional politics and the statesman-like problem of determining which clique shall rule they may have time enough left to draw their salaries and consider a humanitarian problem like this one.

REFORM SENATORS

The Senate of the United States has received a notable accession of senators-elect and La Follette will no longer be lonesome. In each case it has been by a great public campaign the necessity of which argues very eloquently for the direct rather than the second-hand election of representative law-makers. In each case also it means the retirement of some man whom the people were convinced represented some other interests more than their own. In Iowa, Gov. Cummins won a fifteen years' battle. In Kansas, Joseph Bristow won after a campaign never surpassed for moral ardor. La Follette was one of his most effective campaigners. In Oregon Gov. Chamberlin was the choice of the people and the action of the legislature in electing him upon public demand in the face of the two fold situation, that he was of the minority party and that great pressure was brought to bear to make party paramount over public will. Charles J. Hughes was elected by Colorado as a public protest against Guggenheim, and Jones from Washington defeated Ankeney who was a sheet anchor of "the interests." Shively from Indiana will represent, if he clings to his old principles, the most radical of popular demands. The return of Stone of Missouri and Penrose of Pennsylvania was not the result of popular but of party approval. Nebraska will doubtless adopt the Oregon law for the election of senators and many of the friends of Wm. J. Bryan believe it will result in sending him to the senate, for while it is expected that Nebraska's next legislature will be republican, it is thought the popular love of Mr. Bryan and the feeling that such men as he, regardless of party should be in the nation's councils, will result in giving him what many hope will be a long career of usefulness in the senate. Likewise is it to be hoped that Mr. Roosevelt will represent New York state during the remainder of his career. Not by a second-hand election, such as has been demonstrated makes the conserving body of our congress the representative of extreme partyism and least the wise conservers of national interests, but by the popular will placing such men as Bryan and Roosevelt, seasoned by experience, of character above suspicion, ripe in statesmanship, and too big to be party hide bound, will the senate be made what it was designed to be—the legislative body of dignity, wisdom, and a sober second thought, the greatest deliberative body in the world.

THE CARE OF THE CHILDREN

No topic is challenging more consideration at the present time among those interested in human welfare than that of the child who is at the mercy of the fates. Some months ago the president was asked by those interested, to call a national conference on The Care of Dependent Children. This he did and it was one of the most notable of the series of unofficial conferences he has called, all of which testify to the place gained by the social question in the affairs of the nation. The president opened the conference and the keynote both to his address and to the conference may be found in his declaration that the aim should be "to make the conditions surrounding the child that cannot be put in a home, as nearly as possible like those which would obtain were the child in a home," and, "where possible, the thing to be done for the child is to provide a home for it." The conference declared that in all cases the cause of dependence should be inquired into that measures for prevention may be studied, that children should be placed in homes as far as possible, that the state should both charter and inspect all agencies caring for children and also supervise the educational provisions in the same, and that a bureau should be established by the national government to investigate all conditions surrounding the problem of dependent and defective children, that it may be dealt with not only sympathetically but effectively.

The fifth annual conference of the National Child Labor Committee met in Chicago in the closing days of January and was the most notable meeting yet held by that body. It was attended by manufacturers, business men, physicians, settlement workers and many others interested in the care of the children. For five years the watchword has been to save the children from the factory, mine and workshop, and through the efforts of the association the nation has not only been awakened, but laws passed in many states and the conscience of society aroused on behalf of the little workers. To this watch cry, the needs of the street trades was added by the Chicago conference and attention was strongly called to the fact that there were 1,100,000 little wage laborers on the farms of America—not farmers children working under the sympathetic supervision of parents, but hired children. Dr. Woods Hutchinson raised a question that will ere long press for consideration when he declared it was imperative that the 15,000,000 school children of the country should be relieved of the "grind" that threatens to despoil them of a real education in our zeal to teach everything and do it all out of books.

The dominant note of the conference was that something must be provided for the child that is taken from the shop and factory and that his education must be not merely of "the expanded bulb at the upper end of him" but of his hand and heart as well as his head.

New Jersey has taken the lead in providing that children out of employment shall be kept in school, and that no child shall go to work until he has either finished certain grades or is sixteen years of age. This bridges the chasm between the compulsory school limit and the age of opportunity for employment, as well as doing something adequate to force a certain standard of intelligence into our future citizens where there is not inclination to acquire it otherwise. An effort is being made to repeal this law, but the lovers of the little ones are centering all efforts to prevent it and thus preserve in this state an example for work in others.

Besides the general needs considered by the White House Conference, this Chicago meeting also urged with great insistence that a Federal Bureau be established, not only that a work might be done that the census cannot do, but that it might be continuous and also back the study of the problem with federal authority.

One of the startling revelations made, and a type of the work that a Federal Bureau could do, was in the investigations of Dr. Britton. He found that the child who gets into the Juvenile Court is the child that is prematurely sent to toil and kept from school. He found that of those over 14 years of age only one in sixty-five had finished the eighth grade and that eighty-three per cent had not finished the sixth grade. All but thirteen out of 100 had been at work, most of them as newsboys, messengers, and errand boys, in other words, in the unsupervised street trades.

Last year Ohio passed a law providing scholarships for the children of indigent parents that were taken out of work by the child labor laws. This is a type of the constructive legislation that must follow the saving of the child from bondage to industry, and with that provided by New Jersey furnishes suggestions for the later codes relating to this absorbing problem.

The Positive Value of Negative Truth

Not infrequently of late we have received letters affirming that the writers agreed with us in our contention that faith in Christ as Savior and Lord, and submission to his leadership and authority constitute the only test which can be imposed on a Christian. All other matters must be left in the realm of opinion, and cannot be made tests of fellowship. Yet these friends add, in one or two instances, "It is the things you deny or seem to deny, that cause the trouble. Why not leave all mere subordinate questions to individual decision, putting your emphasis upon the things you believe, which are the great verities of the gospel?"

We are so heartily in sympathy with the principle here stated, and so anxious to make it the basic factor in the utterances of the CHRISTIAN CENTURY that we wish our readers to consider it with us, and to observe its meaning and its limitations.

No message is ever effective that is not positive. There is a power in certainty, even in assurance unfounded upon substantial knowledge, which is wholly lacking in tentative and hesitant pronouncements. The man who puts forth his message with the air of finality is the one who impresses his listeners. The shallowest of imposters understands this trait of human nature. How much more, then, is the man of deep convictions effective when he is uttering the truths of whose certainty he has made sure.

No preaching is ever permanently valuable which is doubtful. If a religious teacher is disturbed by doubts upon the questions in the Bible and Christian doctrine, he understands full well that these are not matters for his public discussion 'till he has reached some firmer ground. That every really thoughtful preacher has such questions from time to time will not be denied. A man who has ceased to doubt and question has ceased to grow. For doubt and question are the aids to deeper and more enduring faith. But the great truths which have grown to be sure and unshaken will be the themes upon which a note of clear and constant insistence will be sounded.

It is at this very point, however, that the question arises, What is positive preaching? Does it mean only the things which the preacher shares with all men of Christian life, or does it also include those further aids to faith which come by new investigation of facts, removal of debris, and the attempt to discover the deeper foundations of our holy religion? For example, a correspondent writes, "If I did not believe the Bible story of man's origin, I would leave that alone and lay emphasis on his duty and destiny. If I did not believe in the literal character of the story of Jonah, I should leave that to the man who did, and should 'double-up' on Isaiah. If I did not believe in the unity of Isaiah, I should leave that, and go to what I did believe."

No words could state more clearly our own convictions regarding matters which are purely subordinate, such as many questions of date, authorship and historicity are shown to me. The preacher who insists on parading merely doubtful views and unproved hypotheses of criticism or of science as if they were matters of vital moment, errs fatally in his use of the law of proportion, puts second things first, and only disturbs and alarms those whom he ought to comfort and convince. But if the statements he makes, however disquieting and revolutionary, are essential to a knowledge of the nature and purpose of the Word of God, the work of Christ, and the duty of the church, then no feeling of diffidence, or even of fear can shield him from the reproofs of conscience if he neglects to proclaim the whole counsel of God. We have certain terms which we apply to men who, we are convinced, understand the nature and significance of baptism and yet hesitate to speak upon the subject with insistence, because, as we conclude, they are hampered by denominational relations. What of the man who has equally strong convictions on other matters fully as essential to a competent knowledge of God's revelation, and yet declines to speak through fear of offense?

No study is more rewarding that that of Jesus' use of negation. He shared most of the great convictions of his people. It was in his denials that he angered their leaders. They and he both believed in the validity of prophecy, in the reality of the Kingdom of God, in the need of repentance, in the coming of the Messiah, in the resurrection and in the judgment upon sin. It was when, by direct statement or clear inference, he denied the finality of the law, the sufficiency of Moses, the permanence of the temple service, the value of legal rites, the crass messianism of the schools, and the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees that they turned upon him with deadly malice. Even his claims for himself never stirred them to wrath and violence as did his denial of their cherished traditions.

The story of the early church is the same. The Christians and Jews lived on terms of toleration, almost of good will, at first. The arrest of the apostles was not the result of intelligent hostility, but rather the effort of the authorities to prevent the dangers of frequent and tumultuous gatherings. These acts of repression soon ceased, the good feeling grew, and even a large number of the priests became Christians. No affirmations the apostles made concerning Jesus and the gospel disturbed these relations. It was only when Stephen began his positive denials of cherished beliefs that the storm arose. He had invaded their most sacred precincts, not by emphasis on the positive truths of the faith, but by denial of the final and complete authority of Moses, the law and the temple. His blood only could atone for these offenses.

In the case of which of the reformers from Luther to Campbell has the case been different? It is not what they have affirmed, but what they have denied that has caused controversy, persecution and progress. Luther denied the right of the church to sell indulgences and the value of acts of penance in securing pardon. Calvin denied the right of pope or priest to pronounce where God's will alone was supreme. Wesley denied the doctrine of human inability, which had come as a pall of fatalism in the wake of the sterner Calvanism. Campbell denied the right of men to obscure the primitive unity and simplicity of the church with human devices. In every one of these instances the basic elements of the faith were held in common. Even the Roman Church would not have denied the positive claims of the reformers. It was their denials which wrought the disturbances and brought the new light.

The case is quite parallel today. It is probably of small moment that men should disagree over the interpretation of "mind" or "spirit" in John 3, or the genuineness of the omitted verse in Acts 8, or the authorship of the Book of Hebrews, or the historical significance of the symbols in the apocalypse. But when incontrovertible facts, like the age-long development of Hebrew legislation from the days of Moses, onward, the actual rather than the traditional relation of Solomon to the wisdom writings, the Babylonian origin and nature of the second part of Isaiah, the Maccabeean origin and apocalyptic nature of the Book of Daniel, the parabolic character of Jonah and Esther and the prophetic use of history, tradition and even of legend for purposes of religious instruction, are denied in the interest of a false view of verbal infallibility of the Bible, then it becomes the right and duty of the defender of the Scriptures against the dead hand of the past to protest.

It is the task of the lover of God's Word first of all to ascertain its true nature by patient study of the facts. No declaration of loyalty to the Bible, no setting of piety against genuine study, can compensate for the neglect of those obvious and sufficient proofs which the Bible so freely supplies regarding its growth, purpose, inspiration and authority. Against claims made for the Scriptures which not only could not be maintained, but which actually obscured its true character and mission, our fathers set themselves like a wall of fire. A part of the work they accomplished. A part they could not even foresee. It has become the heritage and the privilege of this generation to further remove the stumbling blocks in the way of questioning faith. We are little concerned with the thousand items in which opinions may vary, and in which the personal equation will always be a controlling factor. But some facts which historical study has made clear beyond all misreading throw such light on the manner in which the Bible came to us, and the purposes and limitations which control its messages, that he fails in his duty as teacher and preacher who does not make known these facts in a constructive and urgent way. They are not ends in themselves, but they are the most useful means our generation has of reaching the ends of more intelligent comprehension of the Word of God, clearer discrimination between the temporary and the abiding, and fuller confidence in the divine nature and redemptive mission of Him of whom it speaks.

For this reason we emphasize once more the need of a positive message, and the inclusion in such a message of such facts of historical study, and only such, as are essential to a convincing knowledge of God's Word, and of its great central message, the Christ.

Paragraphic Editorials

The statistical report by Dr. H. K. Carroll on religious bodies in the United States shows among other significant facts, two bodies of the Disciples, one of them qualified with the word "conservative" in parentheses. If we had been arranging things, we surely would have had this skeleton in our closet kept hid, at least until after the Pittsburg convention. That convention will gather to celebrate the promulgation of the only possible basis of union among Christians. To have our dissension flounted to the world in this our Centennial year is most embarrassing. Yet, no doubt, the great Orderer of events knows what he is about. Perhaps only by such humbling experience as this can we be brought back to the spirit and program of Thomas Campbell.

Our proposal of an idea big enough for our men to work at has met with varying responses. Mr. Ewers in his department suggests this week that the Christian union goal, not being an end in itself but a means to the conversion of the world, is hardly a "big enough" idea. Dr. Hugh T. Morrison, jr., of Springfield, Ill., has the temerity to criticise his older brother's proposal on the ground that it is "too big" an idea to be practical and suggests that the men's business be "to hunt out the weak spot in the church and go after strengthening it and then go after something else. The brotherhood should be a substitute for an assistant pastor. It should be to the pastor what the 'old guard' was to Napoleon—a resource for emergencies." These are good ideas. Let us have more of them. It will be remembered that we proposed our "idea" only as a starter. What idea do you think is big enough for the men to work at?

No better illustration of the way a lie hurts the cause that makes and uses it can be found than the deliberate publication by the liquor interests of the claim that Abraham Lincoln was a habitual drinker. The investigation to test this claim has revealed facts of such a contrary nature as to show that even at a time when drinking was common, Lincoln was a teetotaler. We had hoped to present a facsimile of Lincoln's temperance pledge to accompany Dr. Logan's authoritative article in this issue but found that it could not be prepared in time for the press. No more effectual temperance illustration could be used than the story of Lincoln's growth away from the unchallenged custom of his New Salem associates into the deepest temperance convictions resulting is the absolute inhibition of the drink habit.

Professor Ira M. Price of the University of Chicago, one of the members of the International Lesson Committee, starts with his Palestine Travel Study Class for Egypt, the Holy Land and Asia Minor on Feb. 20 from Boston. This is the same course of travel and study that has twice been conducted by Professor Willett and once by Professor Mathews. As the American School in Jerusalem is this year in charge of Professor R. F. Harper, a brother of the late President Harper and a member of the University of Chicago faculty, there will be additional advantages offered the class in its Palestine studies.

This is a notable year for great anniversaries. Poe, Lincoln, Darwin, Gladstone, Holmes, Tennyson and many others come to mind in the list of the distinguished men who were born in 1809. One of the earliest of these anniversaries was that of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, which occurred Feb. 3. This was celebrated in the University of Chicago by a concert given by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, the program of which included Mendelssohn's Mid-summer Night's Dream, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and two selections from Wagner's Tannhauser. The influence of a life like that of Mendelssohn is so notable and uplifting through the heritage of his music that a date of this character could not be passed over by any intelligent and music-loving community. The notable services of such an organization as the Thomas Orchestra, in its interpretation of the musical masters of the world, places a city like Chicago under a debt of obligation to it for which no financial return can adequately compensate. Music is one of the expressions of the divine life and those who have helped to make it a common possession are among the benefactors of the world.

A short time since Mr. John R. Mott of the International Young Men's Christian Association issued a volume of addresses on the "Claims and Opportunities of the Christian Minister." This book has now been supplemented by a very valuable series of pamphlets dealing with the same general theme. Among these brief treatments are the following:

The Claims of the Minister on Strong Men—Dr. George A. Gordon.

The Right Sort of Man for a Minister—Bishop McDowell.

The Modern Interpretation of the Call to the Ministry—Dean Bosworth.

The Preparation of the Modern Minister—Bishop McDowell.

The Minister and His People—Phillips Brooks.

The Minister and the Community—President Woodrow Wilson.

The Call of the Country Church—Rev. Arthur S. Hoyt.

The Weak Church and the Strong Man—Dean Bosworth.

The Minister as Preacher—Dr. C. E. Jefferson.

There is no theme of great moment to the church in this period nor to the Disciples of Christ in this Centennial year than that of the replenishment of ministerial supply. These pamphlets, which are accompanied by a stirring letter from President Roosevelt, may be obtained from the Students' Young Men's Christian Association, 124 E. 28th Street, New York City.

W. R. Warren, our Centennial secretary, has hit upon a very admirable device for increasing the public knowledge in reference to the Disciples. It is a brief statement of the origin and purposes of our brotherhood, prepared in such a way that it can be inserted in any local secular paper. No doubt such use can be made of it in thousands of places where the Disciples are little known. There is scarcely a minister or leading layman in our churches who could not secure from the editor of his local paper the insertion of this important and timely reading notice of the Disciples of Christ by making the request. Not infrequently it will be found that the editor is willing to publish a much more extensive statement if it can be well prepared. In this way much can be done to increase the public knowledge of the Disciples in this, our Centennial year.

As we go to press the sixth general convention of the Religious Education Association is convening in this city. Its progress is noticeable in the wealth of material presented. The general theme is "Religious Education and Social Duty." Professor Francis G. Peabody of Cambridge, Mass., is the president of the association and his address will be a notable feature. Professor Coe presents "The Annual Survey of Progress in Religious Education" and President King of Oberlin will speak on "The Future of Religious Education." President Eliot of Harvard is to discuss "The Ethics of Industrialism," and other addresses are to be made by Hon. James Bryce, the British ambassador, Miss Jane Addams of Hull House, Professor Henderson of the University of Chicago, and President Mitchell of South Carolina. The departmental sessions, covering all the fields of religious education, are full of interest, and ample programs have been provided for them. The evening sessions will be held in Orchestra Hall and the day sessions in churches on the south side. We shall hope to give a competent report of the convention next week.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first four months of the current missionary year amounted to $21,951, a gain of $10,436, or more than ninety per cent. There has been also a gain of fifty-four contributing churches, twenty-five Sunday-schools, fifty-four Endeavor societies, and ninety individual gifts. The gain from the churches as churches amounted to $3,275. The gain in annuity gifts is $5,084. The receipts for the month of January amounted to $3,210, a gain over January, 1908, of $2,572. For the month there was an all around gain in the number of offerings from every source and in the amount likewise from every source. This is especially encouraging.

The missionaries in the various fields are reporting many additions. The work seems to be prosperous and expanding in every direction. The educational work grows in dimensions. A new station will soon be planted in Africa. The new station on the border of Tibet, Batang, is now doing service. The need for buildings and other equipment is most urgent.

It is important that every church, which has not already done so, order their March Offering supplies at once. The time for the offering, March 7, is not very far away now.

Great Interest in the March Offering

The prospects for the March Offering were never brighter. Large numbers of orders for supplies are pouring into the office of the Foreign Society daily. We have been compelled to put some of the supplies on the press the second time, so great is the demand.

The churches have caught the Centennial spirit. There is a wide-spread purpose to increase the number of contributing churches. Some are acting as secretary for a county and are planning to enroll every church.

One of the most wholesome signs is the growing interest in the Living-link service. Note the following as illustrative:

"The First Church has Living-link aspirations this year."
John R. Ewers, Youngstown, O.

"We expect to make Hancock County a Living-link this year."
V. W. Blair, Greenfield, Ind.

"We are trying for a Living link."
Edmond M. Waits, Christian Tabernacle, Fort Worth, Tex.

"I have it in my heart to lead this church into the Living-link column this year." C. B. Reynolds, Alliance, O.

"Our Centennial Aim is to become a Living-link."
Elmer Ward Cole, Huntington, Ind.

"Our investment of $600 in Foreign Missions last year was the greatest investment this church ever made." Ernest J. Sias, Frankfort, Ind.

"I am going to do all that is in my power to make Central a Living-link."
J. O. Shelburne, Dallas, Tex.

We might quote from others. These are sufficient.

And the determination to make this a record-breaking year is reported from every quarter. "We expect to make the best offering in the history of our church" is an expression now so frequent in our mail as to become commonplace.

"We are with you for the biggest offering in the history of the church."
G. N. Stevenson, Muir, Mich.

"This church means to make the best offering in its history."
G. Lyall Smith, Terrel, Tex.

"We are planning for our best offering."
E. S. Baker, Jackson, Tenn.

"I will do all I can to make this the best offering in our history."
C. C. Crawford, Elmira, N. Y.

"I hope it will be the greatest offering ever made by the Temple Church."
Peter Ainslie, Baltimore, Md.

"We hope to break the record this year."
J. T. Sharrard, Flemingsburg, Ky.

"We shall try to make this the greatest March offering in the history of the church." M. Lee Sorey, Dodge City, Kans.

"Watch King City this year!"
John Meyer Asbell, King City, Mo.

"This church will make a larger offering for Foreign Missions than ever before." G. W. Ross, Vermont, Ill.

"I am going to pull hard for the largest offering in the history of our church." Robt. Sellers, Elwood, Ind.

These expressions of a purpose to do larger things are only examples. We could fill pages with them.

But let us not deceive ourselves with the thought of a great victory without much care and preparation, much reliance upon God, and much thought and careful planning.

The work our missionaries are doing is enough to thrill all hearts. The story of our progress in the Philippine Islands and in Bolenge, Congo Free State, equals that of any missionary history that has ever been written. For the brief time and the small force and limited equipment, nothing in all the annals of missionary history surpasses the great success which has been attained. The faith and daring and liberality in these missions put us all to shame. What a rich heritage of love and faith our American churches have in these mission stations. These new born churches are our children.

And as we survey the whole field we are quickened and nerved to a larger life and holier living.

We ask the co-operation of every church. Please make no excuse. The call of the mission field is to us the voice of God. Please order March Offering supplies at once and join the great brotherhood in a Centennial effort that is sure to prove memorable.

Lincoln, the Early Temperance Reformer

By Thomas D. Logan

Dr. Thomas D. Logan has been pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Springfield, for twenty-five years or more. He is fully conversant with Mr. Lincoln's life, especially that part of it passed in the Illinois capital. What he writes, therefore, is to be relied upon.

While employed as a grocery clerk in Offutt's store in New Salem, and afterwards while in partnership with Berry, Lincoln sold liquor. It was part of the stock in trade of every country store of that period. The ordinary grocer's license allowed its sale in quantities not less than a quart. To sell in lesser quantities, a tavern license was required, and this was applied for and granted to Berry & Lincoln by the commissioners of Sangamon County, March 6, 1833. It is probable that the license was obtained for the purpose of disposing of the stock in hand, for no tavern was opened. If Lincoln was himself a drinker at this time, it was in small quantities, for even then he was regarded as a temperate man, though probably not a total abstainer. Whatever comfort liquor sellers may derive from the facts above stated is confined to this earlier period. Among the ruder surroundings in which he lived he had abundant opportunity of observing the evil effects of liquor drinking, and very shortly after his removal to Springfield, in 1837, he became connected with the Sangamon County Temperance Society, which had been organized in February, 1836. An old citizen is authority for the statement that there had been an earlier temperance society which made an exception of New Year's Day and the Fourth of July in requiring abstinence from intoxicating beverages. It is needless to say that this organization did not last long. The society with which Mr. Lincoln connected himself was uncompromising in its attitude, and its records show that such questions as the use of liquor in cooking were debated, and the practice condemned. When any of the members violated their pledges the fact was recorded against their names. The original record book with constitution and pledges is still in existence. In the second article of the constitution the members mutually pledged themselves to each other not to use any intoxicating liquor as a beverage, nor to make, vend or in any way provide them to be used by others, except for medical, mechanical, chemical or sacramental purposes. The following is the Total Abstinence Pledge.

The members of this society severally agree not to use intoxicating liquor, nor provide it as an article of refreshment for their friends, nor for persons in their employment, nor will they use, manufacture, or traffic in the same, except for chemical, medical and sacramental purposes.

In the year 1837, two hundred and sixty-three names were appended to this constitution, including resident ministers and a number of prominent citizens. In 1838 the pledge was recorded again, and a number of names secured on the 17th of January. Apparently Mr. Lincoln was not present that day, but the following entry on the page opposite the pledge explains itself: "A. Lincoln pledges himself specially never to drink ardent spirits, 19th Jan'y 1838."

In the Washingtonian Movement.

The next temperance wave which swept over Springfield was the Washingtonian Movement with which Mr. Lincoln heartily identified himself. Its principles commended themselves to that sentiment, so characteristic of the man, which found expression in the Second Inaugural Address: "With malice toward none, with charity for all." On February 22, 1842, he delivered an address in the Second Presbyterian Church before the Washingtonian Society. It is entitled "Charity in Temperance Reform," and has been reproduced in full in many of the Lives of Lincoln. A single quotation will show the essentially Christian Spirit of the man even at this period. In arguing to show that those who had not been drukards should take the same pledge, he adds: "But, say some, we are no drunkards, and we shall not acknowledge ourselves such by joining a reformed drunkards' society, whatever our influence might be. Surely no Christian will adhere to this objection. If they believe as they profess, that Omnipotence condescended to take on himself the form of sinful man, and as such to die an ignominous death for their sakes, surely they will not refuse submission to the infinitely lesser condecension for the temporal, and perhaps eternal, salvation of a large, erring and unfortunate class of their fellow creatures."

Endorses a Sermon.

In the development of Mr. Lincoln's views in regard to the evils of the liquor traffic, he was soon led to give his approval to a much more advanced position. In the year 1853 an effort was made to secure from the legislature the enactment of a prohibitory law to take the place of the license law which was then in force. On January 24 Rev. James Smith, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, of which Mr. Lincoln was a regular attendant and supporter, his wife being a communicant, preached a sermon on: "The Bottle: Its Evils and the Remedies." The sermon produced a deep impression, and the next day the following note was addressed to Dr. Smith: "The undersigned having listened with great satisfaction to the discourse, on the subject of temperance, delivered by you on last evening, and believing that, if published and circulated among the people, it will be productive of good, would respectfully request a copy therof for publication." Thirty-nine names are appended to this request, including the name A. Lincoln. A few citations from the sermon will show the nature of the sentiments which were endorsed:

"The liquor traffic is a cancer in society, eating out its vitals, and threatening destruction; and all attempts to regulate it will not only prove abortive, but aggravate the evil. No, there must be no more efforts to regulate the cancer; it must be eradicated; not a root must be left behind; for until this is done, all classes must continue exposed to become the victims of strong drink; and the woe in the text must abide upon us: 'Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that puttest thy bottle to him.'

"Strenuous efforts have been made, but in this community without effect, to convict the liquor seller of the violation of the law, but, if I am rightly informed, in no instance has this been done; and until he is convicted in a court of justice, the liquor seller must be viewed as innocent; so that the friends of the law must bear the burden. The reason is obvious, an attempt was made to regulate that which should have been altogether abolished. . . . The most effectual remedy is in the passage of a law altogether abolishing the liquor traffic, except for mechanical, chemical, medicinal and sacramental purposes; and so framed that no principle of the constitution of the state, or the United States, be violated. . . . If, however, the enaction of such a law cannot now be obtained, still, let every friend of temperance frown upon all effort at regulating the cancer. Any license law, however stringent, must eventually increase the evil. Much better to leave the liquor seller to the freedom of his own will, and to conduct the traffic at his own hazard ;but hold him responsible for all the evil that he does."

A Serious Test.

But the supreme test of Mr. Lincoln's temperance principles came when the news reached Springfield that he had been nominated for the Presidency, and that a committee would soon arrive to notify him officially. It was an event of no ordinary importance in a little inland town, and some of its citizens felt that the guests must be entertained in the conventional way, and they offered a stock of the finest wines and liquors for their entertainment. Now Lincoln was not a narrow-minded man. He had been at Washington, and he knew that it was customary to serve spirituous liquors in receiving distinguished guests. He knew, too, that the absence of the customary refreshments might be attributed to penuriousness rather than to principle. Yet he stood firm, and respectfully declined the offer of his friends, and served only God's beverage of pure water to the distinguished company who visited his honest home.

Testimony of Citizens.

The testimony of all the older citizens of Springfield who were associated closely enough with Mr. Lincoln to make their evidence valuable, is to the effect that he was an abstainer from the use of strong drink. Some time a reward of $50 was offered for any evidence that he ever took a drink of intoxicants. A reporter interviewed several of the older citizens, and the following statements were given:

Dr. William Jayne, a native of Springfield, who had known Mr. Lincoln since 1836, and continued to be one of his most intimate friends throughout life, said: "One could with safety wager any sum that no man in Springfield ever saw Lincoln take a drink. He was liberal in his views. What others did was a matter for their own conscience. His best friends used liquor, but Lincoln loved them for their virtues. When the committee came to notify him of his nomination, a friend sent him a quantity of liquor, but he refused to serve it himself, or to permit Mrs. Lincoln to do so. He said he never had offered liquor to any one and he did not intend to begin then. His temperance speech is well remembered in this city, and is found in all complete histories."

Mr. E. R. Thayer, Springfield's oldest merchant, declares positively that Lincoln never drank intoxicants. He says: "I remember one very striking illustration. When Harrison defeated Van Buren, there was a great frolic in Springfield. I do not believe that there has ever been such a jollification since then. The center of the celebration was a big saloon and there champagne flowed like water. It was a favorite trick to knock the neck off the bottle by striking it on the stove. Lincoln was present and made a great deal of sport with his speeches, witty sayings and stories. He even played leap-frog, but he did not drink a thing. Every one knew him as a sober and an exceptionally temperate man. I was a member of a military company, and I remember we invited him to make us a temperance address in one of the churches. He did so and made a good speech on the subject."

Mr. John W. Bunn, president of the Springfield Marine Bank, who was very closely associated with Mr. Lincoln socially and politically for ten years preceding his election to the presidency, said that Lincoln was liberal as to other men, but that he himself never took a drink. "During all the time I knew Mr. Lincoln I never saw him take a drink of intoxicants. I never heard of him taking a drink. His reputation in this community was that of a strict teetotaler. At the time he was elected President he came to me and asked me what he should do as to wine at the social affairs which were sure to follow his elevation to that office. He told me he never had had wine or liquor in his house and he wanted to know whether it was going to be necessary now. He presumed that it would be. I had seen him where others were drinking, but he did not drink with them."

Mr. Henry W. Rankin, who in his boyhood lived near New Salem, and remembered Lincoln since, when a boy but ten years of age he had seen him in the court house at Petersburg, and who afterwards read law in Lincoln's office, is very clear in his recollection of the habits of the great emancipator. He says: "He was a strict temperance man. Intoxicants were sold at the store in which Lincoln worked at Salem, and he possibly may have handled the liquor, put it up in jugs, and dispensed it, but he never drank any of it."

The men whose views are cited above are not temperance fanatics, and they have no interest in misrepresenting the facts were they different from what has been stated. While they are all men of the highest character, and temperante in their habits, they are not all total abstainers, and if Mr. Lincoln had been a drinking man they would not have hesitated to say so.

Mexico and the Mexicans

The Dude—The Peon—Poverty and Privation—Backs Bent by Burdens

BY J. A. ADAMS.

What is the first thing you see in Mexico? An enormous hat, a construction that makes the "merry widow" hat look feeble and stunted in its growth. It has the appearance of a wash tub with a joint of stove pipe set in the middle. Underneath this overshadowing head covering may be a dude or a peon. If he is a dude, the hat is made of felt or fur and is heavily braided and decorated. It may have cost from $60 to $100. It is a wonder and tops all other ambitions in the way of clothes. A peon's hat is made of straw, and a number of heads bunched together have the appearance of wheat shocks in a harvest field.

The dude wears a short jacket and skin-tight pantaloons. The wonder is how he gets into them. I think his tailor must stand him up in his shop and sew them to the curves in his legs. At San Luis Potosi a dude appeared in the crowd which always gathers to see a big northern train go through. The young ladies gazed at him spellbound, and I walked around him two or three times myself, he was so dazzling. Of course, he was smoking a cigarette, and of course, his mustache was twisted to a point.

In contrast with this Mexican swell the peon is a sorry creature. Over his shoulders is a coarse blanket, his pants are of thin cotton and his feet are bare, or perhaps his toes are sticking through a pair of sandals. He is shivering in the cold morning air at the little station high up on the mountain plain. He looks hungry and half-fed, and stares hopelessly at the well dressed passengers who saunter up and down the platform while the train is taking a rest, as it does so often on small provocation.

Freight Carriers.

And the women also are at the station. They are bare-headed—the funds of the family are exhausted on the man's hat—and bare-footed. They also look cold and hungry and utterly poverty-stricken. About the only possession of the family seems to be children and dogs. The houses are little huts of one room, usually without doors or windows, just openings, and frequently the opening is overhead—there is no roof on the house. Many of the shacks are made of stalks and look worse than the cheapest of stables on a western farm. The rows of little houses in which the negroes live on the Louisiana sugar plantations are palatial compared with some of these Mexican huts in the little towns. I think I have never anywhere seen such depressing appearances of poverty. It makes a sorry introduction to the sister republic for the American visitor who crosses the Rio Grande at Laredo and rides over the cactus covered plateaus to Mexico City. I found it difficult to shake off the bad impression and to persuade myself that there is such a thing as a pleasure trip to Mexico. But the pleasure came later.

Perhaps if Mexico were not so old one would think less of its poverty, for every new country has its pioneer stage of privation and scanty appointments. But Mexico is the oldest country in the New World. It had a civilization a thousand years ago, and yet today it is civilized only in spots. For ages and ages generations of peons have been toiling up and down the sides of these mountains—for Mexico is a land of mountains—like ants crawling over their little hills, and they are still toiling in the old way, still crawling in and out of rude little huts. Every old cathedral in the country, every castle on the hilltops, every high wall or causeway or bridge or viaduct, is a monument of almost incredible toil. The loads carried on human backs are almost unbelievable. One could declare without much stretch of imagination that there are as many automobiles in Chicago as there are wagons in all Mexico, outside of a few leading towns. In Cordova, a city of from 8,000 to 10,000 people, where we spent a few days, we saw but one vehicle, and it was the only one in town. There is a large cathedral in the city, which has great pillars and lofty arches. It was built 234 years ago, and all the material was carried up the hillsides by human beasts of burden, with some help from the little burros. There is a railroad running up from the coast to the interior which I am told was built without the use of a wagon. Men took the dirt up in baskets and carried it. Just outside the City of Mexico they are now filling in a low place for a garden and they are carrying the earth in baskets.

The men are not large, but a little fellow picks up a trunk weighing 250 pounds and carries it from a railroad station to a hotel a mile or more distant; in fact he sometimes sets it down at a house in the country five miles away. His backbone seems to be made of chilled steel and his muscle is the toughened fibre inherited from long ages of toil.

And yet with all this dreadful labor and depressing poverty, the Americans who are here assure you that the peons are a happy class of people. They seem so fully persuaded of this fact that I rather wonder that they do not turn peons themselves. If a people can be so happy in straw hats, cotton pants and bare feet and a big load of freight on their backs, what is the use of all this terrific scramble of civilization and this running the world over for knowledge or pleasure? It is really strange how little we think necessary to make the other man happy.

Americans also assure us that the peons are lazy. It is amusing when looking out of a Pullman car window at a procession of leather-colored Mexicans staggering under their loads to have the man who is leaning back on a cushioned seat tell you that they are lazy, "very lazy," and to assure you that better wages and better fare would be a positive detriment to them. "Give them a dollar and they would quit work," is a common remark.

The missionary is about the only man who expresses sympathy for the peon. The commercial spirit is not careful or prayerful for the welfare of the class nearest the ground.

But there are signs of improvement. Mexico is on the move. The surging waves which roll across the industrial life of America have sent a little thrill through the sister republic. The old feudal system is passing. In lower Mexico and in other outlying districts there is still a contract system which means semi-slavery, for it holds the man and his household by perpetual debt instead of personal ownership. But the backbone of the evil is broken, and, while the hacienda may be the center of a semi-slave community, yet the larger cities are under the influence of industrial freedom. Dr. Butler, who has been here thirty-four years, tells me that during his time wages have doubled. In Mexico City common laborers receive one dollar per day, Mexican money, which is fifty cents in our money. Mechanics are paid two dollars per day. Household servants, or "maids," are paid five pesos—dollars—per month, and given eighteen cents, or nine cents in our money, per day to buy their food. The servant problem has not reached the republic. It may come with a higher civilization. And so may strikes, boycotting, blacklisting, injunctions and other fine touches of human progress.

Lincoln's Religious Views

The Century has received some elaborate discussions of Lincoln's religious views, and the subject is undoubtedly clouded with confusion and difference of opinion. But the following statement of facts is vouched for by one in a position to speak with knowledge:

Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln were married by Rev. Charles Dresser, the Episcopal rector of the church attended by the family of Ninian Edwards, with whom Miss Mary Todd lived. But the Lincolns did not attend that church or any other, except occasionally until 1848 or 1849, when they took a pew in the First Presbyterian Church of Springfield and continued to occupy it, with their children regularly until they went to Washington in 1861. The occasion of their attending that church was two fold. While in Kentucky Mr. Lincoln saw a book on the evidences of Christianity and revealed religion of the Bible written by Rev. James Smith, D. D. who had recently become the pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Springfield. He read it in part and was so impressed by it that he asked for an introduction to Dr. Smith, and at once became a regular attendant and supporter of the church. Shortly after this, Edward, the second son of the Lincolns, died and Dr. Smith was called to minister to them in their bereavement. This led to an intimacy which continued as long as Mr. Lincoln lived, and with Mrs. Lincoln until the death of Dr. Smith. Mr. Lincoln attended revival meetings with his wife, but he was absent from the city when she was received into the membership of the church in 1852, and he did not at any time thereafter make a profession of religion.

Herndon claims in his biography that Mr. Lincoln continued to be an infidel all the time he attended the Presbyterian Church, deceiving the people as to his real sentiments; and he quotes John T. Stuart, James W. Matheny and others in proof of his assertion. But both of these men, as well as Ninian Edwards, have repudiated the statements attributed to them, and have expressed the opinion that while Mr. Lincoln may have been an unbeliever in the earlier part of his life, while at New Salem, his views were changed under the influence of Dr. Smith, and he became a believer in the truths of the Bible, even delivering an address before the Sangamon County Bible Society. Herndon has endeavored to belittle Dr. Smith and his influence over Lincoln, claiming that the book was a little tract which he had prepared for the express purpose of converting him as late as 1858, but that the attempt failed. Dr. Smith left Springfield in 1856. The testimony of all who heard Dr. Smith is to the effect that he was a very scholarly man. I have recently seen the book, called "The Christian Defence," which was published in Cincinnati in 1843. It is a volume of over 600 pages, and it is the outcome of a debate with an infidel in Columbus, Miss., in 1841. It is fully abreast of the scholarship of that date. This shows how little dependence can be placed on Herndon's statements when it suits him to read his own infidelity into the views of Mr. Lincoln. That Lincoln was essentially a Christian before he left Springfield is the opinion of many of the older citizens. The statement of Newton Bateman, who was Superintendent of Public Instruction in 1860, afterwards president of Knox College, that Lincoln said that Jesus Christ was God, cannot be successfully controverted. There is abundant evidence that he expressed Christian belief while at Washington and that he told his pastor, Dr. P. D. Gurley, that it was his intention to make a public profession of religion.

If

BY W. H. PIERCE.

If I had richest stores of gold—
Ah! poor my lot—
If I could master wealth untold
In dream or thought,
I think my greatest joy would be
To loose the bonds of poverty
Which bind the body, break the heart,
And warp the soul of such large part
Of mankind here;
For these poor ones my brethren be,
And God's scheme of humanity
Forbids that I my riches flaunt
While they are crushed by cruel want.
And yet I fear
That wealth might bring a greed for gain,
And steel my heart 'gainst others' pain;
With Lazarus my lot I'd cast
Rather than face the rich man's past
With judgment near.
If I could go to Wisdom's fount
And drink my fill,
And balance up my life account
Of good and ill,
The debit side might so outweigh
The credit that in sheer dismay
I'd go in moral bankruptcy,
Without a hope of clemency,
And ne'er repent.
And so I find 'tis better far
To bear my burdens as they are,
And do my best from day to day
With what God places in my way
With good intent;
And then, when I may quit the strife
And enter on another life,
If I may count the vict'ry won
And hear the Master say "Well done,"
I am content.

Austin, Chicago.

A German peddler rapped timidly at the kitchen entrance. Mrs. Kelley, angry at being interupted in her washing, flung open the door and glowered at him.

"Did yez wish to see me?" she demanded in threatening tones.

The peddler backed off a few steps.

"Vell, if I did," he assured her with an apologetic grin, "I got my vish; thank you."

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

A Dream of the Centennial

The Correspondent: "The Pittsburg Convention, with perhaps fifty thousand in attendance, will be a thrilling conclusion of our first hundred years of history, and a splendid inauguration of the second. Surely by it the Christian and non-religious world will be startled into enquiry, and be thus brought to realize our vast growth and power. Our centennial certainly will be grand and inspiring. Nothing since Pentecost will equal it. Already several from our church have decided to go, though the distance is great and we are not rich."

The Pittsburg Convention! Ah! I had a dream about it the other night. With the consent of "The Correspondent," and he is too far away to object, I will relate my dream in response to him. I would not positively affirm to the reader that this dream is entirely the product of the sleeping hour. Of course, I recall it while awake and consequently my account of it may be somewhat distorted.

Why Dreams are Wayward.

The most of our mental effort is simply tracing the relation of cause and effect. Some of us, even when most awake, succeed but poorly. So it should not be surprising that dreams are usually so wayward. They seem to obey no law. Mine, however, may have had a cause, or at least a suggestion to call it into play.

Long after all the other members of our household had retired, I continued to read Alexander Smellie's "Men of the Covenant." It it a book to bring the blood to the literal head, and sympathy to the figurative heart. Perhaps a man has to be kindred to the heroes of the Covenant to fully appreciate their story; but if so, it is unfortunate all are not Scotchmen.

As for myself, I was most deeply moved by the portrayal of these wonderfully intense men of that thrilling heroic period of the church's history. I almost shouted in applause of Jenny Geddes in earnest and impetuous action at St. Giles. Then I was subdued and humiliated as I measured myself by those noble heroes at the Greyfriars church on that memorable 28th of February, 1638. To protest against the tyranny of the king, and to contend for the freedom that they enjoyed in the Word of God, sixty thousand from all parts of Scotland had come together at the Greyfriars. (Think of it, I talked with a senator this summer, who had just returned from Edinburgh, where he had been sightseeing, but he had not gone to this historic place. He did not know the past.) The Covenant was inscribed on a splendid ramskin. Hour after hour those men of iron continued with the signing of their names. Outside, one of the flat tombstones was used for a table. Some wrote after their autographs, "Until death." Some did draw their own blood and used it in place of ink. Thus, to quote Robert Burns, they "sealed freedom's sacred cause."

A Great Convention.

My blood was stirred as I read of this gathering of determined men. It was not a talk-fest. I said to myself, "surely that was in every way a great convention." Great numbers were there. It was possessed by the deepest emotion. It was characterized by a mighty purpose. It was there to act, yea to act for the God of wrath. It was conscious that it faced death, the death of hundreds of its leaders; yet it did not hesitate. A great religious solemnity filled all their hearts. They looked up and believed; they looked out to the might of the enemy and went forward.

I read on. I followed martyrdom after martyrdom of the strongest and saintliest of men. God seemed for a time to have forgotten the Covenanters; but the Covenanters had not forgotten God. At the hour of midnight I closed the book. Darkness and quiet rested upon the world. I could hear no sound; lost at times methought I could almost hear the cries of the Covenanters crucified to death.

I heard my own voice say, "We are men of weaker breed."

Are We Worthy of Our Sires?

After I had gone to bed, long I wondered as to how Christ's true followers today might serve him in really costly ways. It came upon me with great force that these did not merely talk for their martyred Christ; but followed Him to the death. Then I wondered if we, with our numerous sermons, apologetic essays, easy Gospel singing, careless Endeavor talks, great indifference to our Chrisian obligations and other things, were not seeking for ourselves a very easy service, a service not regarded highly by our Master, and one not fruitful to men. I thought of the opened veins and the signatures in blood. I continued to wonder how our life's blood might be given to the glory of God. Thus wondering, I fell asleep. And I dreamed a vivid and stirring dream. I wonder if I can relate it with form and meaning.

First I dreamt I saw on a lonely and rugged wild several souls moving forward; their bearing suggested that they were in serious converse. I said they were "souls"; they seemed not in the flesh. There was about them the atmosphere of the Spirit world. They seemed bent on a mission of eterniay. They were not noisy or hurried. Their every movement bespoke strength, confidence and victory. For the first time I felt the sublimity and the infinitude of Christian personalities. I knew that here were men whose mission compassed the universe. I was all atremble to follow them, to know who they were, and what they purposed.

The Covenanters Come to Earth.

Then I saw they were Covenanters, or rather the souls of those old heroes. Trying hard to distinguish their features I recognized them by pictures I had seen. Among others were Samuel Rutherford, Alexander Henderson, James Guthrie, John Brown, Alexander Peden, Hugh Campbell, Robert Ballie, and James Renwick. I could not take my eyes off these, our spiritual ancestors. I felt that I was gazing on unspeakable glory. As I gazed the scene changed, the wild gave place to a city of crowded streets. Great concourses of people were rushing to and fro. I lost sight of my heroes. I was sad and indignant at the rabble of the streets. I noticed many of the throng wore badges. Some carried banners and streamers. There was much jauntiness and gayety. I could see nothing of the souls I had lost to view. The "whitest souls that a world knew." I concluded, must have been offended with the thoughtless crowd, and have gone to their spirit home.

Again my dream played a trick with me. While still watching intently, a vast hall took form before my eyes. Thousands were sitting within it. I saw there were signs and mottoes on the wall. How surprised I was to read that this was the Christian Centennial Convention meeting in Pittsburg, 1909.

I was happy; for I knew that this was my convention and that numbers of my friends would be here.

Speeches Without Blood in Them.

Again, I was twice happy for it came to be all at once that the Covenanters must have been journeying here to address us. I would hear them. Our brotherhood would hear them. The world would hear them.

Yes; this was their convention, too. Were not Thomas and Alexander Campbell their sons? Most certainly. They surely would be here.

The time passed quickly. Day followed day. My heart sank within me. There were speeches multiplied. There was much of lusty song. The speeches were oratory, essays, magazine articles—but they were not life's very blood. They were delivered by nice gentlemen; but I had hoped to hear the spirit-prophets. They had not appeared. The talk-fest went on. The Crusades had some purpose. In my dream I could not make out the purpose of this vast gathering. I had the sensation of falling over an awful precipice. For a time I knew myself stunned. I could not rise. All night I wondered if I should live again.

With the dawning of a new day I found myself again in the Convention hall, awaiting eagerly the opening of the session. After my fall I seemed to have ned interest and, I eternity. They were not noisy or hurried. opening, how surprised, overjoyed, and subdued was I to see the Covenanters walking slowly to the platform. My heart burned within me. This, I thought, will be a great day in the Kingdom of the Lord. Others did not seem to see these ghostly conquerors who had been washed in the blood of the Lamb. Nevertheless, they were surely real presences. As they reached the platform they stood facing the audience for a moment, and in that moment I thought I detected in their eyes a degree of pride over these, the children of their sons, the Campbells, but the look of pride was soon lost in the celestial night and glory of their earnestness, and then they were seated. How eagerly my eyes feasted. Thought I, the wisdom of the ages will be heard today, the secrets of the throne of God will be laid bare. The mouth of the caviller will be stopped. All vain and clamoring disputations will cease.

The Spirit of Yesterday Present Today.

As I was lost in ecstatie thanksgiving. lo! the Covenanters melted into a group of our college professors and editors, as one stereopticon picture is made to fade into another. Again I was saddened, but I quickly recovered; for I said the spirit of these true men of the past has taken possession of our college and literary men and they will speak forth the spirit of the ages to our day and need.

It was even so; for soon there arose one of the group, and moved to the front. The audience was eager to hear from him an eloquent speech. This brother with classical face recently had been much in the attention of the brotherhood. Spectacular interest possessed the audience. It had not seen the Covenanters.

I felt in my heart of hearts that the conventional convention had come to a close, and that God's convention was now to begin. The talkfest was to be drowned by the upbreaking and overwhelming of the prophetic spirit. I was glad; for I had long felt a convention of speeches is no worthy celebration of our deepest life and best history.

From the group on the platform a brother well advanced in years and one whom I recognized, widely known as a teacher and writer of Christian apologetics, arose and advanced as if to speak. He carried in his hand something I could not clearly distinguish. It seemed at first a rod and then a trumpet of some sort. I had known this brother as a defender of the faith, and sometimes as a sharp critic; but now his countenance seemed especially illuminated. The glow of the eternal was upon him. Ah! methought, the spirits of the covenanters, richly have blessed him. He too is their son. He possesses their fighting blood. Even his name is Scotch. Before he uttered a word I knew he would speak no partisan message today, but rather the message of the ages, of the very essence of our religion. Indeed he contributed only of the richest and deepest experiences of his long life. The visiting covenanters had overwhelmed him with the supreme spirit of the eternal. To his mind they caused the great Christian doctrines to be seen anew and impressively in the light of love. As he talked I could see that the audience was en rapport with him and his message. The great convention now felt as never before that love was the source, the flower and indeed the all of Christianity. A new passion possessed the brotherhood. All knew that harsh clamorings among us had come to an end.

Then up rose a younger man. He, too, was an editor and teacher. Many thought that because he had been much in the attention of the brotherhood during the past year that his appearance would cause the audience to manifest much idle curiosity. Happily it was not so; for the spirit of God rested upon the assembly. The work of heart-searching and reconstruction was proceeding in all hearts. Deep repentance for heated and wasted words and pages had come to possess the heart of a great people. Criticism of others had given place to self-accusation. The covenanters double message, viz., to hold fast to the truth, but even in martyrdom to hold fast to love, was now the thought of all. The prayer of Jesus for unity had been answered in the body of the Disciples of Christ.

The speaker was of scholarly mien and beautiful diction; but he did not attempt to make a contribution to the talkfest. He simply uncovered his heart to his brethren. Very simply, but in the light and glory of their greatness did he speak to the need of the suffering men of our day.

The spirit of the convention being upon him he could not but show forth the things which he had seen and heard in his holy interviews.

The reader must not forget that I heard these men of God in a dream. So it is not strange that the most of their words are gone from me. It is perhaps enough to recall that the impression of every one in the vast assembly seemed to be that God this day spoke to his chosen Israel. However, these words with which the speaker concluded, if I call aright, were the substance of his confessional address:

I have a life in Christ to live,
But, ere I live it, must I wait
Till learning can clear answer give
Of this and that book's date?

I have a life in Christ to live,
I have a death in Christ to die;
But must I wait till science give
All doubts a full reply?

Nay, rather while the sea of doubt
Is raging wildly round about,
Questioning of life and death and sin,
Let me but creep within
Thy fold, O Christ, and at Thy feet
Take but the lowest seat,
And hear Thine awful voice repeat,
In gentlest accents, heavenly sweet,
"Come unto Me, and rest;
Believe Me and be blest."

The Disciples had come to a great moment. They were on the highest mountain top. A passion to love, to live and to die for Christ had become in them a consuming fire, destroying all hatred, malice and suspicion.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Place and Value of Baptism

I have asked and have been discussing the question: What makes a Christian? I have answered it by saying that the thing which distinguishes one who is a Christian from one who is not a Christian belongs to the inner spiritual nature; and that this nature does not depend for its production upon external relations, acts or motions of the body, but upon internal choices, attitudes and motions of the spirit. He is a Christian who is one inwardly. And I have also maintained that the union between God and man as expressed in such analogies as fatherhood and sonship (for they are nothing but analogies), membership in the kingdom of Heaven, union with Christ and with the body of Christ, depends upon what a man is in his inner nature, and not upon where he is or what he has done.

It is this personal inner condition that constitutes one a Christian, and that obtains the divine favor and forgiveness. For no other reason than what one is in his spiritual nature, is one a child of God and a member of the kingdom of Heaven. Conversion is something that takes place in the spiritual nature; and it is this which is salvation.

But while salvation begins as a personal condition, that is not all there is of it; it is also a social relation. The Christian life is first of all a personal relationship with God through Christ, and after the likeness of Christ's relationship to God. But we do not go far in the study of that relationship before we find that it implies some kind of relationship with men which evidences the genuineness of the relationship with God. As expressed by Jesus: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me,"—— "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love for one another,"—— "Even as the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many,"—— "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart—and thy neighbor as thyself. On these two commandments the whole law hangeth, and the prophets." As expressed by John: "If a man say I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he has seen, can not love God whom he has not seen."

What, now, is the relation of baptism to this two-fold aspect of the Christian life?

Its Personal Significance.

Baptism does not create Christian nature, but professes it. The Christian nature, created by faith and repentance, being given, baptism is a formal confession of it.

In any treatment of baptism it should be remembered first of all that it is a ceremony; and as such it is a physical, not a spiritual act. It does not insure the same spiritual activity or condition in every recipient of it. It may mean much or little, or nothing at all, as far as the inner personal nature is concerned. It can only suggest or symbolize, not evidence or certify spiritual reality.

John's and Peter's Baptism.

The earliest use of baptism which is brought to our attention in the New Testament was a confessional use. John came into the regions about Jordan preaching "the baptism of repentance unto remission of sins. And there went out unto him all the country of Judea, and all they of Jerusalem; and they were baptized of him in the river Jordan, confessing their sins." John did not preach baptism for the remission of sins, but a baptism which signified repentance, which was unto remission of sins.

The same significance was given to baptism by Peter, and in almost identical terms, on the day of Pentecost. "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins." It is not surprising that Peter, who was first a disciple of John, then of Christ, should have used the terms of his first teacher on the day of Pentecost. The conditions were similar to those of John's ministry. John and his disciples, and the baptism they preached, looked forward to the coming of the Messiah. Peter and the rest of the disciples on the day of Pentecost were again looking forward to a second coming of the Messiah, "whom the heaven must receive until the time of restitution of all things." Peter's baptism on the day of Pentecost, like John's, was a baptism which signified repentance.

Its Social Significance.

Since the Christian nature is social as well as personal in its relations, baptism is a socializing act and stands for the socialization of personal faith and righteousness. It is the Christian nature taking its first outward look, and taking on its implied social relationships. It is the symbolic act by which personal relationship to God passes over into social relationship to the Christian brotherhood and humanity—by which faith completes itself in fellowship.

Faith in Christ, love to God, can only realize its inner spirit and meaning in relationship with human beings, and the church is the ultimate fellowship of humanity in its first ideal yet actual beginnings. Baptism introduces into social fellowship.

The Social Christ.

It is just here that Paul's teaching concerning baptism finds its true interpretation. Paul socialized the Christ. He said that Christ had been made the "head over all things to the church, which is his body."

And again to the Corinthians he said: "Now ye are the body of Christ, and severally members thereof." Christ thus mystically becomes a social organism.

What are we to understand, then, when Paul in the same idealizing and mystic terms says: "For in one spirit were we all baptized into one body? Were they baptized into the personal Christ or the social Christ, the church? And was that social Christ their local Christian church with all of its members. good, bad and indifferent? or was it that ideal, spiritual church, composed of all those who were in real union with Christ? It was the real, spiritual body of Christ, of whom Paul thought, over against the actual Corinthian church, the universal over against the local, the invisible over against the visible church. Yet it was visible and included every one led of the spirit of God.

Baptism guaranteed no spiritual condition; but it did inaugurate the high privileges of spiritual fellowship in so far as one was capable of them, and invited the baptized to be equal to the spiritual meaning of his baptism. Baptism gave every believer the right to local church fellowship, whatever his real spiritual condition, and reminded him of its higher meaning—union with the spiritual Christ. That is the mystic, symbolic meaning of Paul's declaration in the Roman letter: "We who were baptized into Christ Jesus were baptized into his death." As Christ was crucified and buried and was raised up to a new life; so the believer crucifies and buries morally "the body of sin"—"the old man"—and arises to walk in newness of life; of which the physical death, burial and resurrection of Christ is a symbol. Baptism was a dramatic recital in symbolism of the physical death, burial and resurrection of Christ, and of the moral death, burial and resurrection of the believer.

Such was the implification of every baptism; but was moral death, burial and resurrection with Christ a fact in every baptism? By no means. There were persons in the Corinthian church who had been baptized but who were not in moral union with Christ, or members of his spiritual body. In the same letter in which Paul declares that "by one spirit we are all baptized into one body," he advises that certain wicked members of the Corinthian church be delivered unto Satan. So then the Corinthians were not actually baptized into Christ's body, the spiritual church.

In Paul's teaching the Corinthian church is idealized and described as holy, when in fact it was not; as one united body, when in fact it was not; as washed, sanctified, and justified, when in fact it was not. The church was written to and admonished in language which described the ideal Corinthian church; rebuked for what it was not, by being told what it was supposed to be.

Throughout his teaching concerning the church, it is the ideal, spiritual church, the body of Christ, to which he constantly refers. As he described the church in ideal and figurative terms, so he used baptism. Ideally a baptized man was a morally cleansed and regenerate man and a member of the body of Christ, but really he might be anything else, regardless of baptism, as some of the Corinthians were, to whom Paul said: "I thank God that I baptized none of you." Paul would have been the last man in the world to have attributed any saving or morally renewing efficacy to baptism.

Baptism with Paul as with other New Testament writers was a symbol, a figure of speech—a sign put for the thing signified—just as the word "cross," and "blood of Christ." Thus when he says, "As many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ," he is not stating an ethical fact, but an ethical ideal; and baptism is the summary figure which symbolized entrance into spiritual union with Christ. Union with Christ was a spiritual process; and Paul would be just as ready to say that one was actually circumcised into Christ as baptized into him.

But some one will ask: Is not baptism a necessary act?

Necessary to what? Necessary to entrance into the kingdom of heaven?

If by kingdom of heaven you mean "the doing of God's will on earth as in heaven," then I must answer: By no means. If to do God's will is to love him and one's neighbor as one's self, as Jesus taught, then one can enter the kingdom without it. The kingdom of God as an expression of the will of God belongs to the personal, spiritual nature, which baptism neither creates nor prevents. Can a man be baptized into the love of his neighbor, or into purity of heart? Or if a man love his neighbor and have a pure heart, can the lack of baptism prevent him loving his neighbor, or seeing God?

It is perfectly clear that baptism is not necessary for any of these things.

If by kingdom of God you mean the organized society of those who are trying to do the will of God on earth, then baptism, as in its New Testament use, is necessary to entrance into the kingdom, and to the enjoyment of such benefits as grow out of that fellowship. And those benefits of Christian fellowship are by no means trifling. Salvation is something social as well is personal. The environment of the personal life has much to do with making it what it is. The church, which is the visible fellowship of the kingdom of heaven is the Christianized and Christianizing environment of the believer's life, and is by so much redemptive in its influence.

An answer can be given now to the question: Is baptism necessary to salvation? In the primary sense in which salvation is character, and depends upon ethical union with Christ, it is not necessary to salvation; but in the secondary sense in which salvation is social influence, and baptism is made necessary to union with the redemptive society of Christ, baptism is necessary to salvation.

Tributes of the Poets to Abraham Lincoln

O CAPTAIN! MY CAPTAIN!

O Captain! my Captain! our fearful trip is done,
The ship has weathered every rock, the prize we sought is won,
The port is near, the bells I hear, the people all exulting,
While follow eyes the steady keel, the vessel grim and daring;
But, O heart! heart! heart!
O the bleeding drops of red,
Where on the deck my Captain lies,
Fallen cold and dead.

O Captain! my Captain! rise up and hear the bells;
Rise up—for you the flag is flung—for you the bugle trills,
For you bouquets and ribboned wreaths—for you the shores a-crowding,
For you they call, the swaying mass, their eager faces turning;
Here Captain! dear father!
This arm beneath your head!
It is some dream that on the deck,
You've fallen cold and dead.

My Captain does not answer, his lips are pale and still,
My father does not feel my arm, he has no pulse nor will,
The ship is anchored safe and sound, its voyage closed and done,
From fearful trip the victor ship comes in with object won;
Exult, O shores and ring, O bells!
But I with mournful tread
Walk the deck my Captain lies,
Fallen cold and dead.

THE COMMEMORATION ODE.

. . . . .

How beautiful to see
Once more a shepherd of mankind indeed,
Who loved his charge, but never loved to lead;
One whose meek flock the people joyed to be,
Not lured by any cheat of birth
But by his clear-grained human worth,
And brave old wisdom of sincerity!
They knew that outward grace is dust;
They could not choose but trust
In that sure-footed mind's unfaltering skill,
And supple tempered will
That bent like perfect steel to spring again and thrust.
His was no lonely mountain-peak of mind,
Thrusting to thin air o'er our cloudy bars,
A sea-mark now, now lost in vapors blind,
Broad prairie rather, genial, level-lined,
Fruitful and friendly for all human kind,
Yet also nigh to heaven and loved of loftiest stars.

. . . . .

He knew to bide his time,
And can his fame abide,
Still patient in his simple faith sublime,
Till the wise years decide.
Great captains with their guns and drums,
Disturb our judgment for the hour,
But, at last, silence comes;
These all are gone, and standing like a tower,
Our children shall behold his fame,
The kindly, earnest, brave, farseeing man,
Sagacious, patient, dreading praise, not blame,
New birth of our new soil, the first American.

James Russell Lowell.

THE HAND OF LINCOLN.

Look on this cast, and know the hand
That bore a nation in its hold;
From this mute witness understand
What Lincoln was—how large of mold.

. . . . .

The hand of Anak, sinewed strong,
The fingers that on greatness clutch;
Yet lo! the marks their lines along
Of one who strove and suffered much.

For here in knotted cord and vein
I trace the varying chart of years;
I know the troubled heart, the strain,
The weight of Atlas—and the tears.

Again I seen the patient brow
That palm erewhile was wont to press;
And now 'tis furrowed deep, and now
Made smooth with hope and tenderness.

For something of a formless grace
This moulded outline plays about;
A pitying flame, beyond our trace,
Breathes like a spirit, in and out.

The love that cast an aureole
Round one who, longer to endure,
Called mirth to ease his ceaseless dole.
Yet kept his nobler purpose sure.

Lo, as I gaze, the statured man,
Built up from yon large hand appears:
A type that nature wills to plan
But once in all a people's years.

What better than this voiceless cast
To tell of such a one as he,
Since through its living semblance passed
The thought that bade a race be free!

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

Courthorne appeared to consider a moment, and there was a curious little glint in his eyes which did not escape his companion's attention, but he laughed.

"Yes, we're making a big run," he said, then stopped and looked straight at the rancher. "Did it ever strike you, Winston, that you were not unlike me?"

Winston smiled, but made a little gesture of dissent as he returned the other's gaze. They were about the same height and had the same English type of face, while Winston's eyes were gray and his companian's an indefinite blue that approached the former color, but there the resemblance, which was not more than discernible, ended. Winston was quietly-spoken and somewhat grim, a plain prairie farmer in appearance, while a vague but recognizable stamp of breeding and distinction still clung to Courthorne. He would have appeared more in place in the States upon the southern Atlantic seaboard, where the characteristics the Cavalier settlers brought with them are not extinct, than he did upon the Canadian prairie. His voice had even in his merriment a little imperious ring, his face was refined as well as sensual, and there was a languid gracefulness in his movements and a hint of pride in his eyes. They, however, lacked the steadiness of Winston's, and there were men who had seen the wild devil that was born in Courthorne look out of them. Winston knew him as a pleasant companion, but surmised from stories he had heard that there were many who bitterly rued the trust they had placed in him.

"No," he said dryly. "I scarcely think I am like you, although only last night Nettie at the settlement took me for you. You see, the kind of life I've led out here has set its mark on me, and my folks in the old country were distinctly middle-class people. There is something in heredity."

Courthorne did not parry the unexpressed question. "Oh yes," he said, with a little sardonic smile. "I know. The backbone of the nation—solemn, virtuous and slow. You're like them, but my folks were different, as you surmise. I don't think they had many estimable qualities from your point of view, but if they all didn't go quite straight they never went slow, and they had a few prejudices, which is why I found it advisable to leave the old country. Still, I've had my fill of all that life can offer most folks out here, while you scarcely seem to have found virtue pay you. They told me at the settlement things were bad with you."

Winston, who was usually correct in his deductions, surmised that his companion had an object, and expected something in return for this confidence. There was also no need for reticence when every farmer in the district knew all about his affairs, while something urged him to follow Courthorne's lead.

"Yes," he said quietly. "They are. You see, when I lost my cattle in the blizzard, I had to sell out or mortgage the place to the hilt, and during the last two years I haven't made the interest. The loan falls due in August, and they're going to foreclose on me."

"Then," said Courthorne, "what is keeping you here when the result of every hour's work you put in will go straight into another man's pocket?"

(Copyright, 1907, by F. A. Stokes Co.)

Winston smiled a little. "In the first place, I've nowhere else to go, and there's something in the feeling that one has held on to the end. Besides, until a few days ago I had a vague hope that by working double tides, I might get another crop in. Somebody might have advanced me a little on it because the mortgage only claims the house and land."

Courthorne looked at him curiously. "No. We are not alike," he said. "There's a slow stubborn devil in you, Winston, and I think I'd be afraid of you if I ever did you an injury. But go on."

"There's very little more. My team ran away down the ravine, and I had to put one beast out of its misery. I can't do my plowing with one horse, and that leaves me stranded for the want of the dollars to buy another with. It's usually a very little thing that turns the scale, but now the end has come, I don't know that I'm sorry. I've never had a good time, you see, and the struggle was slowly crushing the life out of me."

Winston spoke quietly, without bitterness, but Courthorne, who had never striven at all but stretched out his hand and taken what was offered, the more willingly when it was banned alike by judicial and moral law, dimly understood him. He was a fearless man, but he knew his courage would not have been equal to the strain of that six years' struggle against loneliness, physical fatigue, and adverse seasons, during which disaster followed disaster. He looked at the bronzed farmer as he said, "Still, you would do a little in return for a hundred dollars that would help you to go on with the fight?"

A faint sparkle crept into Winston's eyes. It was not hope, but rather the grim anticipation of the man offered a better weapon when standing with his back to the wall.

"Yes," he said slowly. "I would do almost anything."

"Even if it was against the law?"

Winston sat silent for almost a minute, but there was no indecision in his face, which slightly perplexed Courthorne. "Yes," he said. "Though I kept it while I could, the law was made for the safe-guarding of prosperous men, but with such as I am it is every man for his own hand and the devil to care for the vanquished. Still, there is a reservation."

Courthorne nodded. "It's unlawful, but not against the unwritten code."

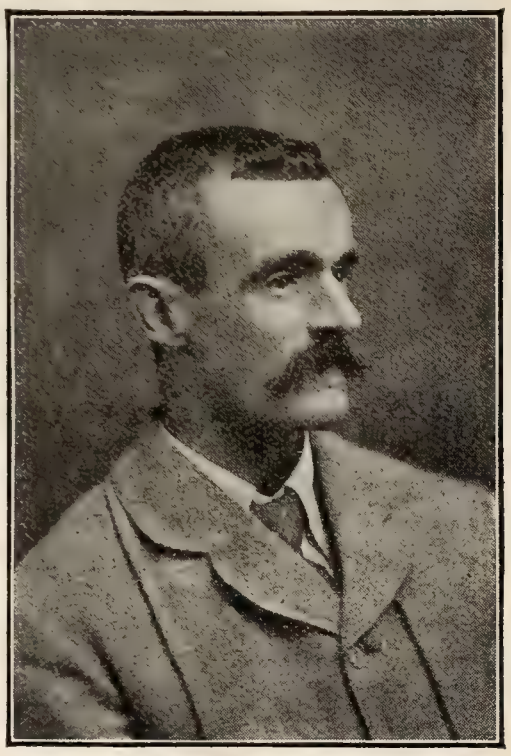
"Well," said Winston quietly. "When you tell me what you want I should have a better opinion."

Courthorne laughed a little, though there was something unpleasant in his eyes. "When I first came out in this country I should have resented that," he said. "Now, it seems to me that I'm putting too much in your hands if I make the whole thing clear before you commit yourself in any way."

Winston nodded. "In fact, you have got to trust me. You can do so safely."

"The assurance of the guileless is astonishing and occasionally hard to bear," said Courthorne. "Why not reverse the position?"

Winston's gaze was steady, and free from embarrassment. "I am," he said, "waiting for your offer."



"Then," said Courthorne dryly, "here it is. We are running a big load through to the northern settlements and the reserves tomorrow, and while there's a good deal of profit to the venture, I have a notion that Sergeant Stimson has had word of it. Now, the Sergeant knows just how I stand with the rustlers though he can fasten no charge on me, and he will have several of his troopers looking out for me. Well, I want one of them to see and follow me south along the Montana trail. There's no horse in the Government service can keep pace with that black of mine, but it would not be difficult to pull him and just keep the trooper out of carbine-shot behind. When he finds he can't overtake the black, he'll go off for his comrades, and the boys will run our goods across the river while they're picking up the trail."

"You mentioned the horse, but not yourself," said Winston quietly.

Courthorne laughed. "Yes," he said. "I will not be there. I'm offering you one hundred dollars to ride the black for me. You can put my furs on, and anybody who saw you and knew the horse would certify it was me."

"And where will you be?"

"Here," said Courthorne dryly. "The boys will have no use for me until they want a guide, but they'll leave an unloaded pack horse handy, and, as it wouldn't suit any of us to make my connection with them too

HAROLD BINDLOSS
Author of WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE and other Canadian stories.

It is unusual that an author should have written so many successful books as Mr. Bindloss without having given his picture to the public. The above photograph, however, is the first of Mr. Bindloss which has been issued in America. His face shows the strength and cleanness of line that would be expected in a man who has done everything from testing steel barrel-hoops for the Standard Oil Company to raising wheat and building railroads in Canada, sailing before the mast, and writing novels. His love for the outdoors has followed him even to his study; and there are few men writing today to whom the simple and rugged things appeal more strongly.

If you have not started reading the story, it will amply reward you to get last week's Christian Century and read this splendid serial from the beginning.

plain, it will be a night or two later when I join them. In the meanwhile your part's quite easy. No trooper could ride you down unless you wanted him to, and you'll ride straight on to Montana—I've a route marked out for you. You'll stop at the places I tell you, and the testimony of anybody who saw you on the black would be quite enough to clear me if Stimson's men are too clever for the boys."

Winston sat still a moment, and it was not avarice which prompted him when he said, "Considering the risk one hundred dollars is very little."

"Of course," said Courthorne. "Still, it isn't worth any more to me, and there will be your expenses. If it doesn't suit you, I will do the thing myself and find the boys another guide."

He spoke indifferently, but Winston was not a fool, and knew that he was lying.

"Turn your face to the light," he said sharply.

A little ominous glint became visible in Courthorne's eyes, and there was just a trace of darker color in his forehead, but Winston saw it and was not astonished. Still, Courthorne did not move.

"What made you ask me that?" he said.

Winston watched him closely, but his voice betrayed no special interest as he said, "I fancied I saw a mark across your cheek. It seemed to me that it had been made by a whip."

The deeper tint was more visible on Courthorne's forehead, where the swollen veins showed a trifle, and he appeared to swallow something before he spoke. "Aren't you asking too many questions? What has a mark on my face to do with you?"

"Nothing," said Winston quietly. "Will you go through the conditions again?"

Courthorne nodded. "I pay you one hundred dollars—now," he said. "You ride south tomorrow along the Montana trail and take the risk of the troopers overtaking you. You will remain away a fortnight at my expense, and pass in the meanwhile for me. Then you will return at night as rancher Winston, and keep the whole thing a secret from everybody."

Winston sat silent and very still again for more than a minute. He surmised that the man who made the offer had not told him all and there was more behind, but that was, after all, of no great importance. He was prepared to do a good deal for one hundred dollars, and his bare life of effort and self-denial had grown almost unendurable. He had now nothing to lose, and while some impulse urged him to the venture, he felt that it was possible fate had in store for him something better than he had known in the past. The bitter wind still moaned about the ranch, emphasizing its loneliness, and the cedar shingles rattled dolefully overhead, while it chanced that as Winston glanced towards the roof his eyes rested on the suspended piece of rancid pork which, with a little flour and a few potatoes, had during the last few months provided him with sustenance. It was of course a trifle, but it tipped the beam, as trifles often do, and the man who was tired of all it symbolized straightened himself with a little mirthless laugh.

"On your word of honor there is nothing beyond the risk of a few days' detention which can affect me?" he said.

"No," said Courthorne solemnly, knowing that he lied. "On my honor. The troopers could only question you. Is it a deal?"

"Yes," said Winston simply, stretching out his hand for the roll of bills the other flung down on the table, and, while one of the contracting parties knew that the other would regret it bitterly, the bargain was made.

Then Courthorne laughed in his usual indolent fashion as he said, "Well, it's all decided, and I don't even ask your word. Tomorrow will see the husk sloughed off and for a fortnight you'll be Lance Courthorne. I hope you feel equal to playing the role with credit, because I wouldn't entrust my good fame to everybody."

Winston smiled dryly. "I fancy I shall," he said, and long afterwards recalled the words. "You see, I had ambitions in my callow days, and it's not my fault that hitherto I've never had a part to play."

Rancher Winston was, however, wrong in this. He had played the part of an honest man with the courage which has brought him to ruin, but there was now to be a difference.

OUR READERS' OPINIONS

The letter from Clark Braden in the last Christian Century was startling, awakening sad memories and deep emotions. It recalled to mind those noble men who struggled against such men as Braden mentions and who were by them crushed and died of a broken heart. I knew them and loved them in Christ for their purity of heart and life and that they dared to accept the very liberty in the gospel for which the early reformers contended. I have not forgotten L. L. Pinkerton, nor others who felt the Jesuitical hand of heresy hunters.

For myself, I am ready to abide whatever befalls, but I will not shrink one inch from my charge that to uphold a political party that practices the granting of licenses to saloons is to deny Christ in the most brazen manner. But my second offense is in working to restore "The Revelation of Jesus Christ" to its original place by trying to justify all its claims against an unbelieving church. It shows how far the departure has gone when even those preachers who concede it a sin to license the saloon meet me with the frozen face when I contend for the integrity and intelligibility and professions of Christ's own self-revelation. It seems a greater obstacle than the other, but I stand faithfully by them both and when the battle for gospel liberty is won by the high brave stand of the Christian Century both my contentions will be accepted and honored.

Editor Christian Century: Following is an extract from a letter received a few days ago, applying for the pulpit of a certain church:

"I do not belong to the progressives or Higher Critics. I believe the old Book from lid to lid."

This is the way I answered:

"I am glad to know you believe the old book from lid to lid. That is quite the rule among disciples here in this part of Ohio. We know a number of the critics and know them to be loyal disciples, too. The early disciples believed before the New Testament was ever written, and because they believed, they wrote, and their writings make the New Testament. I think faith in the Book is good, but Faith in Christ (who was before the Book), is better. That was whom the first disciples anchored their faith to. I believe there is a lesson for disciples of today to learn, in that we are emphasizing faith in the Book more than faith in Christ. We are worshipping the creature more than the Creator." We ought never in our loyalty to the Book lose sight of Him who was the great first cause of the Book. What Christ's disciples said was good, but good only for one purpose, and that to convince the world that Christ was the long promised Messiah of the Jews, and the Savior of the world. John said, "these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through his name. The primary object was not so much faith in the writings, but faith in Christ.

A WORTHY IDEAL.

I have just finished reading Brother A. W. Taylor's paragraph on "The College President: Scholar or Endowment Promoter." After quoting President Taylor, of Vassar, to the effect that money raising is a disagreeable job for a man of academic tastes, he adds, "It requires more versatility than the ordinary or even the extraordinary teacher or scholar possesses to be a scholar, teacher, administrator and money getter. There are such men, but they are the exceptions that prove the rule. Let Christian business men raise the money." This is a worthy ideal and I am in favor of it. Now, I am not a College President, and please understand I am not an applicant. I have seen too much of the ins and outs of the proposition to have any ambition along this line. I am simply the Field Secretary of a College. This is more than a money-getting office; but this will be an important feature of the work for some time. Interest must be aroused; sentiment must be created; friends of Christian education must be made.

But "let Christian business men raise the money". Again I say, I am more than willing. There are other things more pleasing to me than money-raising. But there are few things more important. I have often thought that it was a shame to have such men as A. McLean, F. M. Rains, Stephen J. Corey, Wm. J. Wright. Geo. B. Ranshaw, H. A. Denton and Geo. W. Muckley devoting their energies to raising money or stirring us up so we would give. How we need these men in the ministry! "Let Christian business men raise the money." This suits me. But the Christian business men are busy with other interests. I see but one way out of the difficulty at present. Some of us must become Christian business men for a season. Hence I have become one. But you ask about my qualifications. Herein is a story. I have been a preacher for fifteen years at a small salary. But with this small salary I have supported a family of four, paid my way through college, taken a few trips outside of the state, bought a few books and have all my debts paid but something like $200. This ought to be sufficient. But I am willing to give way to the "Christian business man" and go back to my dreams and ideals. But we must endow Eureka College. This is my one theme.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Stephen The Martyr*

As noted in our last study, the Christian community in Jerusalem lived at first on terms of good will with the Jewish people and even with the authorities. The early attempts to suppress the apostolic preaching were unsuccessful, and the authorities appear to have decided that such measures only tended to emphasize the new teaching in the minds of the people. Gradually these disagreements faded away. Probably the authorities were never actually friendly to the apostles, but they were diplomatic enough to avoid public opposition, and the church grew under this happy regime of toleration so that even many of the priests themselves became disciples of the Lord.

Church and Synagogue.

One cannot fail to ask the question, What was the ordinary Jewish interpretation of Christianity at this time It is apparent that the defenders of the synagogue did not view the preaching of the disciples as hostile to Judaism, but only as a revival of prophetic insistence upon godly living. At the points where the work of Jesus was made prominent they would have dissented; but this was considered a mere harmless addition to the fundamentals of Judaism, and so no open breach was made. Suppose this condition had continued: what would have been the result? Could Christianity have ever become the conquering faith it proved to be? Was it not necessary that some one should arise to draw clearly the line of distinction between Judaism and Christianity? The popular impression even among the disciples seems to have been that the followers of Jesus would be the Jews either by nationality or by adoption. Perhaps if any Gentiles had at this period requested admission to the church, a serious question would have arisen as to just the proper method of procedure. Plainly the gospel was for all men, but must not all men first become Jews by proselytism in order that they might become Christians? No clear word has ever been spoken on this point, and it was inevitable that it should be raised sooner or later.

Stephen the Hellenist.

The man in whose preaching this question first made its appearance was not one of the apostles, but rather a young Hellenist, Stephen by name, who had been chosen as one of the seven helpers in the church at Jerusalem. He was well trained in the Scriptures, was thoroughly devoted to the new cause and threw himself with headlong enthusiasm into the evangelism of his Jewish neighbors. Not content with preaching the gospel in the public places where the disciples were accustomed to gather, he entered boldly into the synagogues and preached the faith of Jesus as the new and startling thing it actually was. In his interpretation of the truth Judaism was not the necessary portal to the church. A man came to Christ by faith and obedience without any necessity of conforming to the law. Moses was no longer the teacher whose words had authority. Christ alone was the Lord of the soul. The temple had served a valuable purpose, but it was now ready to give place to that invisible but constantly growing church which Jesus had established.

Such statements were nothing less than revolutionary. No words uttered by the apostles had ever provoked such inquiry, dissent, and hostility as these, and when spoken in the synagogues, they had the effect of arousing the most violent antipathy to the speaker because they seemed either to reveal the latent danger of the new faith in its threatened overthrow of Judaism or else they showed that Stephen himself was a most dangerous radical.

Saul of Tarsus.

It seems clear that Saul of Tarsus, who for the first time appears in connection with the death of Stephen, was at this time living in Jerusalem and connected with one of the synagogues. That he had been present in the city during the closing part of Jesus' ministry seems improbable. Some word would have escaped in all of his letters referring to the tragedy of the Savior's passion if he had been present in the city at that time. But soon after he must have returned, having passed a brief period in the provinces. Now he is once more in the Holy City where for ten years he had studied at the feet of Gamaliel. The synagogue of the age makes it probable that he was connected with the synagogue frequented by the people of his own province, Cilicia. When, therefore, we read that among those synagogues into which Stephen entered with his aggressive proclamation of the Christian faith was the synagogue of the Cilicians, the imagination sees Paul and Stephen face to face, the one the young and ardent Pharisee, recently the star graduate of the Jewish university and now the most brilliant advocate of Judaism, the other the young and gifted Hellenist, passionately devoted to the new cause of the Nazarene and burning with the purpose to convince his brethren of the Jewish faith that the very Messiah for whom they had been looking is none other than Jesus the Christ.

Before the Sanhedrin.

It is evident that in the contest which ensued the learning, subtilty and rhetoric of the man from Tarsus were unable to match the scriptural and convincing arguments of Stephen. This leader of a heretical sect must be silenced at all hazards. To permit him to continue his aggressive propaganda would be to invite the overthrow of that system which had been vindicated by centuries of communion with God. When persuasion ceased to be effective, when argument was refuted, there was but one thing more to be attempted and that was force. Stephen, therefore, and apparently at the instigation of Saul, was arrested and brought before the Sanhedrin for trial. That Paul was a member of the company seems probable. The charges on which Stephen was arraigned were those of disrespect to Moses and the temple. The statement of the text is that false witnesses were secured to make these charges against Stephen, saying that he had asserted that Jesus would overthrow the temple and change the customs enjoined by Moses. While we have no record that Stephen had made such statements, the whole course of the procedure seems to warrant the conclusion that these charges were not wholly false. Indeed, Stephen himself was at no pains to deny them. If he did not put his argument in precisely those terms, he none the less made it quite apparent that Moses must give place to Christ and that the temple was no longer exclusively the house of God.

Stephen's Fiery Speech.

According to custom, when these charges had been put forward Stephen was given opportunity by the president of the council to defend himself. It was a wonderful moment in his career. The choice was given him of smooth and easy words or of a tremendous home-thrust at the heart of Judaism. It would have been easy for him to say that he had proclaimed that faith which they had heard interpreted by the apostles since the Day of Pentecost, and which had given no offense until he began to preach. He might have removed their anger by disclaiming any intention of hostility to the older faith, and they would hardly have dared to proceed to violent measures even had this been their first intention. How easy it would have been for Stephen to extricate himself from his position without any serious compromise of his loyalty to the gospel. But this was precisely what he did not do. It was the one moment for which he had been waiting. His purpose was to impress forever on the thought of both Jew and Gentile the fact that the law and the gospel were not merely different interpretations of the same truth. He wished to make it forever apparent that Christianity owed nothing to Judaism, but was rather a new and distinct faith, based not on the law nor on Moses, but on Jesus Christ the Lord. Seizing, therefore, his opportunity, he charged upon them with what must have seemed almost superhuman indignation and invective. They had accused him of irreverence to Moses. What had been their own history? One of long and persistent disregard not only of Moses, but of every other prophet who had risen to guide them to God, and now what had they done in these closing days? They had actually put to death the one Prince and Teacher whom God had sent to complete the task of devine revelation and to be their Messiah and King. Gathering strength as he went on, he poured all his accumulated passion and denunciation into the one tremendous utterance, "You stiffnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, you do always resist the Holy Spirit."

The Death of Stephen.

This was no speech to pour oil on troubled waters. With fury goaded to its limit by these uncompromising and yet conclusive words, the council lost all semblance of dignity and rushed upon the prisoner with rage to tear him limb from limb. A slight concession of deference to the holy soul was made, however, when he was dragged outside the gate of Jerusalem that his blood might not be shed in the sacred streets. Thus hurried to his death, no time was lost. The horror of assassination was clothed in the legal form of stoning to death, the leaders being careful that, according to an ancient precedent, the witnesses who had brought the charges against him must cast the first stones.

* International Sunday-school Lesson for Feb. 21, 1909. Stephen, the first Christian Martyrs, Acts 6:1-8:3. Golden Text: "They stoned Stephen, calling upon God and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," Acts 7:5-9. Memory Verses 7:55-56.

Meanwhile there stood by, apparently directing these tumultuous proceedings and certainly acting as the chief spirit of the hour, that same young Saul of Tarsus whose encounter with Stephen in the synagogue had been so disastrous to himself. Little did he know that in those very moments when the martyr was lifting his eyes to the heavens for his prosecutors, God was already laying on his head the hand of power to bid him go far hence to the Gentiles as the ambassador of the Christ whose minister he was now putting to death. Yet the effects of Stephen's martyrdom upon Saul of Tarsus are plain beyond all misleading. He bore the impression of that moment to his dying day. In that incident there began in him the vision of wider meaning in the faith of Stephen and of greater opportunities for himself. These were like seeds waiting a warmer sun and a more genial air, but in time they came to fruitage. So much was Saul's career shaped by the work and word of Stephen that Augustine has well declared that, "Had there never been a Stephen, there would never have been a Paul."

PRAYER MEETING

BY PROFESSOR SILAS JONES.

Points on Giving. Topic, Feb. 17. 1 Cor. 16:1-9; 2 Cor. 8:5, 9-15; 8:6-15.

Information was freely imparted by Paul to the churches from which he sought gifts. He wrote to the Corinthians concerning the object of the collection, sent Titus to instruct and exhort them, and paid them a visit that he might complete the work of education. The democracy of the church is recognized in the matter of giving. No one is asked to give for anything which he does not understand and approve. The apostle does not exhort men to give and denounce them for withholding their money before he explains to them what he intends to do with their bounty. He educated the church with respect to its duty.

First.

"First they gave their own selves to the Lord." The reason some men do not give is that they are not Christians. They have their names on the church book and they call themselves believers but they have not in them the mind of Christ. They have not been transformed by the renewing of their minds. The church is to them an institution to be used for personal advantage. Others are in the church in order that they may serve. They know that the Son of man came to minister, not to be ministered unto. They are deeply dissatisfied with teaching that stimulates selfish impulses. Instead of being constantly on the defensive against enlarging sympathy, they guard against the encroachments of selfishness. Their intellectual equipment has been secured for the purpose of sustaining the conviction that the disciple of Christ is interested in the highest welfare of all men. They are therefore willing to be convinced that an enterprise is worthy of their support.

System.

Co-operation is impossible without system. Governments adopt definite plans for the collection of taxes. A great manufacturing plant is thoroughly organized. Churches that live and give life to their communities devise plans for meeting the situations confronting them and lay it upon the hearts of all to follow the plans accepted by the majority. The disposition to serve is fundamental, no scheme is worth a moment's consideration if love is regarded as a negligible factor; nevertheless, it does not follow that unguided feeling will bring the world into captivity to Christ. The financial support of the church will be inadequate wherever the haphazard theory prevails. Spontaneity in well doing comes from discipline. It is hardly creditable to a church that the amount it gives for missions or benevolence depends on the ability of the preacher to arouse momentary feelings. There is a place for the appeal of eloquence but there is something wrong when a church gives a hundred dollars one year because of an eloquent sermon and ten dollars the following year after a simple statement concerning the purposes of the offering.

Equality.

The equality of Christian democracy is that of effort and interest. There are diversities of gifts. There are differences in financial ability. "Let each one of you lay by him in store, as he may prosper." The burdens of Washington and Lincoln were increased unduly because many citizens evaded their responsibility. Just now we are denouncing prominent offenders against the laws of the nation. It is a question of equality that we are raising. We are also alert with respect to the duty of the wealthy man in the church. It may be worth while to remember that if all men of ordinary financial ability were wholly patriotic and quick to do their duty in the church the men of great wealth would have to yield to public sentiment and the law. They are lawless because the rest of us would be lawless if we had their opportunity. So many of us reason that our insignificance releases us from our obligations that a sentiment unfavorable to heroic moral endeavor is fostered. The stingy rich man was lately in our class and we taught him to hold fast to his possessions. He is loyal to his former associates.

"The Grace of our Lord."

How is the world to learn about the grace of Christ? If his people are interested in their own affairs and indifferent to the fate of the ignorant and sinful, the natural inference of the non-Christian will be either that there never was any such manifestation of divine grace as that of which the church sings or that the divine favor has been withdrawn from earth. The grace of God incarnate in his people is sufficient for the transformation of the world. Grace on the lips but disconnected with the pocketbook is not the grace of God at all. It is a shibboleth, a fetish, an inherited vocal trait, an opiate for the conscience. Men can speak the word daily all their lives and grow ever more obdurate and obtuse. Old age to them means greater reluctance to loosen their hold on dollars. On the other hand, the true grace of God leads men into the knowledge of what is abiding and makes money a servant of human need.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR

BY RICHARD W. GENTRY.

February 21, 1909.

Subject—Pilgrim's Progress Series, II. The Slough of Despond. Psalm 69:1-4, 13-18; 40:1-3.

It was from constant reading of the Bible that Bunyan drew the very best thoughts for his book, "Pilgrim's Progress." His had been a life full of trouble, while the Bible was the story of a people whose history had been full of trouble, and who had found the only solace therefor, a closer touch with God.

The story of the slough of despond is one of the most realistic portions of "Pilgrim's Progress." For not only does the writer depict his own sorrowful life therein, but also lives through the experience of the "Chosen People." The bird's-eye view of the history of Israel in last week's lesson has shown us abundant reasons why a Hebrew should write such a psalm as Psalm 69. Israel was most of the time in a "slough of despond." Lot "leaving the city of destruction" is one of the few pictures of escape in the Old Testament. Almost at the beginning of Israel's history we read, "And the Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigor. And they made their lives bitter with hard bondage in mortar and in brick, and in all manner of service in the field." Again, in the age of the Judges, when neighboring barbaric tribes had overrun the land, much as the Indian tribes harrassed the early colonists, an ancient poetic fragment tells us that, "the highways were deserted and the travelers walked through the by-paths."

But no doubt by the time our psalms for study were composed the writer was walking through an inner, as well as an outer, slough of despond. Not only do we read, "they that would destroy me, being mine enemies wrongfully, are mighty," but also, "O God, Thou knowest my foolishness and my sins are not hid from Thee." Likely Israel had by this time climbed to the point where she had within herself what we may call the prophetic point of view. Such great teachers as the ninth and eighth century prophets saw that Israel was in a worse plight within than she was without. Hosea cries in Chapter IV, verse I, "The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth nor mercy nor knowledge of God in the land," and in verse 6, "my people are destroyed for lack of knowledge."

It is not strange therefore, to find such a psalm as 69. When we imagine the writer gazing back over the outward adversity of his people, and then with a more enlightened vision grasping the depth and width of her spiritual slough of despond, we can almost feel the heart throbs and catch the passionate supplication in his words, "Save me, O God! for the waters are come in unto my soul."

A psalm not so easily explained by Israel's enrironment is the 40th. Here the writer is out of the slough of despond. "He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock and established my goings." Here is such a beautiful song of faith and trust! "I waited patiently for the Lord; and He inclined unto me and heard my cry." "Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust—"

These two psalms bring out in clear relief what in a previous study we called the human and divine sides of the Bible; in the one those very human feelings, discouragement, fear, weakness—a slough of despond. in the other a trust and faith, a climbing out of the slough, so little explained by environment, and yet withall so sublime, that it may in a sense be called divine. It is man bringing the God life into his own.

Popular in Her Town Too.

"I love grand opera!" exclaimed the lady from Pittsburg, as they listened to the opera in New York. "Who is the composer of this one?"

"The great Wagner," was her friend's reply. "He's very popular here!"

"So he is in Pittsburg. He's on our baseball team, you know!"—January Lippincott's.

CHICAGO

THE RIVALS OF THE CHURCH—O. F. JORDAN MAKES AN INVESTIGATION OF THE WHEREABOUTS OF THE CITY'S MEN WHEN CHURCH IS GOING ON—HE FINDS THEM IN SALOONS, THEATERS, LODGES, AT TRADES UNIONS AND SOCIALISTIC GATHERINGS—PREACHERS MUST BE BOTH INTERESTING AND PRACTICAL TO WIN OUT

We have been going about recently visiting our various churches and missions. Everywhere the difficulty of securing an audience especially of men has been apparent. It is evident that the reason is not that men are not naturally social. People love the crowd or they would not herd together in the city. The reason for half-filled churches is not that people do not enjoy being with their fellows. They have other places to meet men and women that are to them more attractive.

Small Proportion of Men at Church.

The fact of the alienation of much of the city population from the church is seen by a brief glance at statistics. Only half of the city is even nominally Christian. Not half of these are regular attendants at the churches. Were one to make the most liberal concession, he would not be able to say that one-fourth of the inhabitants of Chicago attend church on a given Sunday and half of them probably have not been to church in ten years. When we still further consider that the men of Chicago form but an insignificant part of church audiences, we readily see that the church makes but little impression on the men of our city. We have counted the names in the church membership lists of several Chicago churches and have come to the conclusion that about thirty per cent of our members are men and boys. The percentage of male church membership in the country at large is forty per cent. It is apparent then that the loss of the men to the church is most severe in the cities.

What are the rival forces that lay hold of the men? If the church is not the common meeting place, what is the place where men love to come together? We shall consider some of the rival forces to the church. Not all of the rival forces are evil forces. The good is the most dangerous rival of the best. The church may suffer the heaviest losses from social institutions that contain much of good.

The Saloon a Rival of the Church.

Among the great rival forces, is the saloon. As it is conducted in the great city, it contains certain features seemingly more philanthropic than the church. Even Hinky Dink's Barrell House has a free labor bureau and a place to read the newspapers in the shelter. The men who go there look to him as a protector in time of trouble and he exercises all of his power to get his clients out of the toils of the law. Even though it is done as a piece of good business, Hinky Dink is something of a philanthropist. It is not strange that the homeless working man who has found the door of the church locked, should turn in where help was to be found. It is seriously to be doubted whether the majority of men go to the saloon for the drink primarily. Men love fellowship and the most absolute democracy of the city is to be found in the saloons. There is no pew rent here. There is no snobbery. Men spend their money on each other in the abandon of good fellowship. Few of us have the imagination to see the outcome of a given course of action. We need not wonder that men enjoy present benefits with no disquieting vision of the future tremens, or of a drunkard's grave. The saloon became "institutional" before the modern church thought of it and has the corresponding advantage of having originated certain forms of social service which the church may copy and improve upon but can never claim to have originated, at least so far as the present generation is concerned. An institution doing good for revenue is a dangerous rival to pure philanthropy.

Another formidable rival of the church is the trades-union movement. It is not necessary that it should have been so. When the trades-union movement first started, it might have been met with a more cordial treatment at the hands of the church. But the impression grew and was often confirmed by the facts, that the church was a rich man's institution. Labor union gatherings often hissed the church but they never failed in reverence for the "Carpenter of Nazareth." There are about two hundred and fifty labor organizations of Chicago affiliated with the Chicago Federation of Labor. Some of these organizations have large memberships. They are dear to their members because of the many benefits coming from the membership. Not only have they been able to get important raises in the wage scale of the city, through industrial wars, but in the times of industrial peace, the organization has meant much to its members. Sick workmen have been aided. They have been buried when dead. Through the organization they have been able to learn of employment in distant cities when times were dull. There are manifold ways in which the labor union has revived the philanthropic work that was once done by monasteries, and which the modern church had forgotten to do in its period of theological interest, when the operations of the head had obscured something of the work of the heart and the hands.

Sosialism a New Religion.

Then we must take account of the Socialist movement as a rival as well as in some cases an enemy of the church. In its essence, Socialism is purely an economic theory which has nothing to do with religion or ethics. In practice, however, the movement has usually made war on the church. The street orator loves to point to the church as an impractical and other-worldly institution. Pointing to one of our churches recently he said, "Those folks over there preach a heaven in the distant future located on the moon or somewhere else in the sky. We preach a heaven that is here now." It is needless to say that this appeal to present benefits has had its part in winning thousands. The movement has much to say about food and clothing and other material things and does not hesitate to say that by an economic determinism, poor people can not be good. The movement not only speaks against the church but it holds its metings at the church hour on Sunday and thus is able to effectually sever connection with the church. We have not forgotten the Christian Socialists. But they are a group of earnest Christian people voting a political ticket made up by materialists and those opposed to the church. At the present time they have little influence in shaping the ideals and programs of the political movement called socialism. The Socialists hold more open-air meetings in Chicago than all of the Protestant churches combined.

The Popularity of the Theater.

Another rival of the church is the lodge. It is perhaps a less formidable rival in the city than in the country. There are of course numerous lodge enthusiasts who attend the meetings and work upon degree teams with great zeal; but the records of most lodges will show a far lower average of attendance in proportion to membership than the church has. The lodge is losing its power in the face of such vigorous institutions as the trades-union movement and the Socialist movement. It is true, however, that it still enrolls a great many men. These lodges all have dues that amount to more than the average man gives to the church in the course of a year, with the usual extras for banquets and social occasions. The lodge is accepted by many men frankly as a substitute for the church. They are willing to believe that if they live up to the ethical teachings of their lodge, they will be admitted to the company of saints in the world to come. They do not realize that agreeing to do good to a limited group that will return the good to them is not as large an ideal as that of the church which casts bread far out upon the waters and waits many days for it to return.

Lodges Furnish Social Life.

The theater is also a rival of the church. The Puritan position that the theater is bad and altogether bad has given away to a juster assessment of the facts. It is seen that the evil and the good are mingled in varying proportions. Certain plays have secured the endorsement of even prominent evangelical clergymen as being full of valuable moral teaching. A young clergyman we know does not hesitate to say that the play "Our New Minister" did more to shape his ministerial ideals than any other influence. Yet the play more often than not introduces cheap ethics and unsocial tendencies. The cheap theater often inflames the youth to crime and lust. It is the survival of that theater against which our Puritan forefathers inveighed with such a sense of conviction. Even the best theater is in a certain sense a rival of the church, the best being the more truly a rival. Men satisfy their social hunger in great gatherings larger than come together in the religious meetings of the churches. They receive certain ethical and religious ideas in a form more congenial to their tastes than a sermon. If we have sugar-coated our quinine pills, our city men have demanded a sugar-coat to their ethics.

Minister Must be Interesting and Practical.

With all of these rival forces in the field, when a man is asked to go to hear one of our preachers, he invariably asks two questions. First, Is he interesting? Second, Is he at work on his own plans, in short is he practical? If the church is to live in the field with these formidable rivals, it must do more good that the labor union, the lodge and the club. It must have a more definite and earnest propaganda than do the Socialists. It must be interesting and as human as the theater, even though it be by different methods. The useful saints have not been idle because they were mystical. They have not been too other-worldly to be known and loved by their own generation. The church of today is not to forget her original mission of bringing men into conscious relation to God, but the road to this happy result is to teach them to love and do good to their brothers.

The Evanston Church goes into a revival effort March 21, with home forces. A pastor's class in Christian Doctrine will be organized among non-members of the parish next Sunday.

TRANSYLVANIA UNIVERSITY.
Lexington, Ky.

Dean Thomas B. McCartney, Jr., recently attended the meeting in Louisville of the Executive Committee of the Kentucky Education Society. Going on to Indianapolis and returning by way of Cincinnati, he visited Butler College and the University of Cincinnati.

Transylvania University possesses one of the rarest and most valuable old libraries in this country. Its 15,000 volumes are now being so classified as to be of the greatest benefit to students.

At the suggestion of a number of students interested in the subject, Prof. Henry Lloyd, of the Department of Mathematics, has organized a class of thirty who are taking up the study of General Sociology this second semester. This course is practically the equivalent of the course as conducted by Dr. Hubbell last year. Dr. Hubbell is absent from the university for this college year, doing research work along sociological lines in New York City.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee of Transylvania, held January 30, the resignation of Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair as President of Hamilton College was accepted, and Dr. Hubert Gibson Hearin, Morrison Professor of English in the College of Liberal Arts of Transylvania, was unanimously elected as her successor. The policy of Hamilton College under its new president, will be substantially the same as that under Mrs. St. Clair. The school has been unusually flourishing during the last few years, standards of education have been raised and the institution is now one of the leading schools for girls in the Southwest. Dr. and Mrs. Shearin will enter upon their work at Hamilton College immediately at the close of the present school year.

The Fifth Annual Sunday-school Institute will be held in the College of the Bible on January 8-10. It will be conducted by Mr. R. M. Hopkins, of Louisville, who will, with Mr. W. C. Pearce and President R. H. Crossfield, make the chief addresses of the meeting.

On February 11 and 12, in the Second Presbyterian Church of Louisville, Ky., an International Conference will be held in the interest of the Organized Adult Bible Class. Dr. Crossfield will be in attendance during the entire program.

Prof. Charles A. Shull, of the Department of Biology, attended the annual meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, recently held in Baltimore. This meeting, Mr. Shull said, was the most successful in the history of the association, with 2,500 present. On February 1 Mr. Shull gave the university students at the chapel hour an interesting account of the meeting, at the same time telling them something of John Hopkins University, where the meeting was held.

The basket ball team of Transylvania University is this year probably the best we have ever had. The teams of young women and young men are both meeting with splendid success.

On Saturday, January 30, the Association of Kentucky Colleges held its annual meeting in Cecropian Hall of Transylvania University. The colleges of the state were well represented and both the forenoon and afternoon sessions were interesting and instructive. A banquet was arranged to close the meeting in the evening.

President Crossfield is all the time responding to calls for education addresses. It is his intention to speak in all the churches in Central Kentucky on Christian Education as soon as possible.

February 3, 1909. A. L. Henry, Sec'y.

FROM PRESIDENT CROSSFIELD

The Executive Committee of Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., on the recommendation of President Crossfield, recently elected Dr. H. G. Shearin president of Hamilton College, to succeed Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair, resigned, who returns to Columbia Christian College at the close of the present school year on account of her financial interests in that institution.

Mrs. St. Clair has been at the head of Hamilton College for the past six years and has accomplished much in the direction of raising educational standards and giving tone to the institution.

After the resignation of Mrs. W. T. Moore, of Columbia Christian College, it became imperative that Mrs. St. Clair, who owns a half interest in that institution, return to Columbia. The Executive Committee passed suitable resolutions of its high appreciation of her work as president of Hamilton College.

Dr. Shearin, who was elected as Mrs. St. Clair's successor, has for the past four years occupied the chair of Morrison professor of English Language and Literature in Transylvania University and is by scholarship and aptitude eminently qualified for his new position.

The policy of the institution under Dr. Shearin will be that of still further advancing standards and of rendering Hamilton College the equal of any schools for women in the East.

Dr. Shearin, after taking his doctorate in Yale University, studied in Oxford, England, Heidelberg and Paris and has recently taken courses in Harvard, Columbia, Wisconsin, and Chicago Universities. Prior to coming to Transylvania University he was professor of English in Ripon College.

Dr. Shearin is one of the most popular men connected with the university at present, and his resignation as Morrison professor of English to accept this position was received with profound regret.

Dr. Shearin has published a number of articles on English subjects in American and Continental magazines, and his book published in 1902 by Henry Holt & Company, entitled, "Expressions of Purpose in Old English Prose," has been received with remarkable favor. He has in preparation another volume, "Principles of Old English Syntax," which will appear in the near future.

He is a member of the Modern Language Association of America, the Wisconsin Academy of Sciences, Arts and Letters and the Filson Club.

Dr. Shearin is a man of sterling character and eminently fitted to give direction to the lives of the hundreds of young men who attend Hamilton College. Mrs. Shearin is a woman of genuine culture and will be a distinct acquisition to the home life of the institution. R. H. Crossfield.

Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky.

From the report of the clerk of the church at Fort Collins, Colo., we are pleased to print the following commendation of their pastor, J. F. Findley, who was a few years ago pastor of one of the Chicago churches. The report says, "We are well pleased with the improvement of our church along all lines, which is due to the splendid business qualifications, and careful management of our pastor, who has been called to remain with us indefinitely."

DOING A GOOD TURN

"Dear Brother Morrison: I have been wondering whether or not the Century people were doing or cared to do a general book business such as was formerly carried on. If so, I would be glad to buy books occasionally both for myself and others through you in order to help you get your small percentage on the sales. Most of the books that I would want could be had in Chicago; occasionally it would be necessary to send elsewhere for them. For instance, would you care to supply me with the following books:

"Christianity and the Social Crisis," Rauschenbusch.

"Affirmative Intellect," Fergussen.

"The Religion of Democracy." (Both of these books are published by Funk & Wagnalls.)

"Social Psychology," Ross. (From Macmillan Press.)

"The Church and the Changing Order," Shailer Mathews.

"Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament," George Adams Smith (Armstrong Press.)

"Jesus Christ and the Christian Character," Peabody. (Macmillan.)

"The Universal Elements of Christianity," Hall. (Fleming H. Revell Co.)

"Pragmatism," Wm. James. (Longmans, Green & Co.)

"Christian Belief Interpreted by Christian Experience," Hall. (University Press, Chicago.)

"The Social Significance of Christianity," Mathews.

"The Child's Religious Life," Koons.

"The Boy Problem," Forbush. (Pilgrim Press.)

If you can furnish these books at about the regular cost and make a percentage for yourself, I would be glad to have you do it. I can send my check to you upon receipt of notice giving me the total cost, or upon receipt of the books, as per your liking.

You men have been doing a magnificent work in the Century. It deserves the liberal support of our people. As for myself, I greatly regret that the men among us who are showing the greatest capacity for editing and conducting a paper, should, by reason of conditions which are no credit to us as a people, be compelled to do their work in a corner. I think that the time is not far distant when we are to be a free people, and when those who wish to speak on any subject shall enjoy the privilege without danger of excommunication."

The above is written by a well-known preacher. We print it for the purpose of illustrating a certain spirit of which we have innumerable like gracious expressions, and to show our readers an opportunity of serving the Christian Century in a practical way. We will fill the order. We are not advertising a book department, as the first thing we want to see done is the firm establishment of the Christian Century as a weekly newspaper. But all book orders we will be glad to fill at the best rates and with promptness. All orders should state the name of the author and, as far as possible, that of the publisher. In these points the above is a good model to follow.

The church at Hartford, Ind., where F. C. McCormick is pastor, recently surprised their pastor and his wife, by coming in upon the evening of Mrs. McCormick's birthday anniversary, and leaving some valuable tokens of esteem.

WITH THE WORKERS

Charles Scriven, a student at Eureka, Ill., has accepted a call to the church at Gridley, Ill.

The Central Church, Tacoma, Wash., F. H. Groom, minister, is in a meeting. Mrs. Edna Earl Houser Braden is leader of song.

F. H. Groom, pastor of the Central Church, Tacoma, Wash., conducts a weekly noon-day Bible class at one of the shops in the city.

A Men's Club has just been organized in the church at Fremont, Wash. This church is to hold a meeting in the early spring, led by "The Kendalls."

H. G. Sedinger, 2323 Seventh avenue, Birmingham, Ala., is the new state evangelist, under direction of the state board, and is making a commendable start in his work.

The Men's Association of the church at Hartford, Ind., which has forty-seven members, gave a banquet a few days ago to which the ladies of the church were invited.

The First Church, Tacoma, Wash., will hold a meeting, beginning March 1, under the leadership of W. A. Moore as preacher, and H. S. Saxton and wife of Troy, Ohio, as leaders of song.

H. T. Morrison, Sr., returned last week to Chicago after a four years' absence in New Zealand and Australia. He came via Palestine, Egypt and Europe, thus completing the circuit of the globe.

Joseph Luther Greenwell, Jr., son of the pastor of the Queen Anne Church, Seattle, has been made life member of the C. W. B. M. by the generosity of the Woman's Missionary Society of the church.

A recent union meeting of the Sunday-school workers of King county, Washington, held at the Plymouth Church, Seattle, Washington, was presided over by J. L. Garvin, pastor of the First Christian Church.

The church at El Reno, Okla., has arranged to hold the evangelistic meetings in March. The church has called Sellers and St. John to lead in these services. There were nine additions during January. They are confidently expecting a good meeting.

The Christian Monitor, Warren, Ohio, published a list of the names of ninety persons who came into the First Church during the meeting just closed in which the pastor, J. E. Lynn did the preaching and the song service was led by Miss Anderson of Springfield, Ill.

Edgar D. Jones of Bloomington, has a sermon on the Religion of Lincoln, in the Homiletic Review for February. Mr. Jones has devoted much study to the facts of Lincoln's life and has been engaged by the Mutual Lyceum Bureau to lecture on Linmoln's religion next season.

A card from James Burkhardt, Connersville, Ind., was understood by the editor to mean that Mr. Burkhardt was just closing his work at Connersville. We are glad to learn that this was a misconstruction on our part and that Mr. Burkhardt only meant that the last month had been the best since the beginning of his pastorate.

Clark Marsh, a graduate of Eureka College, for a time pastor of the Howett Street Church, Peoria, Ill., but for the past three years pastor of the church at Monrovia, Cal., was recently married to Miss Florence Best of that city, and on the 23rd of January, Mr. and Mrs. Marsh sailed for the Orient, where Mr. Marsh goes as a missionary.

The church at Saye, Okla., has called J. S. Weaver of Fort Smith, Ark., to become their pastor.

A new house of worship has been erected at West Rupert, Vt. The dedicatory service was held February 3, with H. A. Denton of Cincinnati, as principal speaker.

The church at Bennett, Neb., has just closed a very successful meeting in which J. T. Adams did the preaching and E. N. Dobson was leader of song. The Evangelist gives much credit to the careful and enthusiastic work that was done by the pastor, who is much beloved by his people.

The church at Sharon, Kan., has pledged $1,200 to the work of Oklahoma Christian University, Enid, Okla. The new building of the church at Hutchison, Kan., will be completed by March 1. A special series of meetings will follow, when O. L. Cook, the pastor will do the preaching, and Charles M. Bliss, of Oklahoma City, will be leader of song.

The Men's Association of the First Church, Seattle, Wash., recently gave a banquet to P. C. MacFarlane, the secretary of the National Men's organization. Of the banquet we have the following report:

"The banquet to MacFarlane was a success. About ninety men enjoyed the excellent supper served by our ladies. Secretary P. C. MacFarlane proved to be a good story teller and a man who can win friends as well as enthuse them. We look hopefully upon the Men's Organization, which he is so ably constructing. All the churches in Seattle are considering a Federation of Men's Clubs. Let us get behind this work and push it."

Great progress has been made by our church in Jacksonville, Fla., during the past ten years. The pastor, J. T. Boone says: "Ten years ago the church in Jacksonville owned one house and lot, which they might well have given to clear the debt. Today, property owned by the church, at a conservative estimate, is worth $77,000. On this there is a total indebtedness of $20,500. Of this amount $13,600 has been pledged and personal notes given. Ten years ago there were about one hundred members. Today there are over one thousand. So far there is only one congregation and one set of elders, deacons and trustees. There is not a wealthy member in the congregation. 'Every member everlastingly at it' is our motto."

D. W. Conner, pastor of the church at Olney, Ill., has been given a call to remain with them indefinitely.

G. P. Rutledge is to deliver the Lincoln memorial address before the veterans of his section of Philadelphia.

The church at Chillicothe, Mo., is being assisted in a meeting by Louis Cupp of the Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, Mo.

The church at Everett, Wash., has extended O. H. King, La Grande, Ore., a unanimous call to become their pastor, to begin March 1.

Oscar Ingold has been preaching in the meeting at Helena, Okla. The audiences were so large as to force church from its own building to the auditorium of the county school.

A. L. Huff, who is studying in Eureka College, and who preaches at East Galesburg, one-half time, has closed a meeting with that church in which there were fourteen added to the church.

The new some being built for the family of Dr. Dye at Eureka, Ill., is almost ready for occupancy. It will be a benediction to the people of Eureka to have the presence of the family of Dr. Dye in their midst.

The church at Greenfield, Ind., refused to accept the resignation of the pastor, V. W. Blair, and he is to remain with them. Mr. Blair has done an excellent work in the more than two years he has been at Greenfield.

Clyde Lee Fife, son of R. H. Fife, was married February 1 to the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Taylor, Clarinda, Iowa. The following day a reception was given them at the home of the groom's father in Kansas City, Mo.

Dedicatory services of the new basement of the Forest Avenue Church, Buffalo, N. Y., were recently held. R. H. Miller, W. C. Hull, E. F. Randall, gave brief addresses. The dedicatory service was conducted by B. S. Ferrall of the Jefferson Street Church.

The building of the First Church, Marion, Ohio, has within the last three months been repaired within and without. The reopening service was held January 10, with H. A. Denton as chief speaker. All repairs were paid for by private subscription and there was no calling for money on the day of dedication. The pastor, Charles E. Smith, speaks highly of the impression made by Mr. Denton.

WITH THE WORKERS

H. O. Breeden is in a meeting with the church at Santa Barbara, Cal.

Andrew P. Johnson has resigned as pastor of the church at Bethany, Mo.

The Disciples of Dallas, Tex., have completed a city missionary organization.

The church at Belhaven, N. C., is in the process of erecting a new building.

C. N. Williams has been called for another year as pastor of the church at Graham, Texas.

J. R. Perkins, Fresno, Cal., is giving a series of evening sermons on Great Religious Awakenings.

The East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo., has extended a call to E. H. Williamson of Springfield, Mo.

There were 207 additions to the Capitol Hill Church, East Des Moines, in the meeting led by John L. Brandt.

Non-attendance at the Bible-school on the part of the members of the official board of the church is the feeling of the officers of the church at Lincoln, Neb.

The Third Church, Youngstown, Ohio, has closed a successful meeting in which they had the help of J. E. Pounds and wife of Cincinnati. The pastor, F. D. Draper, is doing a good and abiding work.

On a recent Sunday evening E. B. Bagby, of the First Church, Fort Smith, Ark., gave a sermon on the ideal girl which was given unusual place in the city papers the following day.

The church at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, G. B. VanArsdale, pastor, is preparing for their meeting which is to begin April 4, with H. O. Breeden as preacher and Prof. Saxton, leader of song.

R. W. Blunt of Monnett, Mo., is assisting his brother, J. R. Blunt in a meeting at Marionville, Mo. In the three weeks since the meeting began there have been forty accessions to the church; all but four by confession. During the month the church has paid off a $400 note and all indebtedness of the church is liquidated, and the people are looking forward to a successful year's work.

J. W. Kerns, of Carbondale, Ill., has been called to succeed J. W. Lowber in the pastorate of the Central Church, Austin, Tex. Austin is an exceedingly important field for our work. There are 1,411 students enrolled in the State University at Austin. Of these, 940 are said to be members of some church. There are eighty-two who express no church preference. Those alligned with churches are as follows: Methodists, 452; Presbyterians, 239; Baptists, 237; Episcopalians, 144; Disciples 128; Lutherans, twenty-four. There are twenty-six Jews enrolled.

The church at Davenport, Iowa, is doing splendid work under the leadership of Pastor S. M. Perkins. The men of the church recently held a banquet with a unique series of toasts: "Rapid Fire Toasts by Specialists." Some of them were, "If the church were a school, what kind of pupils would we be?" "If the church were a photograph gallery, what kind of pictures would we make?" "Gold Filings on Missionary Days during the Centennial Year." "If the Church were a Railroad, Where Would Those Without Tickets Ride?" Such a program should prove of unusual interest.

TELEGRAMS.

Bloomington, Ill., January 31: Two weeks of our special meetings ended tonight. Continue at least another week. Forty-six added thus far, nearly all confessions of faith. Many adults. I am giving a series of sermon studies in the book of Acts, practically covering the entire twenty-eight chapters. Splendid audiences. Lawrence R. Wharton, assistant pastor, leading large chorus.

Edgar DeWitt Jones,
Pastor First Christian Church.

Des Moines, Iowa, February 8: Forty-six added yesterday at Central. Special offerings taken and great effort made to reach 1,000 at Sunday-school resulting in 1,036 in Bible-school. Overflow meeting conducted by Idleman and Vancamp and still hundreds turned away last night. 752 added to date. This is the greatest meeting we have ever had under any circumstances in a down town city church, where the great majority must come by street car. Bro. Idleman and the Central are doing a great work for Des Moines. Charles Reign Scoville.

Moundsville, W. Va., February 7: A fine beginning here today with G. H. Steed and his active, consecrated church. We are using the big school auditorium. Standing room at premium tonight. Brooks Bros.

Bloomfield, Ia., Feb. 3, 1909.

Expected to close last night but people just would not permit. They rose up all over the house when I announced we would close, and protested against it. 19 last night, 11 the night before; 102 to date. Lots of men. House packed half hour before services began. Have had no clap trap or side shows.

Bruce Brown.

Valparaiso, Ind. February 8: 104 added at Bloomfield up to Friday when I had to leave. Ferrall, pastor and Gamong, singer, continued over Sunday. They are two of the finest men I ever worked with.

Bruce Brown.

The choir of the First Church, Emporia, Kan., gave a sacred cantata recently.

G. H. C. Stoney of Cadiz, Ky., is the new minister for the church at Winston-Salem, N. C. The church believes that under his ministry the good work that has been done by the retiring pastor, J. A. Hopkins, will be continued.

Bethany, Mo., February 1, 1909: Andrew P. Johnson, who has been a popular and successful minister of the First Christian Church of Bethany, Mo., has tendered his resignation to take effect the first of March. Both the church and town regret to lose him.

Of the meeting at the church, Colorado City, Colo., led by Allen Wilson, Clark Bowen, the minister writes: "The meeting lasted twenty-one days. We began in a snowstorm and continued in that way for the first week. That is hard in this "sunshine land." A total of ninety-four people came in response to his sensible appeals. Nothing like this has before happened here. Bro. Wilson plans his work and works his plans. He finds out by census who are in the town, and leads the workers in wise winning of the approachable ones. The gospel was preached from house to house, and before the gathered throngs. The audiences and interest never weakened from the first, but showed a steady advance."

S. P. Speigel is in a meeting at Wilson, N. C., from which we have good reports.

The first Sunday in March marks the beginning of the work of F. F. Walters with the First Church, Joplin, Mo.

The Plymouth and the Jefferson Street Churches, Buffalo, N. Y. and the Church at North Tonawanda are in a contest.

The spirit of missions is dominant in Eureka College. At the end of last year there were eight in the students' volunteer band; there are twenty-two in the band now, and the number will be increased to twenty-five before the end of the school year.

The Bible College of Missouri has just completed the enrollment of the largest classes of university students in its history. Above a hundred will be taking Bible College courses, and will receive for their work credits in the University of Missouri toward their A. B. degrees.

The following announcements in the parish paper of the First Church, Lincoln Neb., where H. H. Harmon is pastor, is indicative of the growing coöperation of the churches of the various denominations in the cities of this county:

"The semi-annual meeting of the Missionary Social Union will be held in the First Presbyterian Church on the evening of February 5, at 6:30 p. m. The program will open with a basket supper at 6:30 o'clock, following which will be short addresses and five-minute talks by pastors and superintendents of Sunday-schools. This meeting will be one of special interest to pastors and Sunday-school workers."

NO MEDICINE

But a Change of Food Gave Relief.

Many persons are learning that drugs are not the thing to rebuild worn out nerves, but proper food is required.

There is a certain element in the cereals, wheat, barley, etc., which is grown there by nature for food to brain and nerve tissue. This is the phosphate of potash, of which Grape-Nuts food contains a large proportion.

In making this food all the food elements in the two cereals, wheat and barley, are retained. That is why so many heretofore nervous and run down people find in Grape-Nuts a true nerve and brain food.

"I can say that Grape-Nuts food has done much for me as a nerve renewer, writes a Wis. bride:

"A few years ago, before my marriage, I was a bookkeeper in a large firm. I became so nervous toward the end of each week that it seemed I must give up my position, which I could not afford to do.

"Mother purchased some Grape-Nuts and we found it not only delicious but I noticed from day to day that I was improving until I finally realized I was not nervous any more.

"I have recommended it to friends as a brain and nerve food, never having found its equal. I owe much to Grape-Nuts as it saved me from a nervous collapse, and enabled me to retain my position."

NEBRASKA SECRETARY'S LETTER.

R. D. McCance, the preacher at Sargent, has been holding a few days' meeting at Coburg and the outlook seemed so good that he returned there on Monday to continue it.

Austin J. Hollingsworth will close his work at Grant's Pass, Oregon, on the 14th, and take up work at Ulysses on the 28th, for the summer. He expects to take a medical course looking to foreign missionary service. He will be very welcome back to Nebraska.

F. D. Hobson reports thirty-three baptisms from the small meeting recently closed at Beaver City. This makes fifty-nine baptisms and a total of seventy-one received into the church since he took the work there.

The Mitchell meeting at Precept closed with nine added, eight of them by baptism. He began at Wilsonville, a new point, on the 31st.

Samuel Gregg is still at Nebraska City, but will doubtless close there by the middle of the present week.

The state secretary unexpectedly spent Lord's day at Ulysses on the 31st. An appointment at Sterling was called off on account of bad condition of roads. Will be at Holdredge on the 7th.

A. J. Hargett will preach at Sterling on the 7th.

Harry Knowles is again in school and visited Firth last Lord's day and may supply regularly for them.

A. D. Brokaw will preach regularly at Seward. He has been the principal agent in the revival of that work and it is fitting that he should begin his work as a preacher there.

Stine and Miller are having large audiences at McCool. Will likely hold a meeting at Bluevale after that.

Hattress H. Shick writes that they will have reception to new members at Elwood on the 2nd. There were thirty-nine additions. Also asks that Bro. Hall make a visit to the Bible school there. Elwood is asking for District No. 8 Convention.

The foreign missionary rally held in Bethany on the 27th was the usual pronounced success. Bro. Corey of the Foreign Society, Bro. Shaw of China, and Bro. Adams of India were with him. Some local speakers were introduced and the afternoon was highly instructive. The evening was given to stereopticon and moving picture exhibits of mission-workers, buildings and scenes. The representations were delightful, showing the growth of the work and the vast changes wrought in the persons of some of the converts. The Chapel was crowded to its utmost limits. Heathen Missions has the right of way and March 7 is the great day for this work. Is it too much to ask that all Nebraska churches join in this great, world-wide effort? Surely not. We have been so wondrously blessed in Nebraska in every way, that we ought to be glad to join with the thousands everywhere to send the gospel to these suffering members of the human family. Make a hot campaign from now till offering day and then generously, spelled with capital letters, unite in the biggest offering we have ever given to this work. Nebraska is loyal to all our missionary endeavors. Let us prove it by our offerings.

A. B. Moore is just closing a meeting at Belvidere. There had been fifteen added up to January 29.

Whiston & Longman have had forty-nine added in the Albany, Oregon, meetings up to January 29. The weather has been worst in years. Very cold, snow and blizzards. Thirty-six of the forty-nine were baptisms. They are open for August and September meetings in Nebraska. Will hold a meeting in Boston and attend the Centennial.

B. F. Clay, of Nampa, Idaho, will engage in evangelistic work generally beginning July 1. Will have a first class singer with him.

Z. O. Doward will be in a meeting at Ansley during February. Has had a successful work at Downs, Kan. Is open for March. Address Bethany. W. A. Baldwin.

THE FIRST MONTH OF 1909 IN KENTUCKY MISSION FIELDS.

Paintsville is moving forward fairly well and A. Sanders had one addition. He spent part of the time in a meeting out of the state. A meeting of all religious bodies is to be held at Paintsville this month. These representatives are to come out of all the Big Sandy Valley. It is for mutual counsel.

A. E. Robertson began work in Harlan county and thinks that the outlook is good for that field. He is the "Living-link worker" of Oldham county churches.

William Gross was at work sixteen days in Laurel and Clay counties. Two added.

At the suggestion of our South Kentucky member of the board a contribution was made to J. W. Mitchell for a meeting held in December in Hopkins county. Twenty-five baptisms; two reclaimed, a church organized.

W. A. Wolfe the worker for the Boone county churches, began his work at Springfield, Washington county. There were six added and good plans made for a year of faithful work. This is the first time that Springfield has had a minister to live there all the time.

E. V. Lunger began work with the Second Church, Richmond, and as the worker of the First Church, Richmond. The outlook is good for building up the cause in that part of this important town.

E. B. Baker had two additions in Laurel county from another religious body.

There were thirty additions through the labors of Z. Ball, the "Living-link" of Broadway, Lexington. He is doing good work in Jackson and surrounding cities.

J. B. Flinchum, the "Living-link" of Harrodsburg Church, is pushing steadily forward in Breathitt county. Three added in January.

W. L. Lacy reports thirteen additions in Morgan county and the field promising for a good harvest.

G. H. Thomas added three in Lee and adjoining counties. The muddy roads of the mountains hinder the work much at this season.

Louis A. Kohler and the Bromley Church continue to work together with hope for good results.

W. J. Hudspeth, the general evangelist of South Kentucky, had a fine month. Two churches organized in Ohio county. Forty-three baptisms and forty-nine added otherwise. He was hard at work all the month.

W. J. Cocke held a meeting at Roaring Springs, Trigg county, and was at a number of other points. He helped in locating a man with Grayson and Olive Hill. $76.40 for Kentucky missions and $625 for local work. He is now at Lebanon for dedication and meeting.

J. W. Masters spent the entire month in Leslie county. He finds that we have about 400 people in that county, not a house of worship belonging to us. Twenty-three baptisms and twenty-four added otherwise.

J. B. Briney and Bardstown have begun another year together and we hope with a good year's work before them.

H. H. Thompson, the "Living-link" of Midway Church, is planning the most active campaign of his ministry in his Pike county field.

There were five baptisms at Latonia and H. C. Runyon begins his eighth year with that church with the hope that it will be the best and every indication that it will be so.

D. G. Combs, the youngest man of his age in Kentucky, preached forty-four sermons, added 112, raised $29 for Kentucky missions and did much general work. Long may he live to sound the truth abroad in the hills of eastern Kentucky.

H. W. Elliott was busy all the month, remaining at home on the Sunday of the blizzard and pushed the work by pen and tongue as best he could. He attended the secretaries' meeting in St. Louis and the meeting of the Calendar Committee. The receipts of the month were $1,197.19. 356 additions in January is almost unprecedented in our history. 1,071 added in five months. Brethren of Kentucky, this is a great work. Are you helping to do it? Has your church paid the apportionment? Are you willing to allow us to do without your fellowship any longer? Will you not take vigorous steps to insure that the church of which you are a member is in line for the work of Kentucky missions, during this good Centennial year? We urge every church having anything in hand for the work to send it in now.

H. W. Elliott, Sec. and Treas.

Sulphur, Ky., February 5, 1909.

The Independence Blvd. Church, Kansas City, Mo., Geo. H. Combs, minister, has just sent the Foreign Society $1,666. This looks like a real Centennial offering. Let there be many more like it.

Geo. C. Ritchey, Newburg, Ore., chairman of the committee that has for its object the raising of $15,000 for the S. S. "Oregon" on the Congo, says: "We will keep after the matter until the Centennial Convention or until we build the steamer."

BOTH GAINED
By Change to Postum.

"We have given Postum over a year's trial," writes a Wis. lady, "and our only regret is that we did not try it before. Previously we used coffee twice a day and were very fond of it.

"My husband had been subject to severe attacks of sick headache for years and at such times could not endure the sight or smell of coffee. This led me to suspect that coffee was the cause of his trouble.

"I was also troubled very much with acidity of the stomach and heart palpitation after meals. I had been doctoring for this but had not suspected that coffee was the cause.

"Finally we purchased some Postum and it did for me what the medicines had failed to do. The first day we used Postum I noticed less of my own trouble, the second day was entirely free from it and have never been troubled since.

"My husband has been entirely free from attacks of sick headache since he quit coffee and began to use Postum.

"I have heard people say they did not like the flavor of Postum, yet I have served it to them without detection, because it has the color and snappy coffee taste, similar to mild high-grade Java. This shows they had not made it right. When made according to directions on pkg., it is as delicious as coffee and besides, it is wholesome."

Some Delayed Meeting Echoes

BUFFALO, N. Y., JEFFERSON ST. CHURCH

Amount raised during the past year for all purposes, $4,421.22. Average weekly attendance at the B. S., 474. Amount raised by B. S. $1,363.30. Number responding to the gospel invitation since January 19, 1908, 100. The pastor made 1,252 calls, conducted twenty-seven funerals, married sixteen couples, and made over thirty addresses outside the field of his own daily activities. The large Bible-school, dating from the revival under the leadership of that consecrated, wideawake and up-to-date school specialist, Miss Eva Lemert, has contributed more toward the successes of 1908 than any other single factor.

WEST END CHURCH, CHICAGO

The past year has been an eventful one in many respects. There have been many evidences of growth in numbers, organization, liberality and spirituality. Those who have been with this work from its earlier history can best understand our cause's advancement during the past twelve months. There has been a healthy growth in all departments, especially in the missionary activities of the church. Raised for City Missions, $18; Home Missions, $19.38; A. C. M. S., $37.29; Foreign Missions $31.38; Church Extension, $15.55. Raised for all other purposes, $85.70. Addition to our membership for 1908, thirty-five.

The Bible-school has done valient work during the past year, having purchased a library that cost $75, which as about ready for circulation and in addition to this work the past year shows a very satisfactory increase both in attendance and collection over the year 1907. Attendance increased fourteen per cent; collection, eighty-six per cent.

The Ladies' Aid Society has contributed through their efforts and work over $100 in material and substantial improvements on our church building.

During the past year our pastor, C. M. Kreidler, has made 700 calls, preached 114 sermons, performed three marriage ceremonies, preached three funeral sermons and conducted forty Bible studies and performed many other duties which it would be difficult to tabulate.

John W. Whitmore,
Church Clerk.

HARTFORD, INDIANA

At our annual business meeting a net increase of thirty-one members reported for the year 1908. A total of $2,270.75 was raised by all departments of the church. We have improved our church building until we have one of the most beautiful buildings in the city. All departments of the church are in healthy condition. Our Men's Association has forty-seven members.

F. C. McCormick, pastor.

Centennial Ideals

On the first page of "The Centennial Herald" of the First Christian Church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, appears the following:

Every Family in the Church Coöperating in its Work.—Personal work in some department, regular contributions.

A More Sacred Use of Sacred Things.—The Lord's Day, the Lord's Supper.

A Deeper Religious Life in Every Home and Every Heart.—Prayer, Worship, Bible Study.

A Larger and Better Bible School.—An average attendance of at least 200, more men and boys enlisted.

Our Distinct Centennial Aim—Christian Union.—In our local congregation, in Cedar Rapids, in the church universal.

A Social Application to the Gospel.—Winning others to Christ, our evangelistic meetings, brotherhood.

Twelve Hundred Dollars to Missions and Benevolences.—In our regular offerings, apart from C. W. B. M.

W. A. Morrison is getting a grip on the work at Higginsville, Mo.

The church at Trenton, Mo., is planning to have its own representative on the foreign field. W. A. Shullenberger is the minister. It is believed a number of new Livinglinks in Missouri will be enrolled this year.

Last week the Foreign Society received another gift of $500 on the Annuity Plan from a friend in Michigan. The Society is also encouraged to believe that two new Livinglinks from Michigan will be enrolled this year.

The Foreign Society asks every church in the brotherhood to hold a Missionary rally Sunday night, February 28. A suggestive program will be found in the February Intelligencer. This can be made a great inspirational meeting with the local forces.

S. M. Bernard, minister at Madisonville, Ky., has just left for a tour of Palestine and Europe. The church granted him February, March and April as a vacation in reward for faithful service rendered. Bro. Bernard has held pastorates in Louisville, Ky., and Boulder, Colo.

The National Missionary Congress of Laymen of Canada will be held in Toronto, March 31 to April 14. Fully 2,000 men are expected to be present. It is hoped a large number of our own brethren in Canada and from the border in this country will attend. They will receive a hearty welcome.

Edgar S. Potter writes: The Foreign Missionary Rally held in Quincy on January 20 by Brothers McLean, Hanna and Butchart was a great event. Over eighty people from adjoining towns were present and some twelve or fifteen ministers, many of whom participated in the day's exercises. At night standing room was at a premium and numbers were turned away. Dr. Butchart returned and preached an inspiring sermon on Sunday morning. These brethren have done much to create a flame of enthusiasm in all lines of work in the counties adjoining and their presence was a benediction. Receive them, brethren, "as becometh saints."

The church at South Chicago is planning some union prayer meetings with the Baptists.

The church at Evanston, Ohio, has already raised about $500 on the $600 for the year. This kind of preparation for the March Offering looks good. This is a young church—few in numbers and not rich in purse, but has vision and a holy purpose.

C. M. Chilton of St. Joseph, Mo., is already planning for a great offering for Foreign Missions. He will try to organize a class of $100 givers. If a plan like this were generally adopted in the churches, we would raise half a million dollars and more.

The Missionary Rallies being conducted by A. McLean and S. J. Corey are helping to awaken great interest in Foreign Missions. At some of the evening services standing room is at a premium in the churches. The usual attendance and interest is larger this year than in past years. These brethren are much encouraged over the campaign.

The Stomach of the Child

Is The Organ All Parents Should Protect and Keep Normal.

The stomach of a child is the organ above all others upon which the future of a child depends. Bodily development is fast in children, and the nourishment necessary to meet such development is the one essential demanded from a parent. Most mothers and fathers, jealously guard a child from the formation of bad habits, yet in this age our children early become the victims of wrong food, over-eating and irregular meals.

It is most appalling to know the effect of stomach troubles among our children.

Most children who are nervous, irritable and cross, who dream, sleep restlessly, who tire easily and have no desire for child exercise, generally have stomach trouble, indigestion and dyspepsia.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are intended to thoroughly digest food and to place the system in shape to obtain all the nourishment it needs from such food.

These tablets mix with the juices of the system, enriching them and giving to the body the ingredients necessary to build up the radipdly growing brain and body of the young.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets should be given to children after each meal and at bed time. They are made from pure vegetable and fruit essences and contain no harmful chemicals whatever. The use of these tablets will give greater vim to a child in its school work or at its play. They will produce appetite and soothe nerves, destroy abnormal cravings and will allay the bad effects of sweets and such improper foods as most children enjoy and will eat no matter what is done to prevent it.

It is due the child that his stomach be protected by the parent, and if Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are given after meals, the habits of the child will not tear down the stomach and destroy the digestive juices nearly so rapidly. Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are given to each and every degree of life. Any condition of the stomach welcomes them, from the strongest to the weakest. For sale by all druggists, price 50 cents. Send us your name and address today and we will mail you at once a trial package free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

A BOLENGE REUNION.

Each time the evangelists of the Bolenge church, and the Christians from the hinterland go out for three months, it seems as if they were taking a sudden leap in the darkness. You will read in the papers that slavery and cannibalism and murder are abolished in this state, but we know that out in the measureless stretch of country back of Bolenge, it is as ever in the darkness, that might is the only right, and men of dark deeds revel in the darkness. More than once has heathen or Catholic smitten these bearers of the Light which lays bare their deeds, but not as yet has one lost his life by violence. Nevertheless, as they go, many wonder, "Will they all come back?" but they themselves only say, "As Jesus wills," and plunge into the thick darkness.

Maybe this knowledge of the evangelists' work is bringing it to pass more and more in the church that they look forward to the returning of their representatives as great reunions for fellowship and inspiration, as well as great feasts where is spread the Gospel for all who will.

Aside from its fellowship, the conference we are just closing has been remarkable for its preaching. For four weeks we have had two evangelistic meetings each day, and never the same preacher! And we haven't run out of preachers yet, either. Those who preached in this protracted meeting were our choice ones, worthy of such a gathering! Why don't some of those churches who sit around and whine that this work is "all folly and rot" trot out their preachers and duplicate this meeting?

But speaking of preaching reminds me of an incident which occurred at a C. E. meeting during the conference. The topic had somehow been chosen from one of the difficult chapters of Revelation, and when the meeting was thrown open, there ensued one of those chilly pauses so common to C. E. meetings, but most uncommon in Bolenge C. E. circles. Finally one evangelist gathered together his courage, and got up. He read about three of the hardest verses in the chapter, then, after a solemn pause, said, "Brothers and Sisters, these words which I have read are hard words. You don't understand them, and neither do I, but they are God's words, therefore let us accept them as His; let us ponder on them; let us be saved by them"!

As the conference drew to a close, the news came that we are permitted to occupy the new station at Longa. The Bolenge church has always been kept intact, despite of the fact that the membership is so scattered, but now it must be divided. They all know that to Longa we will give about 100 members, perhaps ten outstations, and several missionaries, but all the feeling seems to be of joy. All through the years we have tried to teach them that as we give, so we grow, and all seem to realize that the opening of the new station at Longa means large things for Jesus Christ. As I write, Bros. Eldred and Jaggard are packing up, preparatory to leaving in a few days.

The protracted meeting drew to a close Lord's Day, October 11, when fifty confessing, penitent believers, were buried into the rolling waters of the Congo, Bros. Eldred, Jaggard, Widdowson and myself baptizing simultaneously. Two days later, the reunion ended, when fifty-one evangelists went out to bear to those who sit in that unknown darkness the news of the Dayspring who from on high hath visited them as well as us.

Bolenge, Africa. A. F. Hensey.

OUR MISSOURI METHOD AND HOW IT IS WORKING.

Next to the enlistment in Teacher-Training classes of a large number of our people, I have been solicitous that we be able to hold those enlisted and get the largest possible proportion through to graduation. We are not holding all, but the indications are that a large per cent of those in our Missouri classes will come through to graduation. I am so encouraged in this belief that I have decided to describe some phases of our method of dealing with the matter, in which I think we differ from the methods employed by our brethren in some other states.

1. I have heard complaint from some of the states that classes reported to our State management and to our papers, do not register with the State (Interdenominational) Associations. Now, instead of trusting to local classes to report to the Teacher-Training superintendent, I, myself, report to him all classes reported to me. His record of Christian church classes in Missouri is thus the same as mine. The registration is, therefore, kept complete. Thus all of our classes are made parts of the great International Sunday-school Association.

2. By arrangement between Dr. J. P. O'Brien, superintendent of the Teacher-Training department of the International Association in this state, and myself, I prepare and send to all classes the questions for examination. The papers are sent to me and I read them, grade them, and report the grades to Mr. O'Brien and he accepts my grades; it being understood that all the papers, records and methods employed in these examinations are open for his inspection at any time. Thus, I am keeping in direct touch with this work from the time the class is started till it graduates. I believe this fact is enabling us to control the work much better than if these classes were left to report themselves, and to be examined by someone not in touch with the religious body to which they belong.

3. The diplomas are issued by the State Association, not directly, but through this office, and before they are sent out the seal of the Missouri Christian Bible School Association is placed upon them. Frequently classes request me to address them at graduation and present their diplomas, which I do when circumstances allow. Thus, working in smoothest harmony with the International Association, we are at the same time trying to employ methods which will insure the smallest proportion of loss, and bring our students through with a conscious devotion to the great movement and plea for which we stand.

In Missouri we want the blessing that comes to those who hold out faithfully to the end, as well as that enjoyed by him that whoopeth up nobly at the beginning.

J. H. Hardin, State Supt.
311 Century Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Nelsonville, O., Feb. 1, 1909.—We have just closed a splendid meeting here. W. H. Boden, of Athens, was the evangelist and Ida May Hanna, singer. We have only words of praise for both. Bro. Boden is a strong preacher and one of the manliest men among us. He and the pastor were college mates at Hiram and it was a great privilege to renew the old friendship. The interest grew to the close of the meetings. There were four additions the first invitation and thirteen the last. There were twelve husbands and wives, fifty-five heads of families, one person 2 and 7 another 81 baptized. Eighty dollars was cleared on the lecture delivered by the evangelist on Friday night, January 28. The Bible school averaged 530 during January and reached 608 on the 23rd. The work here is full of promise. We have a membership, which is practically clean, of 480. About 200 names were dropped less than a year ago. The new building is already too small for our work, but we will immediately finish up the large front basement room, which will give us room for about 200 more Sunday-school scholars. W. Scott Cook.

They were discussing the relative position of various countries as musical centers Germany seemed to have the most votaries, much to the evident displeasure of one excitable Italian, who wished his own country to carry of the palm. "Italy is turning out the most musicians, and has always turned out the most," he cried. "Ach, Gott!" exclaimed a German present, "can you plame her?"—Everybody's Magazine.

The English spoken by the "Pennsylvania Dutch," as the inhabitants of certain districts in the eastern part of the state are popularly known, affords some rare specimens of expression. A man who was passing a small house on the outskirts of "Sous Besselem"—that is the nearest possible spelling of the local pronunciation—heard the daughter of the family calling her brother in to supper. "George," she said, "you come right in, now; Pa's on the table, and ma's half et!"—Everybody's Magazine.

CENTENNIAL REWARDS.

First Prize	$10.00
Second Prize	5.00
Third Prize	2.00

Such good use has been made of the centennial emblem in several local church papers and bulletins that we have decided to offer the above prizes for the best centennial page appearing in one of these useful little publications and submitted to us before April 1. The centennial emblem must be used but no restriction is placed upon other matter. Use the list of centennial aims, watchwords of the reformation, quotations from the declaration and address, notable words of the fathers or whatever pertinent matter you choose.

Electrotypes of the centennial emblem are furnished at the nominal cost of fifty cents each.

Extensive use will be made of the prize-winning pages. Contestants will please keep their work standing until notified of the awards.

A CENTENNIAL BOOK.

Some years ago James Lane Allen gave the students of Bethany College an illuminating classification of literature: Ordinary treatment of ordinary matter; extraordinary treatment of ordinary matter; ordinary treatment of extraordinary matter, extraordinary treatment of extraordinary matter. "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher," by A McLean, comes easily under the last head; with the additional advantage of appearing just in time for an extraordinary occasion.

After the first few vigorous sentences in which you are introduced to one of God's supreme makers-of-history by a great man in whose heart the hero dwells at ease, you are amazed and grieved to find that he proposes to give you a series of quotations instead of his own wrought-iron words. Your next astonishment is delight for a glorious Mosaic is unveiled before you where you were dreading to behold mere patchwork.

Within this handsome little book, which the Fleming H. Revell Co. will allow any of our publishers to sell you for thirty cents, the President of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society has made to live again the mighty preacher who so marshaled the forces and the arguments of the cause that he espoused that men insisted, against his protests, and his peoples' on calling it by his name. It will not only prove a welcome treasure to those who already acknowledge themselves indebted to Mr. Campbell but it will also open up a new lead for the general student of American Church History and encourage the same author, or others, to revive the fame and messages of the heroic leaders who shared Alexander Campbell's labor and life.

Centennial Secretary.

A. McLean's New Book Free

Our proposal to give a copy of A. McLean's new book on "Alexander Campbell as a Preacher" with each new subscription of $1.50 has proved so attractive that we have decided to continue it beyond the date which we had set for its expiration. During February the offer will hold good. Ministers may have the paper (new subscription) and the book for $1.20.

Social Duty, Education and Religion

A wonderful thing about religion today is that it is getting on friendly terms with other things.

In olden times religion was a thing apart. It had special days for itself and special places. The administration of its offices was confined to a class of men specially set apart for this purpose and called "sacred." Its worship was an end in itself. Prayers were good works set over against sins, or credits recorded in heaven. The church possessed absolute value; it recognized no obligation to "make good" in the world.

This is still the conception of religion held by many thousands. But it is not the typical conception of today.

The religion that is typical of modern times is getting on friendly terms with other human interests. It is abdicating its absolutism and bending down to the life men really live. It accepts the challenge of a practical age to justify itself by its fruits. It sees that its power and worth reside in its vital relations with the rest of life, not in its holy exclusiveness.

Religion is getting on friendly terms with education. Just what their final relationship is to be has not yet been established. But each is expressing its need of the other with a growing frankness.

They have not always thus felt the need of each other. Religion at times has feared education, except that kind of education which she herself organized and controlled. But the free spirit of inquiry such as has grown up in modern times has caused religion no little anxiety.

And education has not looked with favor upon religion. The school supposed that it must be kept by itself. The mind must be trained to think without the bias of faith. Let the church stay in its own sphere and leave education alone in its sphere. This is the way education has been feeling toward religion —Until very recent times.

But now we behold the middle wall of partition being broken down. New conceptions of both religion and education are taking the places of the old conceptions. Both see that man is a unity, not a group of faculties. Both see that the hard and fast division between head and heart is artificial and absurd. Abstract definitions of education, such as that it is the "leading out" of the latent powers of the mind, are giving place to concrete and social definitions.

The conception of education now generally accepted is that it is simply the process of putting the individual into possession of the spiritual riches which society has accumulated in its long evolution.

That is to say, education is the process of adjustment by which the individual makes himself at home in the social order in which he is born.

It is just here that education has been compelled to take account of religion. For religion is one of the fundamental and persistent possessions of the social order. "Man is incurably religious," Sabatier has said. And, therefore, educators see that if their definition of education is valid it demands that our educational system shall operate not to impart science only, but religion also.

In this fundamental idea thoughtful men both in religion and in education are pretty well agreed.

But upon this agreement as a basis the attempt to proceed in practice lands us at once in the midst of a mass of problems and disagreements. Admitting that religion is to be "taught" as a function of education, how shall we undertake to teach it without doing more harm than good? To answer this question conventions are held, books are written and hundreds of our most earnest and able men and women are studying.

Happily religion itself is helping a great deal to answer this question. Religion's old fear of the spirit of free inquiry was based on a conception that identified Christianity with certain dogmas. Nowadays men are coming to see that the Christian religion is not a matter of creed or dogma of any kind whatsoever, and that to be afraid of the freest inquiry, even into our articles of faith, is essentially atheistic.

So now they are coming together—religion and education. They have yoked themselves together in an association—The Religious Education Association. For five years they have been thus joined. They celebrated their anniversary in Chicago last week. It was a great event. For three evenings the Orchestra hall was filled to hear the words of the priests and sages of religion and education. During the day time seventeen departments held special sessions in churches and halls. It baffled one to choose where to go. Every department was addressed by experts. If you went to the session on Sunday-schools, you missed the rich feasts spread at the Church Music session, and the College session and the Home session and all the rest.

But one had this consolation, that everywhere the same theme was discussed:

How to fit both religion and education up close to social duty.

That was the point of the whole convention: the obligation of both religion and culture to social welfare.

And that is a great note if one stops to appreciate it. Culture used to be aristocratic. Education was to be sought by the young man because of the benefits it would bring him. Today demands that culture be democratic, that it be not afraid to soil its hands with the world's work.

And religion, too, must be democratic. It must submit to the test of social usefulness. It must come out of the cloister and cathedral, the academy and the prayer meeting, and bend to the practical tasks of the world.

Strange to say there has been growing in late years a great movement for social betterment which has treated the church with indifference, if not contempt. Social morality can get along very well without religion, it was tacitly or expressly assumed. A phenomenon, vaguely named the social conscience, has appeared in modern times. It has no precedent in history. It is the most distinctive spiritual fact of our day.

Whether its roots were nourished by religion or not, it has grown without much consciousness of need of religion. And religion has gone on its individualistic way with little sense of affinity for this delicate sense of duty that was being formed in the social mind.

To our mind the significance of the convention of last week is this: Religion and education will work out the practical problems of their mutual relationship on the basis of and in terms of the social duty of each.

What this will mean, is already meaning, to our educational system need not here be set forth.

But that it means, is indeed already meaning, a radical reorganizing of our religious ideas and methods, is too clear and too important to gainsay. Our denominational differences will disappear when we once face the big task our Master gave us. Our creed-making will look like trifling in the presence of great deeds to be done. To cavil and contend over a book's date, or the Virgin birth, or any dogma whatsoever, will look like sin to those whose eyes flame with the passion of service.

The Trend of Events

THE PRESIDENT SCORES

The president has scored heavily in vetoing the census bill. Congress proceeded on the pious pretence that census clerks were compelled to pass a non-competitive examination. They seemed to think the word "examination" would be an anæsthetic to the strenuous executive and the people.

Frederick H. Wines, the sociologist who was Assistant Director of the last census, exposed the somnorific in that political ruse. He showed how no one would be admitted to the examinations except upon recommendation; how it was a "dead level" test only, i. e., if a grade of 75% was made no account was made of higher or lower ratings; and how then the politician could choose his favorite regardless of whether he was lowest or highest in the list. He showed, moreover, that men who failed to pass were given a second and third trial and even avered that papers had been changed after leaving the examiners' hands.

Former Superintendent of the Census Bureau, Carroll D. Wright, says $2,000,000 was needlessly expended through these political manipulations in the last census-taking and that it took a year's more time to do the work than it would have taken under the classified service.

It develops that the 4,000 offices at stake were to be divided among all the congressmen. There were enough republicans to defeat the measure unless the democrats were called off, so they were promised a share in the spoils, and enough of them accepted to pass the bill. The design was so apparent that the president's veto has left the "spoils of office" politician, who wears the guise of a statesman, exposed in a denuded condition.

A POCKET WIRELESS

One of the foremost scientists remarked in New York the other day that he expected some day to unpack a case about the size of a small hand valise and talk with his friends in France. We do not laugh at anything as impossible today and least of all at anything in the world of electricity. It seems we have but touched the borderlands of that marvelous realm of physical wonder.

It was considered a triumph when a portable wireless outfit was perfected that would not weigh over two hundred pounds and could be carried on an army mule. Now a seventy pound transmitting instrument has been made for airships. It so encloses the sparks in glass cases as to prevent danger to the inflammable material of the baloon and has a sending capacity of ten miles. The whole mechanism is confined to a space the size of a small trunk and the wire antennae hang from the basket.

The Germans are leading with the wireless telephone and have talked with ease up to two-hundred miles. Great Britain is erecting coast stations and is determined to prevent any monopoly of the future wireless service. The nations have yet to work out some things for the sake of general harmony. The experts think they will soon have perfected devices to prevent picking up messages where secrecy is desired. When commercial messages can be sent across the seas the nations will be brought yet nearer together and with the cheapness of the message will come a quickening of intercourse that brings closer the era of good will and the end of enmities.

THE MENACE OF THE RAT

The Salvation Army has done a characteristic thing in taking a cargo of tabby-cats to Calcutta. It being determined that rats carry the germ of the terrible bubonic plague, the Army, with its usual good common sense, made this move to destroy the pest. The usual alertness of the Japanese was again manifested in the taking of a census of the feline population of Osaka. They found that in that city of one and one-half million people there were but a little over fifty-four thousand tabbies, and also that in parts of the city where the plague had given most trouble the fewest cats were found. Britain finds that she is spending $1,250,000 on rat poison each year so adds another to her multitudinous societies—a "Society for the Destruction of Vermin."

Secretary Wilson of the Agricultural Department tells us that rats cost the cities of America alone $20,000,000 per year. San Francisco is getting wise to the rat problem, owing to her port for Oriental trade and consequently her exposure to the bubonic plague. Our great farm secretary also reveals the fact that in the west field mice destroy great areas of alfalfa and that common ground squirrels eat up millions of dollars worth of wheat as well as carry disease germs that the common flea may communicate to men. The National Conservation Commission reports that there are 40,000,000 prairie dogs in Texas and that they eat enough grass yearly to feed a million and a half cattle.

WOMAN IN THE NEW EAST

The final test of a civilization is its homes, and with them its treatment of women and children. Moody told England that she needed homes more than churches. The home is the molecule of society. Napoleon said France's greatest need was mothers. It was one of those wise, philosophical observations of the great Bonaparte, given when his wisdom arose above his ambition. Mothers, in that sense, is synonomous with homes. Isabella Birl Bishop, the great traveler, said she had been importuned two hundred times in the East for poison that one inmate of a harem might be rid of her rival or her rival's children. Small minded women cannot bring forth great minded sons.

The first test of the reality of the new civilization that is lighting up the East is the emancipation of woman. In Turkey women threw off their veils and joined in those remarkable jubilations in which Mohammedan and Christian embraced each other. The Turkish women have manifested the keenest interest in the new era and many of them are contributing to the journals. It is now known that they were among the most effective of the secret agents of the "Young Turks" in their campaign. Some went too far for a people that have an inborn prejudice against woman's public appearance and many have wisely agreed to be patient and await the day of the coming of their own.

In Persia women are among the chief defenders of the constitution and both give of their jewels and write for the papers. In China an edict has been issued making the education of girls compulsory. Officials are discharged if they allow the feet of their daughters bound. Women of the wealthier and official classes are erecting special girl's schools and modernizing their homes.

THE TRUST AN OUTLAW

The Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890 made any combination acting in restraint of trade an outlaw. Like most laws that involve new procedure that Act has had to wait upon public opinion for enforcement. Like all pioneer enactments, too, it is an imperfect instrument. But the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Continental Wall Paper Co. vs. Louis Voight & Sons, demonstrates that it is a powerful instrument when invoked.

The Voight firm purchased a large consignment of wall paper and paid but part of the bill. When the Continental tried to collect the balance the Cincinnati firm took refuge behind the Sherman Act and the provision therein that no firm acting in restraint of trade could collect a debt or have any recourse whatever to the courts. The law is plain on its face. The question of fact was established. It was proved that the Continental controlled 99% of the wall paper business and that it had raised prices over 50%. It was found that its directors fixed prices absolutely, not for the jobber alone, but for the dealer to whom he sold as well. If the schedule thus fixed was violated the erring customer could buy no more.

There remained then only to have the Supreme Court pass on the law relating to the offence. By a vote of five to four it upheld the law. Justice Harlan gave the decision in his usual clear manner. The gist of his decision was that the courts could not aid in the enforcement of an illegal agreement. This principle, he said, was long established in both English and American law. The defendents may have entered the agreement with full and guilty knowledge, and the business transaction might require that they pay the debt so far as honor between man and man is concerned, but public policy demands that the principle be maintained.

Justice Holmes maintained in the dissenting opinion that when a party purchases with knowledge of the illegal conditions, yet submits in order to get the goods, that it is aiding and abetting the malfeasance, and that to refuse to pay is dishonest and that it is of less moment that the trust be upheld than that a dishonest debtor be upheld.

Of course this means that the trust must collect C. O. D. or take its chances in the collection of debts. This further means that its only chances are to be taken with the firms that will never want to buy again. It has only to add enough to the price to cover that contingency and collect the bad debts off the customers who will pay.

The law goes further and provides that any property held in violation of its provisions i. e., by any trust that controls and arbitrarily fixes prices, may be seized in the course of interstate transportation and condemned. This clause would "bust the trust" if it were enforced.

Charles Darwin

Among the many anniversaries which this year brings, none is perhaps more significant than that of the author of "The Origin of Species." It is not too much to say that that book was the greatest single literary product of the nineteenth century. By this it is not meant that it was the most popular work, the most widely read, or the most immediately influential. But no one can survey the entire field of thought which the nineteenth century brought to view without the feeling that more changes were wrought in convictions and opinions by Darwin's great work than by any other single utterance of the century.

Before that time science had been busy with the gathering of data in reference to nature and the life of plants and animals. But for the most part the static view of the world was maintained, a view which had been inherited from many centuries of tradition. It was a commonly accepted belief that forms of life as they are observed today had been largely what they now are from the earliest ages, and even that those fossils which have astonished geologists were actually created in the rocks where later generations have come upon them. The idea of a progressive and constantly changing natural order had not so far impressed the minds of scientific men as to become a determining theory in their study of the facts of life.

Darwin's work opened up an entirely new field of thought. Upon the basis of the same facts previously observed, he proceeded to such attempts at classification, such tracings of relationship, and such inquiries into the laws of cause and effect as offered what seemed to him an intelligible explanation of a constant and ever enlarging process of development. To this process he gave the name of evolution.

It was not to be expected that so startling an announcement could be accepted at once; nor, indeed, even contemplated without grave apprehensions by the students of many subjects which had already taken apparently mature and satisfactory form. If the new principle was true, it must revolutionize science, removing it from the static to the dynamic or evolutionary foundation. It was not strange, therefore, that science stood hesitant if not protestant in the face of the new definitions. This was perhaps to be expected. Science has always been reluctant to accept new theories in spite of the fact that it is usually believed by theologians to be the most revolutionary and disturbing of all human activities. Yet the strenuous opposition to the Copernican theory of the solar system, to Gallileo's experiments, to Columbus' belief in a spherical world, to Harvey's discovery of the circulation of the blood, and to practically every other scientific announcement, should persuade us to the contrary.

But evolution more than justified itself by its reasonable explanations of the phenomena of nature. In spite of protesting traditions, both scientific and theological, it slowly won its way to acceptance and at the present time is the accredited view in every circle of scientific, literary, historical, and social research, and is rapidly becoming the final word in theological interpretation. Darwin's view of the progress of natural processes explains so admirably the continuous creative work of God that it was strange men should have dissented from it in the supposed interest of religion. Yet, of course, it was not without gravely disturbing elements. When it was easily conjectured and indeed by some confidently affirmed that evolution had made God unnecessary, when other scholars, using Darwin's method, went on from science to metaphysics and denied that there was any necessity for a First Cause, they were drawing conclusions not warranted by the facts and were passing beyond the legitimate realm of their own inquiries. Darwin himself was not guilty of this assumption, and the work of those men who drew unwarranted and atheistical conclusions from his inquiries has now given place to a better interpretation of evolution, which is today recognized as not only the basis for all modern study, but as one of the most valuable aids to the understanding of the Christian faith.

Darwin's work was only a beginning. He had discovered a great principle which all later scientists have recognized and developed. But on many points his views of particular items in the evolutionary process have been superseded. Few men would now go to Darwin for the best explanation of the facts of variation and heredity. A multitude of later workers in the same field have devoted themselves to laborious research with astonishingly satisfactory results. The writings of Weismann, Le Conte, Wallace, Bateson, Romanes, De Vries, and others, form a continuing and ever expanding commentary upon the great principle of evolution which they have done much to amplify and develop. It is to their pages that the modern student goes rather than to Darwin for information upon the details of the evolutionary processes. None the less, "The Origin of Species" will ever be read with satisfaction as the foundation material of modern views of God's work.

It will be of value if the anniversary of Darwin's birth shall awaken in the hearts of Christian preachers and teachers a fresh desire to know the facts of nature as they are interpreted by the masters of biology and geology in our day. Henry Drummond following Bishop Butler, awakened the interest of the Bible student and preacher in the wonderful correspondence between God's ways of working in nature in human life and in revelation. Not less helpful to religious education are more modern statements of scientific facts, such as some of the books above noted. And it is interesting to recall the fact that the most significant illustrations which Jesus ever gave to religious life are in terms not of legal processes nor human institutions, but rather in terms of nature's work and the life of man. His two most notable sayings regarding spiritual life linger in the mind of the man who has any acquaintance with scientific truth in our time: "The earth beareth fruit of herself, first the blade, then the ear, then the full corn in the ear," the very best definition of evolution that the great teacher could have given, and, "Except a man be born from above, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God," a statement of the divine origin of life and of its inception as a birth with the consequent need of nurture and growth.

"The conflict between science and theology" has been an interesting theme of discussion in the past, but there is no such conflict save in the mind of the literalist whether he be a student of science or of the Bible. God works out his results by slow, but constant, means. Jesus said, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work," when reproved by the Pharisees for failing to observe their definition of Sabbath rest. This great truth that God has never been inactive, but from the beginning to the present moment has been constantly putting forth creative and disciplining energy, is recognized today as the best interpretation both of the facts of nature and of the religious life.

February 12, 1809, gave the world two emancipators, Lincoln the statesman, and Darwin the scientist.

Religion and Education Co-operating

Meeting of the Religious Education Association in Chicago, February 9---12, 1909

SIX years ago, the Religious Education Association was organized in Chicago, largely as the result of suggestions made by one who impressed his generation, in certain departments at least, more forcibly than any man of his time—Pres. William Rainey Harper. Its purpose was, and is, "to promote religious and moral education." As the result, directly or indirectly, of the agitation encouraged and directed by this association, there has been observable a noteworthy change of sentiment in the matter of religion in its relation to education. Where, a decade ago, there could hardly be observed a dozen books of worth upon this imperial subject, scores are now coming from the press yearly, while the volumes reporting the proceedings of the several conventions of the Religious Education Association are themselves a fund of literature upon the subject, helpful, stimulating and informing.

Some Notable Attendants.

The convention held in Chicago last week, its first general session being that of Feb. 9, was a remarkable one in many respects. The personnel of those who attended it was indeed suggestive of the growth of interest in the object around which the association is organized. The addresses of Ambassador James Bryce, of Great Britain, Presidents Eliot, of Harvard, Judson, of Chicago, Pritchett, of the Carnegie Foundation, of New York, and Northrop, of Minnesota, not to mention numerous other educators, afforded a broad intellectual outlook. Distinguished religious teachers like Pres. Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin, and Dr. W. C. Bitting, of St. Louis, and others, added their message in the general meetings or in the departmental session. Men known the world over for their contribution to the uplift of society, men such as Prof. C. R. Henderson, and women like Miss Jane Addams; writers upon psychology and pedagogy and similar subjects, such as Prof. Geo. A. Coe, of Northwestern University; Dr. Francis G. Peabody, of Harvard; Prof. Chas. F. Kent, of Yale; Prof. Edwin D. Starbuck, of the University of Iowa; Pres. F. K. Sanders, of Washburne College, Kansas, were also heard.

The program represented a most remarkable piece of organization. All told, thirty-nine different meetings were scheduled, and something like 116 addresses were given. On some days, there were as many as ten different meetings, as many as seven being in session at the same hour. When it is recalled that the printed program alone would fill at least a page and a half of CHRISTIAN CENTURY, and that the addresses, if reported in full would make a volume of 300 or 400 pages, the absolute impossibility of giving more than a glimpse of this remarkable convention will be appreciated.

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY will not attempt to do more than give a brief survey of the four general sessions, and point out the fact that there were fifteen different departmental meetings, besides meetings in which groups of specialists delivered papers, and engaged in discussion upon such subjects as "Universities," "Colleges," "Sunday-schools," "Teacher-training," "Brotherhoods," and kindred themes. The three general sessions held in the evening found large and interested audiences in the great Theodore Thomas Orchestra Hall. One of the features of the convention was the music. Any one who had the privilege of listening to such devotional and inspirational singing as was here provided could not but wish that religious "ragtime" tunes, and Salvation Army hurdy-gurdy songs would evermore be stilled.

Religious Education and Social Duty.

There were three admirable addresses at the opening session on Tuesday evening. The first of these was by the president of the association, Dr. Francis G. Peabody, of Harvard College. A large audience listened to his stirring paper on "The Social Conscience, and the Religious Life." Dr. Peabody showed the dangers of exchanging an active, devotional and teaching Christianity for mere laboratory methods. We are sometimes in danger, he declared, of devoting so much time to discussions about doing good, that there is not time actually to be good. Religious education fortifies social activity. The teaching of Jesus showed undoubtedly that religion must first reach the will and then eventually conduct. Rabbi Emil G. Hirsch, of Chicago, showed the relationship between "Religious Education and Moral Efficiency." He declared that religion, and religion alone, offers the basis on which moral efficiency can be maintained, and that religion must be planned so as to keep this function ever in view.

The third address of the evening was that of Pres. S. C. Mitchell, of the University of South Carolina, upon "Religious Education and Racial Adjustment." It was a manly, dispassionate appeal, by a southerner of southerners, for religious training and social uplift for the Negro. It bristled with facts, incidents and suggestions. The address closed with suggesting that in the settlement of the race problem in the South, religion has a three-fold opportunity: to encourage racial tolerance and coöperation; to demand of Christians that they beget a spirit which shall be helpful to a right understanding in order to offset prejudice; and to create a statesmanship, especially in the South, that shall be sensitive to the highest things in the Negro. If we study Jesus Christ on race prejudice, we shall find obstacles being removed. Love never faileth, and the South is clinging to that basal principle.

The Progress of Religious Education.

The second general session was held in Sinai Temple and brought out a fine audience which listened with keen appreciation to three able papers. The first upon the annual survey of progress in religious education was presented by Prof. Geo. A. Coe, of Northwestern University. The past year had been characterized by a wider moral awakening in general than in any of the six previous years of the organization. Following a time of moral depression a new stage in moral reform has come. A revival of moral education is noticeable. The aim of the schools is directed toward the essential of character building. Last year the first international congress of moral education was held with the theme of the relationship of religion to morals. The advisability of doing away with the teaching of religion in the schools was shown and the method for securing right character was thought to lie in the direct and indirect way of teaching morals. The school should be a constructive power in the whole life of the pupil. Industrial education is necessary to a real democracy. Industrial service is a moral calling. The movement for moral education tends to enlighten the conscience of the adult as well as that of the child. The socialization of the conscience of the Sunday-school pupil is also essential. During the years of the association's existence 396 text-books upon moral and religious education have been published and $65,000 expended in the work.

Religious Education in the Orient.

Prof. Edward C. Moore, of Harvard University, gave a paper, charming in diction, full of solid facts and suggestions, upon "The Progress of Religious Education in the Orient." The progress of ethics in the various religions of the East was shown to be, not an effort to secure knowledge as we mean it in our national life, but simply to acquaint the mind with the history of traditions. Our purpose in education is to produce a man. Christianity alone shows adaptation to modern learning. The progress of education in Japan is but one of the advances in that nation. The nationalization of Christianity in that nation has begun. China stands where Japan stood forty years ago. China has turned in a fury upon the old education of the empire so long observed and foreign learning is everywhere in vogue for it has its ethical benefit for the people. It is the Christian movement in China to which we must look for the remedy for all present ills. In Turkey there has been a religious revival of Mohammedanism, but in the educational sense it has taken no secular attitude. The new education is an attempt to adapt it to the existing conditions while the people still remain Moslems. Christianity has in it the mightiest reforming agency in the world and for this reason it is the leavening force for revolutionizing the conditions of the modern world.

The third paper was by Pres. Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin College, and discussed "The Future of Religious Education." It was pointed out how the increase of wealth, the challenge of city life, the proximity of nations under the changed external conditions of life and other modern conditions, were moral educational forces on a world wide scale today. We are put in possession of a new world. Greater simplicity of life is demanded because of our complex life. This forced interdependence demands the social virtues. The conquest of race prejudice has begun and must be worked out toward a common brotherhood. The bigness of the task brings compensation. Even the poorest method gives evidence of its being capable of being worked. The new inner world of the mind is being more and more touched and influenced to these high ideals. The scientific spirit must be brought more and more into the sphere of the moral and a new standard of efficiency demanded. Rev. Henry F. Cope, the efficient and progressive general secretary of the association gave his report in the annual meeting which closed the session of the morning. The past year has been one of the widest progress in the history of the association. The secretary had travelled 32,000 miles during the year in his official duties and held 200 conferences. The receipts for the year had been $11,555 and the expenditures $11,540. All old debts have been paid; 294 new members have been received, making the present membership of the association 2,100. It was recommended that a permanent memorial fund be established in memory of Drs. Harper, Hall and Blakeslee, also that the membership fee for students in school be made $1 instead of $3. The report of the nominating committee was presented and officers for the coming year elected, Prof. George Albert Coe, Ph. D., being made president.

On Wednesday evening a large and representative audience listened to three exceedingly interesting addresses. Pres. Harry Pratt Judson spoke upon "Religious Coöperation." He pointed out that the difference among denominations might be summed up as those of metaphysics, methods and machinery. Are these the essentials of religion? As a social force the churches of Christ are one body. In their service for humanity, there is need of unity, although not of union. When all churches join hands in works of righteousness, there will be observable a decided religious advance.

Dr. Charles R. Henderson wittily replied to a remark of President Judson that so large a proportion of our churches is composed of women, by pointing out that in the penitentiaries there are about sixty men to one woman. Is it here that we shall discover the absentees from the churches? Young men are specially interested in physical activity, in money making and in politics. There is a duty incumbent upon the churches to turn these three elements of manly power toward the uplift of society.

The Ethics of Industrialism.

President Eliot's address was upon "The Ethics of Industrialism." It was a comprehensive and thorough disscussion of the ethical elements involved in the relationship of employers to employes. He gave many examples of unethical conduct on the part of both capital and labor, denouncing as unethical the failures of capital to provide proper rewards and freedom of effort, and the failures of labor in such matters as enforcing a uniform wage, which is really a minimum wage, and in limiting output and in calling strikes. He then showed how the adoption of ethical standards on the part of both employer and employe, attended with mutual kindness and sympathy, is necessary to industrial peace. Friends of religious education must use every effort to secure the moral and religious training of youth, reform in industrial ethics, and the adoption of ethical principles of government.

The fourth and closing general session was held on Thursday evening, Orchestra Hall being crowded. President Peabody called upon Dr. W. C. Bitting, of St. Louis, to speak concerning the perennial energy of the association, which he did in his usual effective way. Dean Shailer Mathews reported for the committee on resolutions, commending the work of industrial education; the International Sunday-school Association for its lesson series; the colleges and seminaries for the introduction of direct religious instruction and the policies of the foreign educational congresses in their work and influence.

The new president of the association, Prof. George Albert Coe, was introduced and in response referred to the lasting influence and prophetic insight of President Harper who gave inception and direction to the association. He also announced that the next meeting of the association would be held in Nashville, Tenn., and of the 118 papers announced on the program of this year, not one had failed of presentation, and that with some half-dozen exceptions, caused largely by illness, the writers had been present to read their own papers. This is all the more notable when it is known that every one appearing on the program pays his own expenses to the meeting.

Miss Jane Addams, of the Hull House, Chicago, presented a paper upon "The Reaction of Modern Life upon Religious Development." In making a plea for the better protection of youth and women, she declared this country to be behind several other nations in securing safeguards. Something is wrong in our methods or lack of method of instruction when it is possible for 20,000 youth to be arrested in one year in a city like Chicago. It is more important to direct and satisfy the energies of youth that call for realization than to preach to them any particular faith or accepted religious code. There must be something wrong with our instruction and our religion when the schools and the church fail to furnish that food which will satisfy the inquiry of youth. It was declared that the stage is dealing with the moral problems of our day in a more practical manner than many other agencies. We are making our experiments today in the most materialistic period of all time. If our religion is genuine it should be easy for us to unite our various creeds for the realization of social betterment.

The last address of the evening was delivered by Hon. James Bryce, ambassador of Great Britain, who spoke upon the changes which had come in recent years in religious thought and the relation of religious instruction to our public-school system and to morals. Certain facts in the social and intellectual condition of modern countries, especially of England and America, make it especially needful to take every possible means of impressing the fundamental truths of religion on the minds of the young. Ethical teaching, while given to some extent in the schools, would be vastly more impressive if based on religion. The greater opportunity for pleasure which has come with wealth and saving of time, and which in itself may not be wrong, presents a new phase for Christian activity. The sense of duty is not as strong as once it was. People are a little less ashamed now than formerly to say, "Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die." The immigrant has come and he does not have our New England traditions. This new mass of humanity and these new conditions present a new phenomenon for our age. Two agencies are primarily essential to the solution of our problem, these are the newspapers and the schools. In addition to the ethics already taught, the duty is upon religious teachers to put forth all their power to have religion vindicate its place in the training of the young throughout the whole course of life.

After the secretary had announced that during the meeting of the association 200 new members had been received, also 1,000 acres of land in Texas given for the benefit of the work, the association adjourned.

Paragraphic Editorials

For death to enter the ranks of our active Chicago ministry is unprecedented. Chicago ministers die, but in the past sixty years they have left the city or the active ministry ere death overtook them. Our only shrine is at the humble grave of A. Larrabee, whose years of sacrificing toil in the mission field of Chicago, laid the foundations of a number of our best churches. Many could have wished that the body of Parker Stockdale had been interred here so that the realities of his ministry and his hearty personal strength might find expression in a fitting symbol to aid in keeping them ever fresh.

Mr. Stockdale was one of that large company of ministers who have found among the Disciples of Christ a sort of refuge from the restraints of sectarianism. He came into our ministry because it promised him freedom. This freedom he was careful to exercise without abuse. His education had put him in touch with the typical ideas of modern thinking. He knew in which way the currents of progress were flowing. Yet he was able to carry on a ministry in a large church including widely diverse minds without doctrinal friction. The secret of this power was that Parker Stockdale was not a preacher of a doctrine but a minister of life. He used doctrine in the service of life. He was more intent on conveying the practical meanings of the teaching than in gaining assent to the mere correctness of it.

An interesting story comes to us from one who was pastor of an Aurora, Ill., church while Mr. Stockdale was leader of the People's Liberal Church there. He was trying to build up the religious life of his people by the use of Shakespeare and George Eliot and by the development of a sort of free club life. His brother ministers had become acquainted with him and had felt the warmth and vigor of his personality. They could not help the feeling that this man was out of his true place. His was a truly evangelical spirit, they declared, no matter if his opinions were not orthodox. One day a group of them were talking on this wise when it was suggested that they make him the subject of united prayer that he might be delivered from the cold and unsocial, if not hostile, atmosphere of shallow liberalism. Thereupon they got down upon their knees and prayed for the recovery to the evangelical fold of their brother who, they believed, had been misled. It was not long after this that Parker Stockdale united with the Disciples of Christ and flung his eager, ardent nature into the ministry of Christ and the Cross.

The real work of the Church of Christ in the world is that of accomplishing the Saviour's purpose that all men may know of the truth and by it be made free. The establishment of the cause of Christ in any place is only preliminary to its extension to further regions. Every outpost is to become a center of further missionary effort. The church that does not recognize this imperative call of the cross to missionary activity has failed to read beyond the first principles of the gospel. Indeed, it is difficult to understand how even the first principles can be comprehended without the recognition of this great truth.

There is no day in the missionary calendar of the church more important than the first Sunday in March. At that time, if at no other, the whole round world comes into the survey of the intelligent follower of Jesus. He knows that the only thing which differentiates all western Christian life from the paganism of the East is the presence of this powerful force which began its quiet but triumphant progress twenty centuries ago. To be negligent of this call for missionary information and offerings is to be heretical on the most vital point of our holy faith. Wrong opinions might be tolerated, but lack of concern regarding the supreme work of the church is a heresy unpardonable in the sight of our Leader.

Announcement is now officially made that the next triennial convention of the World's

Sunday-school Association will be held in Washington, D. C., in May, 1910. The last two conventions have been held in Jerusalem and Rome, respectively. Rev. F. B. Meyer is the president of the association.

Our readers will welcome the announcement that we have been able to perfect arrangements for going to press in time to get THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY into the home of every American subscriber before the Sunday following the date of the paper. Contributors and reporters will have their "copy" in our office by Thursday at the latest. Room will be kept for telegrams sent on Sunday night.

We overheard a street car conversation the past week between a young man evidently a student, and a gentleman with the marks of a clergyman upon him. The topic was probably some phase of religious education for we heard the younger man remark, "I graduated from ——— College, attended ——— Seminary for three years and accepted a Y. M. C. A. position which took me into about fifteen theological schools. Then deciding on making a specialty of sociology I entered the University of Chicago with my mind not wholly free from misgiving, for I had heard much of its higher criticism and even of its godlessness. What was my surprise, then, when I entered my first class to hear Professor Henderson open the hour with an earnest prayer! I had never seen a class in the orthodox seminaries opened in that way."

The marvelous response of the world to those suffering because of the Sicilian earthquake is measured for us now by the report that over $16,000,000 has been sent, and that those appointed to distribute it are hardly able to do so. Such an event of suffering and such a world-wide rushing to its relief disclose how love is binding all the nations together.

Building Fences in the Sea

By J. M. Lowe

Truth is like the ocean. Different seas have different names, but after all it is the same sea, the same tides traverse all. The boundary lines are imaginary, and one day the tiniest brooklet hid away in the mountains will find its way to the sea. It is further true that,

"No stream from its source
Flows seaward how lonely so ever its course,
But that some land is gladdened."

So in the past each statement of a thinking mind that came from a good heart, has gladdened some life.

But "the sea is His," so also is the truth. Many men upon the sea learn different lessons in the same sea, for so vast is the deep that we can know it only in part. It is mine, therefore, to thank the man who finds something new, or brings strange gifts from ports unknown to me. It is a day for curious and delighted wonder rather than for sharp criticism. And the sea abides; no wise or otherwise word of mine shall stop its throbbing tides or arrest the music of its waves.

So, many minds are alarmed at words, and foolishly we have been trying to build fences in the sea, supposing that the waves will stop when they get to our fence. As a matter of fact, only the wave form moves, while the unwearied sea rests forever in its mighty bed. So thought forms, creeds and ideas clash while the ocean of truth abides. After all the sea is not clamoring for our assistance in making it grand and deep. Nor can the tides be stayed in their ceaseless flow. Uninvited and unhindered, they go on forever. It is for us to adapt ourselves to them or be left behind or carried in the opposite direction. Who can reverse the Gulf Stream or send the icebergs back to the frozen north? The same man can stay the tides of mighty thought that flow from the heart of the Infinite.

Words are not truth. They are but signs of what some one thinks concerning the truth. The geologist did not build the earth; the botanist did not plant the flowers; nor did the astronomer light the stars. Nor can men destroy these things. Scientists have walked with wondering eyes amid the beauties of nature and have tried to tell us with joy what they saw there. Theologians and scholars are no more. Wise as they are, the scholars did not make God or his works in nature or grace. It is their mission to listen and look and tell us honestly what they hear and what they see. You don't smell the name you smell the rose, the hidden perfume which no man can make or destroy. Beneath forms and phrases is upward striving resistless as the tides, and broad as the sunlight.

It is to be regretted that because each new movement toward better things bears a particular name and is proclaimed by a certain people, some one should begin at once to build a fence in the sea. But how about this? Were not the Jews a peculiar people? The Greeks were not Romans and the Romans were not Greeks, yet what would each have been without the other? And what would Christianity have been without all of them? The thing to be regretted is that they did not see themselves as allies instead of enemies, that they followed revenge and not mercy. It is still to be regretted that there is that lack of vision and charity which will not listen to all and attempt to correlate all instead of widening differences and perpetuating misunderstandings. I thank God not for strife and bitterness, but for work done and for the undreamed of power of all religious bodies which will be released when love shall flow from eye to eye and joy from heart to heart. Invective and ridicule are totally out of place in this day of growing desire to heal our divisions. We cannot have union without love. Everything will fail but love.

Who make the most of names, they who wear them or they who oppose them? Would I love Bro. Morrison more if his name were Lowe? There is no kind of doubt that the cause of God would be quickened if all party names were dropped, but they may as well persist unless they can be drowned in an ocean of Love. The same name does not make peace. There is a great people of one name not exactly united. Look in the mirror.

Who is sufficient for these things? What religious body may make that mighty plea for union? That one which professes to wear that name only? Is that the sole qualification? Let us beware. Christ, not his name is the unifying power. We can be one only in Christ, not his name. The reason why Christendom is not united is a simple one—Christendom is not Christian. We are not Christians till we are one in Christ. We have been so busy tearing down other fences that in our frenzy we built one around ourselves, built it so high in some places we cannot climb over it into a union meeting. The worst fault is fault-finding, and here I am doing it, but all right if the fault is mine or ours.

The world of flowers is larger than the wildest dreams of the botanist. So our religion is vaster than any cult or creed or even the church itself, even as the wide areas of sunlight are greater than the sun itself. All religious bodies are striving to render real service, and their defects are to be cured by instruction not by attack.

In our own fair land the fields are calling. Millions are unsaved. Continents are calling. Why this stress about differences? The very marrow in my bones aches because of it. Think of a lot of Christians being fearful less some other Christians might render valuable assistance in saving the world.

It is a matter of education. It is also a personal matter. Each one must unite for himself with every other Christian. Not uniformity but unity. "But," said a good man to me, "we must all speak the same thing, now Bro. Lowe come across." I replied, "Do you and your wife always speak the same thing?" The couple smiled at each other and the conversation ended. But "as far as we have attained." It is a program of attaining the fulness of the measure of Christ. Here we may expend our energy profitably, but we waste it by building fences in the sea.

Philadelphia Letter

The Beginning and Growth of the Third Church.

In the Philadelphia letter of December 19, the Philadelphia field was discussed in a general way with a view to showing that it was not all difficult. In the succeeding letters of this series, sketches of the congregations in a little more detail will be given. Our Third Church, as one of our most vigorous younger congregations, will be taken up first.

It is today second in age amongst our churches; its location is admirable; its building is a substantial stone building with a Christian Endeavor room at the side; its field is a residence section filled with homes owned, frequently, by their occupants; its membership is largely made up of solid and permanent residents whose years of connection with it make them attached to all its interests. It has always been a "young people's" church and has a future of assured stable existence.

It was founded in 1878 as a mission from the First Church in one of the old Centennial buildings at Forty-first street and Leidy avenue, but removed shortly to a church building near Holly and Aspen streets near its present location.

In 1885 the little congregation erected the present structure on its well-chosen site, somewhat removed, yet within easy reach of the street-cars on the principal business street of West Philadelphia, and in what was soon enlarged by the addition of a Christian Endeavor room.

After various vicissitudes, through several ministries during which it enjoyed the fostering sympathy of the mother church, it finally, about 1893, entered upon an era of larger and more independent development, and took its place as one of the churches of the neighborhood. Its membership increased; its Sunday-school grew to large proportions; various sub-organizations were added to those already existing; some social service in the form of a reading and game room and shop-meetings was undertaken; and a mission was established which soon developed an independent existence as the Fifth Church, but which soon adopted the customs of the primitive brethren and has since discontinued its meetings. This period might be called its adolescence,—a period of transition from childhood, through Sturm und Drang, to a position of self-hood.

The present era began with the pastorate of Dr. George P. Rutledge, who enjoys the double distinction of having filled, in his eleven years, the longest pastorate of any of our Philadelphia ministers, and of being probably the best pulpit orator we have ever had, and one of the best in Philadelphia.

A few days after his installation, due to an inherited quarrel, a division occurred in the congregation which resulted in the formation of the Sixth Church. The losses to the mother organization through this expansion were of course great. More than a hundred members left in a body, and as many more became disgusted and either united with the denominational churches or drifted away altogether.

Only about ninety people greeted the new minister at his first Sunday morning service; he found only 118 contributing members, and the church was $800 behind in current expenses. The sub-organizations, also were thrown into the confusion always incident upon such changes. Each organization was split in twain; in some cases, teachers and their entire classes left the Sunday-school. A complete re-organization was necessary, and owing to the reputation the church had acquired in the neighborhood, it was more difficult to build it up than it would have been to start a new organization in another part of the city.

Yet with these unfavorable conditions the church rallied, re-organized its forces, drew new members from the neighborhood, and continued its history. Its work of the past eleven years cannot be better summarized than by quoting the official report following:

1. Improvements, to the extent of thousands of dollars have been made upon the church plant.

2. The current expenses have been considerably increased, yet all the necessary funds have been raised without any great trouble.

3. While the periodic lull with which most churches are familiar, has repeatedly visited the church, there has never been a year in the eleven that it has not made progress.

4. The Sunday-school is the largest of any of our churches in the city, and with the exception of one, in all eastern Pennsylvania. Last year the Sunday-school gave more for Home Missions than any other in the state. The church has three Christian Endeavor societies, an active C. W. B. M. and a large Ladies' Aid Society, all doing good work.

5. Last year the church as a whole gave $727 to missions; this year $809.

6. The church spends hundreds of dollars annually relieving the neighborhood poor.

7. The records show that the church is now in a more harmonious condition than it has ever been in its history.

From this brief sketch it can be readily seen that the three elements of strength in the growth of this congregation are: Its first location in a growing suburban field; the early fostering care of the First Church which extended its advice and financial aid, and made it possible for it to launch out upon its period of enlargement; and its final years profiting by the length of a pastorate which shows conclusively that a minister in our church may find an enduring and profitable ministry in the city of Brotherly Love.

Laymen's Conference in Minneapolis

BY PERRY J. RICE

Minneapolis, Minn.

The layman's foreign missionary movement has reached Minnesota. A conference, beginning on Thursday evening, February 4, and continuing over the following Sunday, has been held in Minneapolis. It was a notable meeting. It would be impossible to estimate its influence and far-reaching effects. Thorough preparation was made for it. Mr. Lyman Pierce, one the general secretaries of the movement, was in the city a month or more directing preliminary arrangements. A representative committee of laymen in the city met at frequent intervals and organized a plan to enlist the interest of all the churches in the state. All of the larger cities and towns were visited and coöperating committees were organized in each one. The churches in the smaller places were reached through these coöperating committees and by means of correspondence and newspaper publicity.

The first session of the conference proper was held in connection with a banquet at the largest hotel in the city. Nearly six hundred men, carefully selected by the various churches, sat at the tables, and many stood about the room after the banquet had been served to listen to the speeches. The committee returned the price of 380 tickets because they could not provide room for so many guests at the tables. It was estimated that at least fifteen hundred applications for places were made. At this meeting Dr. Cyrus Northrup, president of the University of Minnesota, presided. Mr. Wm. T. Ellis, a newspaper man from Philadelphia, Colonel Elijah Halford, of wide and varied experience, and Mr. J. Campbell White, spoke. The occasion was an inspiring one indeed. The addresses were broad visioned and masterful, and the impression left upon the minds of the men present must have been profound and enduring.

The sessions on Friday and Saturday were held in one of the large churches in the city and were attended by hundreds of laymen and many pastors. Women were admitted to the gallery at the evening sessions but the audiences were almost exclusively made up of men. The program was quite informal, taking the form of open conferences. Topics were introduced by leaders of the movement, missionary secretaries, and returned missionaries and then they were thrown open to any and all who wished to participate either by asking questions or making brief remarks. The spirit of prayer was in all hearts and much time was given to its expression. Questions of practical importance were ever in the foreground. Mere sentiment does not play a large part in the hearts of these men of affairs, and so the effort was constantly directed toward answering the questions that naturally arise in the minds of laymen regarding the enterprise of foreign missions. The testimony of their value and the urgency of the present opportunity from laymen who had seen the situation with their own eyes was most convincing. Mr. Ellis, who has some criticisms to offer, nevertheless speaks in no uncertain terms of the high character of the missionaries themselves and of the surpassing value of the work they are doing.

Mr. White, who is the real leader of the movement, is a man of commanding personality, pleasing and forceful address, and great conviction. He believes profoundly in the work he is doing. He is convinced that it is the plan of Christ for His church to evangelize the world in this generation, and that it can be done, and must be seriously undertaken. He says: "God will not give His power to a church that refuses or fails to accept His plan." Referring to a criticism he once heard, of the movement, to the effect that it is an instrument of one string, since its promoters are always harping on foreign missions alone, he said: "It is an instrument of one string, just as man is a creature with one spinal column, which is the organizing principle for the whole body." He does not underrate the importance of the work at home but insists that the whole includes the parts, and that if the church once gets a vision of the whole plan of God, its members will arise to the faithful performance of every particular task that is laid upon them. He is not given to criticism of any kind, and does not pretend to pronounce judgment upon the efforts of the past. On the contrary he greatly appreciates the work that has been done, but urges that as the situation now presents itself the men of our churches must recognize the bigness of the task before them and address themselves to its performance with a true manly purpose to accomplish it. He believes that men will respond to the challenge that foreign missions present and his experience convinces him that nothing will so grip the consciences of men as the proper and adequate presentation of this great work. One cannot listen to him without feeling the force of his dominant purpose and being moved by his passionate urgency.

Great mass meetings were held on Sunday afternoon and evening when men from all parts of the city, from every calling, and having all shades of religious opinions were brought under the spell of the central ideal and dominant purpose of the laymen's movement, viz: "the evangelization of the world in this generation." The impression left upon the men of our churches is remarkable. It is a common thing to hear men, who have cared little for missions of any kind, say: "I havn't understood this thing; I shall hereafter bear a different attitude toward the whole program of the church." Resolutions were passed endorsing the movement, and recommending that a committee of men be appointed in every congregation to coöperate with the pastors in bringing the whole subject of missions to the whole church and in a manner that will secure the coöperation of every individual in greatly increasing the churches gifts. Five dollars per member per year for every member of all the churches in Minnesota was set as a goal to be realized as soon as possible. A simple organization was effected to promote the spirit of the movement and to ensure results.

The layman's missionary movement, born in a prayer meeting, is destined to exercise a mighty influence upon the churches everywhere. A campaign is being projected in which it is hoped that all the cities of 40,000 inhabitants or more on this continent will be reached and the cause adequately presented. If this program is carried out it will not only result in greatly increasing our annual gifts to missions, but will stimulate all our churches to greater spiritual power and increased activity along all lines. It is not unreasonable to anticipate that it will be the forerunner of a mighty awakening in all the churches.

The Disciples have every reason to rejoice in this movement. It is emphatic in its purpose to secure the presentation of the simple story of Christ's saving grace and power to all the nations of the world. No creed, no doctrinal peculiarities are advanced by this movement. The leaders are quite fully aware of the fact that the gospel in its simplicity is sufficient to save the world. It is a union movement, seeking to bring into active coöperation all the forces of Christendom for the sake of carrying the pospel to all people. It centers in the command of Christ as voiced in the great commission.

The question has recently been asked: "What shall be the dominant object of our men's organization?" Why not this one? It includes Bible study and every other purpose that can be imagined as worthy of Christian men. It is in harmony with the purpose of Christ, and the mightest movement of our times. It is an organizing principle around which a body of great strength and virility may be built up. At any rate it must be prominent as a feature of our men's work and it can not well be too prominent.

Mexico and Its Man

Diaz a Life President—His Government Stable and a Financial Success—His Summer Palace

BY J. A. ADAMS.

Mexico swarms with little men, small in stature, in mental attainment and in business capacity, men dwarfed and stunted, blighted by an oppressive past and held to mediocrity by their environment. But Mexico also has a fine type of men. You see them in the great processions on the streets, moving with the air and grace of conscious strength and with the pride of the old cavalier days when the Spaniard was the conqueror and ruler of the tropical world. And sometimes they pass you on the country roads, sitting erect on a handsome steed and looking as if they might be descendants of the little band of bold cavalrymen who followed Cortez to victory and whom the natives thought a new kind of gods. The question which a visitor often asks himself is, whether the swarm of little men below will ever start to grow and eventually match up with these better types above.

President Porfirio Diaz as he now looks.

But if I were more distinctly to classify the population of the country, I should make two great divisions, all the rest of the people, and Porfirio Diaz, President of the Republic. Diaz is "It." All the talk in the hotels, on railroad trains, on the streets, in the newspapers, with tourists, business men and even missionaries, runs this way. If Mexico has made progress, Diaz has made it. If Mexico is getting along well, it is because Diaz is carrying it on his shoulders. He sums up and personifies Mexico's modern period.

Stability of the Government.

The first and most important thing to be said about the government of President Diaz is that it stays put. Before his time nothing in the government line would stay hitched. The only permanent features of the country were the poverty, squalor and dark complexion of the people, and also the Catholic religion. If you want your memory to swim with confusion try to keep in mind the revolutions which swept over the land in the hundred years before the present administration came into power. And Diaz himself was one of the leading revolutionists; but when he became ruler he changed his mind about insurrections. They no longer seemed to him desirable. He does not even want rotation in office. It was in 1876 that Mr. Diaz was first elected President, and, with one short intermission, he has been President ever since. He likes his job and the people like their President, or at least they are supposed to do so, and therefore why not make it last as long as the man lasts?

The governors of the several states are said practically to be the President's own selections. Sometimes he changes them from one state to another. In fact, unless I was misinformed, the country is thoroughly organized around the President, and the military force is also much in evidence. President Diaz is taking no chances.

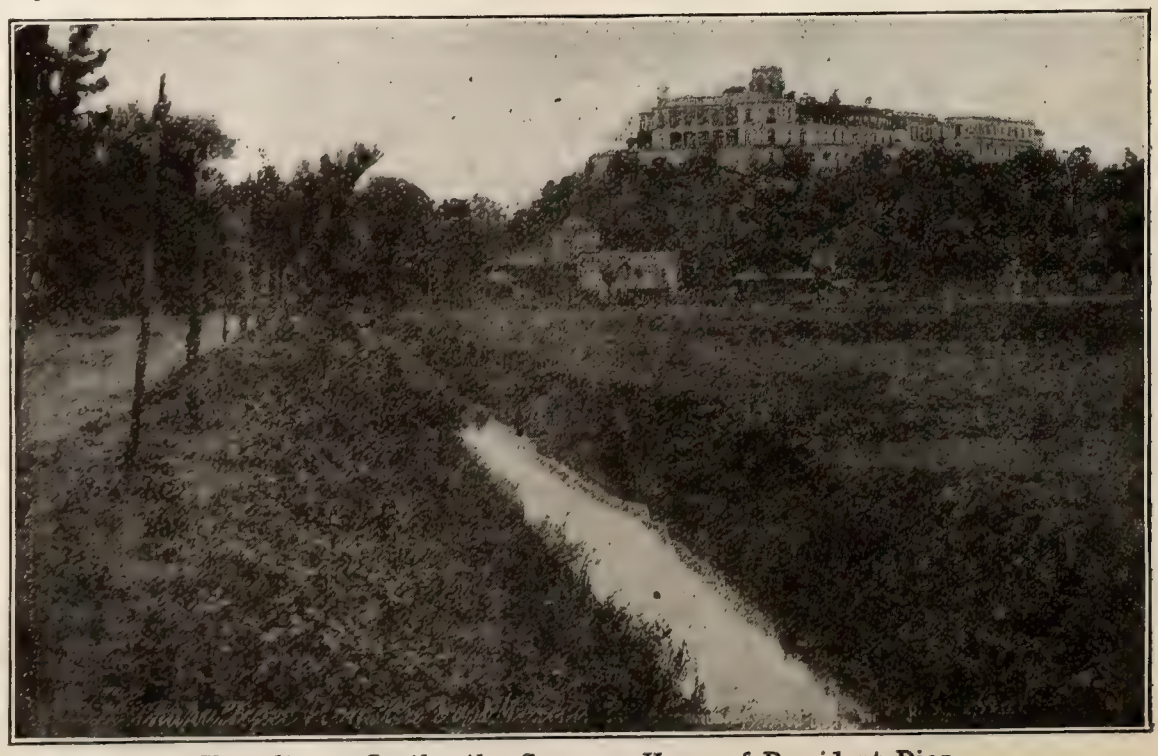
Makes the Ends Meet and More.

The next feature of the Diaz administration which I would mention is its financial success. It has been the supreme business of nearly all governments to run into debt. Our great government is at it now. It is spending more than it is receiving. But the Mexican government is laying up money. Few things in the country surprised me more than the annual report of the minister of finance, which appeared in the Mexico Herald. The revenues of the government for the last fiscal year amounted to $111,771,867.68, while the ordinary disbursements were $93,177,441.77, leaving a surplus of $18,594,426. Special, or extraordinary payments, reduced this surplus to $6,893,198.85. For the last thirteen years the government has always come out millions to the good, notwithstanding the fact that in that time the current expenses have a little more than doubled. But think of running the government of the republic with an expense of less than one hundred millions a year, and in Mexican money! There is now a surplus of about $75,000,000 in the treasury.

A Great Financier.

The credit for this remarkable success, however, is not all given to President Diaz. Minister Jose Limantour, the head of the treasury department, is pronounced the genius who has brought about the result. And the Mexican press does not hesitate to call him one of the greatest financiers in the world and in history.

Thus with its double portion of political genius and of financial genius Mexico feels proud of its position among governments. Of the attitude of the government toward the Catholic church and other religious bodies and toward moral questions I cannot speak in this article.



The President's Residence.

President Diaz lives in town in winter and outside of town in summer. His city residence stands in a block of other buildings, near the American quarter. It is plain and has nothing about it to attract attention. His summer residence is the famous Chapultepec Castle, the most splendidly located palace that I have ever seen. It stands far up on a rocky elevation and covers nearly the whole top. It is reached on one side by long flights of stone steps and on the other by a winding road. But the official family enter a tunnel at the foot of the hill and are carried up by an elevator.

In going up by the stone steps there is a succession of remarkable views, the foliage of rare trees is gleaming in the sunlight, flowers are blooming on the little plateaus, and vines are clambering over the walls. But all these attractions are eclipsed and forgotten when one reaches the great corridors which surround the palace. Here the view is without a parallel. Below is the city, stretching away to the east until its outlines are lost in the distance, and all around it is the valley, penciled with long lines of trees or dotted with haciendas and fields of maguey, and a little stream winds through it like a silver thread. Beyond are the mountains, rising like the rim of an amphitheatre and evidencing a purpose of nature to set up a view which would make the heart jump. And high above all is Popocatepetl, along with its twin peak, Ixtaccihuatl, rising to a height of 17,853 feet, more than 3,000 feet higher than Pike's Peak, and eternally snow clad.

A Home of Royalty.

Within, the palace presents reminiscences of the royal families which once passed in and out of its great halls and beautiful chambers, or made Mexican history famous. There are chairs which were used by Cortez, and there are inlaid tables and silver chandeliers which were left by the ill-fated royal pair who came from Austria to rule the people. I could not help thinking that it was rather hard for Maximilian to be chased from so grand and delightful a home and shot. Nor do I wonder that poor Carlotta went mad. The contrast between the splendor of their palace in that brief little spell of power and the miserable end of it all was appalling. It was more cheering to be told that Secretary Root was entertained like royalty when he visited in this home of Diaz, and to be shown the magnificent state banquet hall in which he was dined and the reception room in which the diplomats gathered.

The family apartments are not quite so beautifully furnished or decorated as the chambers of the old palace at Versailles on which Napoleon lavished so much money and spread so much yellow silk, but they are glittering enough. The heavily carved oak, however, gives them a somewhat modern appearance.

Days Declining But not the Man.

President Diaz is now seventy-nine years old, and there are those who think that he would be wise to retire from office with the expiration of his present term, which will be soon, and act as the power behind the throne until his successor is well established. But "few die and none resign."

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

Appreciation of Parker Stockdale

Surprised and subdued by his sudden death I must turn from my accustomed weekly writing and pen a few lines in appreciation of our dead friend and brother, Parker W. Stockdale.

His is the first death of an active minister in the entire sixty years of our Chicago history. So full of life and health and laughter was he till a few days ago that it scarcely seems possible that today he is still in death. He was most happy in his work. His plans reached into the years ahead. The fellowship of his church and of his ministerial brethren was to him most enjoyable. He put a heartening spirit into all our work. But he is gone from us. Not reckoning with death we were making calculations, only to be reminded that man proposes but God disposes.

At such a time we wonder and pray. A feeling of loneliness and tenderness fills all our hearts. A husband and father leaving a wife and four children, a minister leaving a large and growing church, a brother leaving a host of friends, has passed on to be with God. He still lives but he lives beyond the vision of our eyes. He still works, but beyond the veil.

The Separation Saddens Us.

Brother Stockdale's was a buoyant, happy, conquering spirit. He had health of body and faith of soul. To him the universe was keyed to the good. The world continually swept up and onward into larger light and truth. He was easily made glad. He was a true democrat in his pleasures. He enjoyed all kinds of games. His overflowing vitality thrilled our contests. He not only watched games; he played them. His heartiness made him many friends; and among those not too often seen in church.

He enjoyed the open life. Born and raised in the country he never ceased to love her hills, streams, flowers and people. His greatest struggle was to fight against the desire to return to a ministry in the country, which desire was always tugging at his heart. Even while pastor here he loved to take long walks into the country and listen to the birds and watch the fleeting clouds. It was a pleasure to accompany him on one of these jaunts.

Happy Though in Chicago.

But he was happy, though in Chicago. He drank in happiness from all his surroundings. He saw beauty and glory in every little urchin. To wipe the tear of any dirty little face gave him joy. Every person, no matter how weak or scarred was to him an interesting and responsive child of God. He usually saw the soul and not the sin.

He enjoyed his pulpit. People liked to hear him and told him so. They made him know that he helped them. This was the reward that made him happy twice every Sunday. He had dramatic power. Laughter and pathos both had a large place in his pulpit ministrations. He enjoyed, too, his books; but most of all, I think, did he enjoy his friends, and his childlike candor gave him his full share. Busy as he was he never lacked time for his friends. He liked to talk about things of philosophy, but fortunately philosophy never robbed him of merriment nor dimmed his faith. He never could succeed in enslaving his heart to his head. When the Bishop of London was recently in this country he said that the five secrets of influence in the world were "absolute straightness, the absence of pretentiousness, sympathy, a sense of humor, and faith." This analysis suggests the character of our dear friend. Certainly he measured up to each of these qualifications.

Frank and Open Nature.

In his candor and frankness he had the refreshing suggestion of a child. He never wore a mask. He opened the deeper recesses of his soul to a much larger circle than his intimate friends. To all that knew him even casually he was generously large-souled. He sought no advantage. Impulsive he was at times, overtrustful on occasions, but never pretentious.

Who of us that have heard him tell of the death of his child, and who were thus permitted to know the depth of his feeling; who of us that have heard him relate some of his pastoral visits to the poor and the simple; or who of us that have often heard his tender words and seen the tears in his eyes can be trusted to speak of his sympathy? His heart was a big democratic heart. He loved and was loved in return. It is well that the Bishop places "a sense of humor" after "sympathy," for without it how could a tender-hearted man live amid the sin and suffering of a city like Chicago and keep his heart from breaking.

Always the Center of Interest.

Parker Stockdale was one of the tenderest of men and one of the funniest. He felt tremendously the tragedies of life; but then he could laugh and enjoy too. Laughter was his release. He was the stimulating tonic of most gatherings he was in. On a train, in a hotel, or at a convention, he usually was the storying-telling center of a group. Without effort he would often glide into most natural remarks on the more serious phases of life. At the last congress a number of us sat up till late in the corrider of a hotel. A number of traveling men gathered to hear our brother. As we dispersed one strange grasped his hand and said, "I want to thank you, for you have done us all good." His humor was natural. His religion was that of life. The two he did not think as separate, and he was right. The last secret of influence mentioned by the Bishop of London is "faith." If the last is the climax, "faith" should be last. It is the heart of hearts. It is the innermost secret of a soul's life. Very early did Brother Stockdale come to a simple faith in God and in Christ. Afterwards his intellect had its difficulties, as at one period of life most independent ones do; but in recent years he had come to his simple faith again; not his childhood faith, a stronger faith, his own. Content to leave unsolved many problems he nevertheless persevered in his gospel ministry, sweetly trusting God, who was to him a fatherly Providence. He proclaimed Christ as Saviour. He studied well the Christ of Nazareth. This same Christ he knew as Saviour in Chicago. He believed in the life everlasting. That life he has now tasted. We have lost a friend. The church has been bereft of a kindly pastor. And saddest of all the wife and children are bereaved. Our hearts all go out to them. Would that we could bring him back. How unfortunate his death in his early manhood!

Death Brings Other World Near.

So I find myself complaining. Friends, we must not so complain! Death always has been and he has always been ruthless. The young and good often pass first. Our faltering faith should be disciplined under Christ so as not to be too rebellious at death's coming. "It is not death to die." If ever the Chicago Disciples could feel rebellious as to the ways of death it is now; for we have lost a noble brother strongly girded for the battle. Appalled by death's sudden breaking in upon our friendship and plans let us open our hearts to life's wider sympathies, and humble ourselves, amid God's mysteries, to His will and work, and cultivate anew the consciousness of our immortality. The other world has been receding too far. The materialism of this world has driven away the winsomeness of the next. The Puritan teaching, that the happiest moment was that of death, seems strange to our ears. We need to rechristianize our feelings as to death. "To die is gain." Brother Stockdale lives and works. Ours seems a great loss, but let us be brave and not complain! God lives and loves. George Herbert, in his quaint way, expresses our Christian faith and hope in these lines:

"Death! thou wert once an uncouth hideous thing!
But since our Saviour's death
Has put some blood into thy face,
Thou hast grown, sure, a thing to be desired,
And full of grace."

Jesus, the mightier than the grave, said: "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live; and whoso liveth and believeth on me shall never die."

Parker W. Stockdale is dead. His body at this writing lies in the church of his last ministry. Tomorrow we shall bury him at his old home in Missouri and leave him with nature and with God. But we who knew him well shall continue to hear the laughter of his soul.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

One Step Farther

Dear Brother Gates:

I have been reading with pleasure your article in the Christian Century of December 26, 1908, in reply to Brother Perkins, and beg the privilege of saying just a word. I can agreeably sanction your article in the main. It is the thought I have been preaching to all my people. That the inner nature of the sinner must be Christianized or changed to the Christlike nature is in perfect accord with the teaching of Christ and His apostles. However it seems to me that your conclusion is a little short. Your position seems to be this: "My conception of a Christian is that it is nature that makes him one." Then you define nature as, "Rightousness alone constitutes the Christian nature." Then you define rightousness as, "It is the love that forgets self, the love that gives and expects nothing in return, not even future blessedness." Then you define love as, "It is a movement of the inner nature, an impulse of the heart, an affection toward the good, the beautiful, the true." Then you say, "If he have it, the law or ceremony can not make it more so or less so." Then in summing it all up you say, "It is the obedience from the heart, action out of a good heart, that constitutes Christian character." In the above I have tried to state your position by using your own words and I do not mean to disconnect nor misconstrue your words and their meaning. I am not debating nor criticising but am anxious for you to see how your position has impressed me.

Taking the sum of your position as: "It is the obedience from the heart, action out of a good heart, that constitutes Christian character;" and contrasting it with another statement farther on in your article, "In the kingdom of God, the one thing that constitutes sonship is the possession of a kind of nature or being, and that is enough."

Let us contrast these words, "obedience" and "possession." Question: Can a man have heart or mental action without physical expression? It seems to me you ought to take just one step farther right here. In your illustration of the wedding it seems to me that a fellow would not, could not, with all his mental action or heart love really possess his sweetheart and claim her as his own until his love found expression in some outward act or ceremony.

King in his "Rational Living," says: "For the very sake of thought and feeling, one must act." He quotes Keats as saying: "Axioms are not axioms until they have been done by our muscles." Again Dr. King says, regarding the student: "One must do to know." He says that what Kedney says of the artist is true of every man: "His idea or ideal is not his till he has expressed it." Again he says: "Not ideal emotion but ideal action is the aim." It is my idea, Brother Gates, that a man does not possess till he can express. What think you? I could quote farther from good authority. Your last statement, speaking of rights and privileges of the kingdom, is this: "Any man who wants to avail himself of these can have them regardless of any law or ceremony." Yet, Jesus says: "If a man love me he will keep my words." Paul says: "Ye have obeyed from the heart, that form of doctrine." Jesus says: "Except a man be born of water and the spirit he can not enter into the kingdom." I just wish to quote a little further from Dr. King: "One inexorable law rules throughout: That which is not expressed dies." "On the other hand, if there is anything he wishes to have live, he must express it." How would man ever know that God loved the world if God had not expressed it in the definite acts of Jesus? Not in spiritual demonstration but in human form. "He took not on him the nature of angels but he took on him the seed of Abraham."

"We love him because he first loved us." All this is but the expression of the inner nature of God and I for one could never believe, without this expression, that He ever loved man at all. "Ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." The changed inner nature of the sinner expressed in obedience to Christ's law or ceremony constitutes sonship in His kingdom.

Your brother in Christ,

Wauseon, Ohio. L. E. Hoskin.

Dear Brother Hoskin:

Your point is well taken, and I am in entire agreement with your position, with a slight modification, which I shall indicate.

The inner nature, which constitutes a Christian, does have its outer expressions. The question is: What are the natural and necessary expressions of the Christian nature? My answer is (and it is Jesus' answer): That as a tree is known by the fruit which grows upon it and belongs by nature and necessity to it, so the Christian is known—is unmistakenly judged to be such—by the fruit which grows by spiritual nature and necessity out of his life. That fruit is the fruit of the spirit which is love, joy, peace, long suffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, self-control; against such there is no law.

Since the Christian nature is ethical, its fruitage can only be ethical; and the only reliable evidence of its possession is ethical—that is, Christian motive and conduct.

My contention is that from beginning to end the Christian life is spiritual life, and as such, no legal, outer ceremony has anything to do with its production or attestation. Just as living fruit grows on living trees and proves the kind of a tree, so spiritual fruit grows out of the spiritual life and proves its kind. If there was any legal ceremony that belonged to the Christian nature, and was a natural and necessary element or expression of it, then we could conceive its addition to the Pauline fruits of the spirit. But no such addition is conceivable. You might as well expect to find China dolls growing out of grape vines, as to find ceremonies growing out of the Christian nature.

How Christian Nature is Expressed.

You are entirely correct when you say with President King that the inner Christian nature must have outer expression. But must it have ceremonial expression, or does it by nature and necessity select a ceremony as the mode of its expression? The law written large across the face of all things is: Let everything bring forth fruit after its own kind.

When a tree puts forth its first fruit and it is found to be peaches of a certain kind, it continues, year after year, to put forth the same kind of fruit. The putting forth of peaches is a necessity of the very nature and being of a peach tree. It does not one year put forth peaches, and another year put forth walnuts, and another year something else. It always chooses peaches. This constancy in the fruit of trees makes the evidence of the fruit perfectly reliable as to the nature of the tree.

Now there is some constant and necessary fruit of the Christian life which it instinctively puts forth—an outer expression to which it naturally runs and by which it proves its genuineness. What is that natural, constant and instructive expression? Is it baptism? Does baptism communicate the Christian nature, and unmistakably prove its existence?

Proof of Christian Nature.

There are millions of human beings who show that they have the Christian nature by the lives they live, who have never been baptized as we understand baptism. To say that baptism communicates spiritual nature, and makes one a Christian, means the un-Christianizing of the great majority of the Christian world who have not been baptized. It seems to me also utterly opposed to the spirit and teaching of Jesus. If only those are really Christians who have been baptized, then baptism must communicate spiritual nature; and if it communicates spiritual nature, it must have magical efficacy upon the soul and make an indelible impress upon it. Thus and only thus can baptism prove the presence of the Christian nature—by imparting in its performance the nature to which it testifies.

But as a matter of fact, does the baptized person always possess, after the baptism, the Christian nature? The unworthy lives of many baptized persons in our churches only too painfully proves that their baptism has wrought no permanent change in their natures.

But if baptism works no change in the spiritual nature, how can it produce any change in the soul's relation to God or God's attitude toward the soul? Can a ceremony that works no spiritual change, and that evidences no spiritual values and realities, count for anything in sonship to God? Paul says that only those who are led by the spirit of God, are the sons of God. A bad man can not be a son of God though he has been baptised a thousand times. And it is perfectly possible to baptize a man a thousand times, and turn him away from the last baptism a child of the devil. How then can baptism make one a son of God, if sonship rests upon a new spiritual nature?

Proof of Marital Love.

You say that a man "could not really possess his sweetheart and claim her as his own until his love found expression in some outward act or ceremony." I agree with you. But is there only one "outward act or ceremony" by which his love can find expression? He must act—he must express his love to the girl—in some way, we perfectly agree; but are there not a thousand ways he can express that love? Which is the truest expression of love for your sweetheart—giving her an engagement ring prompted by your own heart, or going through a marriage ceremony prompted by the state? Which is the best evidence that you love her—the legal evidence of the marriage ceremony, or the personal evidence of a thousand kindly ministries and deeds of devotion? Is love ever actually proved by the marriage ceremony? Is it ever more than professed?

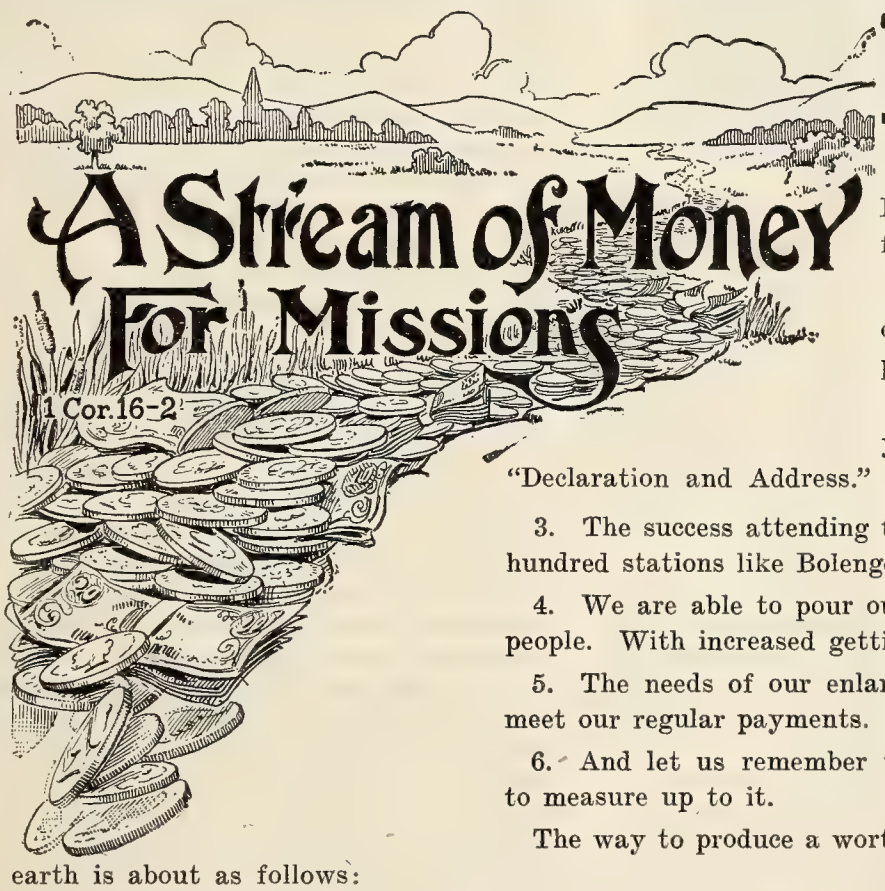
So there are a thousand ways of expressing in outward act one's love for Christ. When Christ says: "If a man love me he will keep my words," are we to think at once of baptism as the only and the one decisive expression of love for him; and are we to interpret that saying in the light of that other saying: "Except a man be born of water and the spirit he can not enter the kingdom of God?" There are many words and commands of Jesus besides those concerning baptism — commands concerning which there are no differences of interpretation among Christians, as concerning the baptism passages—commands which carry their own approval and justification to the Christian conscience in the very nature of the thing they command.

Does the soul that has just come under the spell of Christ, feel with the same naturalness and force that it ought to be baptized, as it feels that it ought to keep itself from evil? Does it run to the waters of baptism with the same instinctive necessity that it runs to love, kindness and forgiveness? The first impulse of the Christian nature is brotherly love and purity; the second impulse is a desire for fellowship with all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth.

Social Import of Baptism.

As I have pointed out in a previous article on the place and value of baptism, this ordinance does not belong either by divine intention or by practical experience to the inner personal side of religion, but to the social side. The social embodiment of Christianity called it into being. If Christianity had stopped with a personal relation of the soul to God, there would have been no place for baptism. If marriage had stopped with the personal relation of a man to a woman there would have been no place for the marriage ceremony. But society and the state are concerned with marriage in the birth of children and the holding of property; consequently the state must give its sanction which it does in a license and marriage contract. The state is a third party to that contract.



In so far as faith is a personal relation between the soul and God, and grows out of a spiritual condition, baptism has nothing to do with it; but in so far as faith takes form in fellowship, the Christian society is concerned with it. Baptism is the act by which the Christian society formally (legally) recognizes the professed union of the soul with God in faith and repentance, and sanctions fellowship with itself. It is the formal method by which the union of believers secures and protects its homogeneity—a process of homogeneous inclusion. It further protects its homogeneity by a process of exclusion of the unworthy and the unlike.

In view of your last sentence, Brother Hoskin, may I ask you one question: Are only those who have been baptized, sons of God? Are all others but the baptized children of the devil? Suppose a man have the "changed inner nature," but is not baptized, what is he then? What does he lose?

BOOK REVIEW.

Heroes of Israel, By Theodore G. Soares, Chicago, The University of Chicago Press, 1909, pp. 388, $1, postpaid.

This is a new volume in the Constructive Bible Studies issued by the University of Chicago. It belongs tothe Elementary Series in which there are already several volumes. Professor Soares has placed before the young Bible students the stories of the notable men and women connected with the history of Israel from Abraham to Daniel. The list includes Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, Samuel, Joshua, Moses, David, Solomon, Elijah, Elisha, Nehemiah, Judas Macabaeus, and Daniel, and of women, Ruth and Esther. The method is simple, the material being divided into the Bible stories, given in biblical language, the "Meaning of the Stories," in which notes and questions draw out the student's thoughts in reference to the narrative, and finally a written review consisting of the lesson story composed by the student himself. Teachers, and pupils from ten to thirteen years of age, will welcome this book as a timely aid in the interpretation of the Bible and to students of that degree of maturity. And in the large body of Bible-schools which are using the Constructive Studies it will take its place as an indispensable link in the chain of Bible teaching.

THE WHY AND THE HOW

A few of the reasons for a stream of money in the Centennial March offering for Foreign Missions, may be briefly stated as follows:

1. It is the will of God that we sound out His gospel to the ends of the earth. For this purpose God sent His Son; for this purpose Christ died; and for this purpose His church exists.

2. We ought to do something really great this Centennial year if we worthily commemorate the publication of the "Declaration and Address."

3. The success attending the work of our missionaries is simply marvelous. We can have a hundred stations like Bolenge, Africa, if we will only furnish the men and a stream of money!

4. We are able to pour out a stream of money, broad and deep. We are a rich, prosperous people. With increased getting, there must be increased giving.

5. The needs of our enlarged work are great. It requires nearly $25,000 per month to meet our regular payments. And new work in many directions is promised.

6. And let us remember that new Centennial Watchword! It says, "$400,000." We ought to measure up to it.

The way to produce a worthy stream of money, with which to bless the nations of the earth is about as follows:

1. Make the announcement of the offering stand out clear and distinct. This is an offering of much more than ordinary importance. Announce it as you would an approaching protracted meeting or a dedication or some great celebration in the church. Make the announcement stand out like a mountain peak.

2. Arrange for a magnificent Centennial Missionary Rally in your church Sunday night, February 28th. You can have the church crowded at this service.

3. Determine upon raising your full Centennial apportionment. Do not be satisfied with anything less. Please go as far beyond it as possible. Strike high!

4. See that every member of the church, old and young, rich and poor, is personally solicited for a definite amount. This is of great importance.

5. Emphasize the Centennial feature. Speak of the "fathers," of their loyalty, of their vision, of their lofty purpose, of the missionary spirit that possessed them. Alexander Campbell said, "The church of Jesus Christ is, in her nature, spirit and position, necessarily and essentially, a missionary institution." No finer uninspired interpretation of the church was ever given. This statement reflects the position of the able group of men who were his co-laborers.

6. It is hoped every church will be in line this year. The missionaries are depending upon us. The faithful missionary churches are anxious to have their number increased. The eyes of the world are upon us this year as never before. Let us prove by a general and generous offering that we do believe that the gospel is the power of God unto salvation.

If you hove not already done so, please order March offering supplies today. Address F. M. Rains, Sec., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Remember March 7th!

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

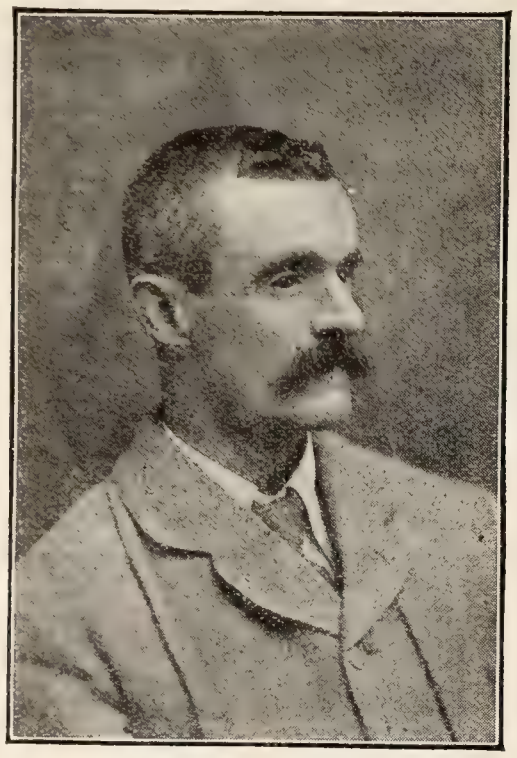
CHAPTER III.

Trooper Shannon's Quarrel.

There was bitter frost in the darkness outside when two young men stood talking in the stables of a little outpost lying a long ride back from the settlement in the lonely prairie. One leaned against a manger with a pipe in his hand, while the spotless, softly-gleaming harness hung up behind him showed what his occupation had been. The other stood bolt upright with lips set, and a faint grayness which betokened strong emotion showing through his tan. The lantern above them flickered in the icy draughts, and from out of the shadows beyond its light came the stamping of restless horses and the smell of prairie hay which is pungent with the odors of wild peppermint.

The two lads, and they were very little more, were friends, in spite of the difference in their upbringing, for there are few distinctions between caste and caste in that country where manhood is esteemed the greatest thing, and the primtive virtues count for more than wealth or intellect. Courage and endurance still command respect in the new Northwest, and that both the lads possessed them was made evident by the fact that they were troopers of the Northwest police, a force of splendid cavalry whose duty it is to patrol the wilderness at all seasons and in all weathers, under scorching sun and in blinding snow.

The men who keep the peace of the prairie are taught what heat and thirst are, when they ride in couples through a desolate waste wherein there is only bitter water, parched by pitiless sunrays and whitened by the intolerable dust of alkali. They also discover just how much cold the human frame can endure, when they lie down with only the stars above them, long leagues from the nearest outpost, in a trench scooped in the snow, and they know how near one may come to suffocation, and yet live through the grass fires' blinding smoke. It happens now and then that two who have answered to the last roster in the icy darkness do not awaken when the lingering dawn breaks across the great white waste, and only the coyote knows their resting-place, but the watch and ward is kept, and the lonely settler dwells as safe in the wilderness as he would in an English town.



Trooper Shannon was an Irishman from the bush of Ontario; Trooper Payne, English, and a scion of a somewhat distinguished family in the old country, but while he told nobody why he left it suddenly, nobody thoug t of asking him. He was known to be a bold rider and careful of his beast, and that was sufficient for his comrades and the keen-eyed Sergeant Stimson. He glanced at his companion thoughtfully as he said, "She was a pretty girl. You knew her in Ontario?"

Shannon's hands trembled a little. "Sure," he said. "Larry's place was just a mile beyont our clearing, an' there was never a bonnier thing than Ailly Blake came out from the old country—but is it need there is for talking when ye've seen her? There was once I watched her smile at ye with the black eyes that would have melted the heart out of any man. Waking and sleeping they're with me still."

(Copyright, 1907, by F. A. Stokes Co.)

Three generations of the Shannons had hewn the lonely clearing further into the bush of Ontario and married the daughters of the soil, but the Celtic strain, it was evident, had not run out yet. Payne, however, came of English stock, and expressed himself differently.

"It was a—shame," he said. "Of course he flung her over. I think you saw him, Pat?"

Harold Bindloss.

Shannon's face grew grayer, and he quivered visibly as his passion shook him, while Payne felt his own blood pulse faster as he remembered the graceful dark-eyed girl who had given him and his comrade many a welcome meal when their duty took them near her brother's homestead. That was, however, before one black day for Ailly and Larry Blake when Lance Courthorne also rode that way.

"Yes," said the lad from Ontario, "I was driving in for the stores when I met him in the willow bluff, an' Courthorne pulls his divil of a black horse up with a little ugly smile on the lips of him when I swung the wagon right across the trail.

"'That's not civil, trooper,' says he.

"'I'm wanting a word,' says I, with the black hate choking me at the sight of him. 'What have ye done with Ailly?'

"'Is it anything to you?' says he.

"'It's everything,' says I. 'And if ye will not tell me I'll tear it out of ye.'

"Courthorne laughs a little, but I saw the divil in his eyes. 'I don't think you're quite man enough,' says he, sitting very quiet on the big black horse. 'Any way, I can't tell you where she is now because she left the dancing saloon she was in down in Montana when I last saw her.'

"I had the big whip that day, and I forgot everything as I heard the hiss of it round my shoulder. It came home across the ugly face of him, and then I flung it down and grabbed the carbine as he swung the black round with one hand fumbling in his jacket. It came out empty, an' we sat there a moment, the two of us, Courthorne white as death, his eyes like burning coals, and the fingers of me trembling on the carbine. Sorrow on the man that he hadn't a pistol or I'd sent the black soul of him to the divil it came from."

The lad panted, and Payne, who had guessed at his hopeless devotion to the girl who had listened to Courthorne, made a gesture of disapproval that was tempered by sympathy. It was for her sake, he fancied, Shannon had left the Ontario clearing and followed Larry Blake to the West.

"I'm glad he hadn't, Pat," said Payne. "What was the end of it?"

"I remembered," said the other, with a groan, "remembered that I was Trooper Shannon, an' dropped the carbine into the wagon. Courthorne wheels the black horse round, an' I saw the red line across the face of him.

"'You'll be sorry for this, my lad,' says he."

"He's a dangerous man," Payne said, thoughtfully.

The icy cold went through them to the bone as they left the stables, and it was a relief to enter the loghouse which was heated to fustiness by the glowing stove. A lamp hung from a rough birch beam, and its uncertain radiance showed motionless figures wrapped in blankets in the bunks round the walls. Two men were, however, dressing, and one already in uniform sat at a table talking to another swathed in furs, who was from his appearance a prairie farmer. The man at the table was lean and weather-bronzed, with grizzled hair and observant eyes. They were fixed steadily upon the farmer, who knew that very little which happened upon the prairie escaped the viligance of Sergeant Stimson.

"It's straight talk you're giving me, Larry? What do you figure on making by it?" he said.

The farmer laughed mirthlessly, "Not much, any way, beyond the chance of getting a bullet in me back or me best steer lifted one dark night. 'Tis not forgiving the rustlers are, and Courthorne's the divil," he said. "But listen now, Sergeant, I've told ye where he is, and if ye're not fit to corral him I'll ride him down meself."

Sergeant Stimson wrinkled his forehead. "If anybody knows what they're after, it should be you," he said, watching the man out of the corner of his eyes. "Still, I'm a little worried as to why, when you'll get nothing for it, you're anxious to serve the State."

The farmer clenched a big hand. Sergeant, you that knows everything, will ye drive me mad," he said. "Sure, it's gospel I'm telling ye, an', as you're knowing well, it's me could tell where the boys who ride at midnight drop many a keg. Well, if ye will have your reason, it was Courthorne who put the black shame on me an' mine."

Sergeant Stimson nodded, for he had already suspected this.

"Then," he said dryly, "we'll give you a chance of helping us to put the handcuffs on him. Now, because they wouldn't risk the bridge, and the ice is not thick yet everywhere, there are just two ways they could bring the stuff across, and I figure we'd be near the thing if we fixed on Graham's Pool. Still, Courthorne's no kind of fool, and just cause that crossing seems the likeliest he might try the other one. You're ready for duty, Trooper Payne?"

The lad stood straight. "I can turn out in ten minutes, sir," he said.

"Then," and Sergeant Stimson raised his voice a trifle, "you will ride at once to the rise a league outside the settlement, and watch the Montana trail. Courthorne will probably be coming over from Winston's soon after you get there, riding the big black, and you'll keep out of sight and follow him. If he heads for Carson's Crossing, ride for Graham's at a gallop, where you'll find me with the rest. If he makes for the bridge, you will overtake him if you can and find out what he's after. It's quite likely he'll tell you nothing, and you will not arrest him, but bearing in mind that every minute he spends there will be a loss to the rustlers you'll keep him as long as you can. Trooper Shannon, you'll ride at once to the bluff above Graham's Pool and watch the trail. Stop any man who rides that way, and if it's Courthorne keep him until the rest of the boys come up with me. You've got your duty straight, both of you?"

The lads saluted, and went out while the sergeant smiled a little as he glanced at the farmer and the men who were dressing.

"It's steep chances we'll have Mr. Courthorne's company tomorrow, boys," he said. "Fill up the kettle, Tom, and serve out a pint of coffee. There are reasons why we shouldn't turn out too soon. We'll saddle in an hour or so."

Two of the men went out, and the stinging blast that swept in through the open door smote a smoky smear across the blinking lamp and roused a sharper crackling from the stove. Then one returned with the kettle and there was silence, when the fusty heat resumed its sway. Now and then a tired trooper murmured in his sleep, or there was a snapping in the stove, while the icy wind moaned about the building and the kettle commenced a soft sibilation, but nobody moved or spoke. Three shadowy figures in uniform sat just outside the light, soaking in the grateful warmth while they could, for they knew that they might spend the next night unsheltered from the arctic cold of the wilderness. The Sergeant sat with thoughtful eyes and wrinkled forehead, where the flickering radiance forced up his lean face and silhouetted his spare outline on the rough boarding behind him, and close by the farmer sat, waiting with a stony calm that sprang from fierce impatience the reckoning with the man who had brought black shame upon him.

It was about this time when Winston stood shivering a little with the bridle of a big black horse in his hand just outside the door of his homestead. A valise and two thick blankets were strapped to the saddle, and he had donned the fur cap and coat Courthorne usually wore. Courthorne himself stood close by smiling at him sardonically.

"If you keep the cap down and ride with your stirrups long, as I've fixed them, anybody would take you for me," said he. "Go straight through the settlement, and let any man you come acrross see you. His testimony would come in useful if Stimson tries to fix a charge on me. You know your part of the bargain. You're to be Lance Courthorne for a fortnight from today."

"Yes," said Winston dryly. "I wish I was equally sure of yours."

Courthorne laughed. "I'm to be rancher Winston until tomorrow night, any way. Don't worry about me. I'll borrow those books of yours and improve my mind. Possible starvation is the only thing that threatens me, and it's unfortunate you've left nothing to eat behind you."

Winston swung himself into the saddle, a trifle awkwardly, for Courthorne rode with longer stirrups than he was accustomed to, then he raised one hand, and the other man laughed a little as he watched him sink into the darkness of the shadowy prairie. When the drumming of hoofs was lost in the moaning of the wind he strode towards the stable, and taking up the lantern surveyed Winston's horse thoughtfully.

"The thing cuts with both edges, and the farmer only sees one of them," he said. "That beast's about as difficult to mistake as my black is."

Then he returned to the loghouse, and presently put on Winston's old fur coat and tattered fur cap. Had Winston seen his unpleasant smile as he did it, he would probably have wheeled the black horse and returned at a gallop, but the farmer was sweeping across the waste of whitened grass at least a league away by this time. Now and then a half-moon blinked down between wisps of smoky cloud, but for the most part gray dimness hung over the prairie, and the drumming of hoof-beats rang stridently through the silence. Winston knew a good horse, and had bred several of them—before a blizzard which swept the prairie killed off his finest yearlings as well as their pedigree sire—and his spirits rose as the splendid beast swung into faster stride beneath him.

For two weeks at least he would be free from anxiety, and the monotony of his life at the lonely homstead had grown horribly irksome. Winston was young, and now, when for a brief space he had left his cares behind, the old love of adventure which had driven him out from England once more awakened and set his blood stirring. For the first time in six years of struggle he did not know what lay before him, and he had a curious, half-instincive feeling that the trail he was traveling would lead him farther than Montana. It was borne in upon him that he had left the old hopeless life behind, and stirred by some impulse he broke into a little song he had sung in England and long forgotten. He had a clear voice, and the words, which were filled with the hope of youth, rang bravely through the stillness of the frozen wilderness until the horse blundered, and Winston stopped with a little smile.

"It's four long years since I felt as I do tonight," he said.

Then he drew bridle and checked the horse as the lights of the settlement commenced to blink ahead, for the trail was rutted deep and frozen into the likeness of adamant, but when the first frame houses flung tracks of yellow radiance across the whitened grass he dropped his left arm a trifle, and rode in at a canter as he had seen Courthorne do. Winston did not like Courthorne, but he meant to keep his bargain.

As he passed the hotel more slowly a man who came out called to him. "Hello, Lance! Taking the trail?" he said. "Well, it kind of strikes me it's time you did. One of Stimson's boys was down here, and he seemed quite anxious about you."

Winston knew the man, and was about to urge his horse forward, but in place of it drew bridle, and laughed with a feeling that was wholly new to him as he remembered that his neighbors now and then bantered him about his English, and that Courthorne only used the Western colloquialism when it suited him.

"Sergeant Stimson is an enterprising officer, but there are as keen men as he is," he said. "You will, in case he questions you, remember when you met me."

"Oh, yes," said the other. "Still, I wouldn't fool too much with him—and where did you get those mittens from? That's the kind of an outfit that would suit Winston."

Winston nodded, for though he had turned his face from the light the hand he held the bridle with was visible, and his big fur gloves were very old.

"They are his. The fact is, I've just come from his place," he said. "Well, you can tell Stimson you saw me starting out on the Montana trail."

He shook the bridle, laughed softly as the frame houses flitted by, and then grew intent when the darkness of the prairie once more closed down. It was, he knew, probable that some of Stimson's men would be looking out for him, and he had not sufficient faith in Courthourne's assurances to court an encounter with them.

The lights had faded, and the harsh grass was crackling under the drumming hoofs when the blurred outline of a mounted man showed up on the crest of a rise, and a shout came down.

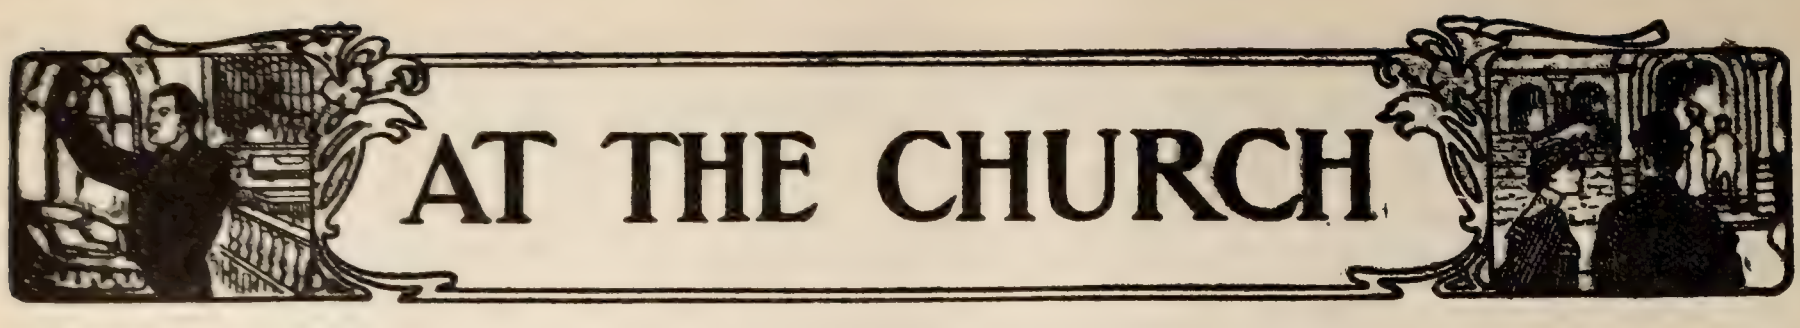
"Hello! Pull up there a moment, stranger."

There was nothing alarming in the greeting, but Winston recognized the ring of command, as well as the faint jingle of steel which had preceded it, and pressed his heels home. The black swung forward faster, and Winston glancing over his shoulder saw the dusky shape was now movinng down the incline. Then the voice came again more commandingly.

"Pull up, I want a talk with you."

Winston turned his head a moment, and remembering Courthorne's English flung back the answer, "Sorry I haven't time."

The faint musical jingle grew plainer, there was a thud of hoofs behind, and the curious exhilaration returned to Winston as the big black horse stretched out at a gallop. The soil was hard as granite, but the matted grasses formed a covering that rendered fast riding possible to a man who took risks, and Winston knew there were few horses in the Government service to match the one he rode. Still, it was evident that the trooper meant to overtake him, and recollecting his compact he tightened his grip on the bridle. It was a long way to the ranch where he was to spend the night, and he knew that the further he drew the trooper on, the better it would suit Courthorne.



So they swept on through the darkness over the empty waste, the trooper who was riding hard slowly creeping up behind. Still, Winston held the horse in until a glance over his shoulder showed him that there was less than a hundred yards between them, and he fancied he heard a portentious rattle as well as the thud of hoofs. It was not unlike that made by a carbine flung across the saddle. This suggested unpleasant possibilities, and he slackened his grip on the bridle. Then a breathless shout rang out, "Pull up or I'll fire."

Winston wondered if the threat was genuine or what is termed "bluff" in that country, but, as he had decided objections to being shot in the back to please Courthorne, sent his heels home. The horse shot forward beneath him, and, though no carbine flashed, the next backward glance showed him that the distance between him and the pursuer was drawing out, while when he stared ahead again the dark shape of willows or birches cut the sky-line. As they came back to him tne drumming of hoofs swelled into a staccato roar, while presently the trail grew steep, and dark boughs swayed above him. In another few minutes something smooth and level flung back a blink of light, and the timbers of a wooden bridge rattled under his passage. Then he was racing upwards through the gloom of wind-dwarfed birches on the opposite side listening for the rattle behind him on the bridge, and after a struggle with the horse pulled him up smoking when he did not hear it.

There was a beat of hoofs across the river, but it was slower than when he had last heard it and grew momentarily less audible, and Winston laughed as he watched the steam of the horse and his own breath rise in a thin white cloud.

"The trooper has given it up, and now for Montana," he said.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Samaritan Believers*

The death of Stephen did more to save the early church from death in its cradle than any other event. It stirred up the spirit of persecution on the part of the Jewish authorities who now became aware of the actually hostile character of the new faith as it had been interpreted by Stephen. Almost immediately a campaign of persecution was launched against the church in Jerusalem, and at its head Saul of Tarsus took his place by virtue of his leadership in Stephen's arrest and death. Jerusalem became the scene of such an inquisition as left few Christians unharmed. They were driven forth in every direction by the merciless fury of Saul's measures. It seems difficult to account for this fiery zeal on the part of so tenderhearted a man as he. Yet his very singleness of purpose as a defender of Judaism would be the cause of just such harshness in his treatment of heresy. Perhaps he felt that it was the duty that he owed to the truth to crush his own tenderer feelings in dealing with this dangerous fanaticism.

The Apostles in Jerusalem.

It is an interesting comment upon the heroism of the apostles of Jesus that they braved this opposition and remained in the city of Jerusalem. Doubly singular is it, since the words of Jesus, "Go ye into all the world," must have still been ringing in their ears. But so strong was their expectation of the triumph of the Messianic kingdom with its center at Jerusalem that they were willing to face death itself rather than desert this capital which had been made sacred by the blood of the Lord. That they did not go forth after Jesus had commanded them seems very singular in the light of all we know of later New Testament evangelism, but that they remained during this troubled period and indeed for some years after is the best proof of their devotion and faithfulness even unto death.

The Samaritans.

The refugees, driven forth by Saul's persecution of the church, travelled in all directions save one. We may be very sure that none of them entered the hated region of Samaria which lay just to the north of Judea. That was a detested land. Its people were the children of that mixed population, mostly Hebrew but partly foreign, which occupied the land after the downfall of the kingdom of Israel. After the exclusive type of Judaism fostered by the reforms of Ezra became the dominant feature of the national faith, these northerners were regarded with aversion and hostility. Their attempts to assist in the rebuilding of the temple had been rejected with scorn, and, as the result, another temple and a somewhat different type of worship had grown up in Mount Garizim about the ancient city of Shechem. These people called Samaritans retained all of the essentials of the ancient Hebrew religion. It is now the belief of scholars that the copies of the law kept by them were even purer than those preserved in the schools of the Jewish scribes. Thrust out from fellowship with their southern brethren, they developed a tradition which made Garizim the ancient place of the covenant and the scene of those manifestations which gave to Mount Zion its sanctity in the thought of the Jews. Across the border many raids were made during the history of the Jewish-Samaritan feud.

Jesus in Samaria.

Jesus had ignored these hostilities, and had passed through Samaria and even stopped to teach its people for two days. The memory of that visit had probably not faded out when Philip, another of the ardent young preachers of the faith, and, like Stephen, one of the seven helpers of the Jerusalem church, went northward to spread the news of the gospel. This was in no sense a mission to the heathen, for deeply as the Jews detested the Samaritans, they never counted them as beyond the covenant mercies of God. They regarded them as unworthy and evil-minded people who had declined from the high place which had been granted them in ancient times, but were still, in some half sort of way, included within the ancient covenant. To them, therefore, Philip took his way and stirred up such an interest in the city of Samaria that the people witnessed the wonders of his preaching with astonishment and rejoicing. On the foundation laid, perhaps, in that brief visit of Jesus to the region of Shechem, he built now the noble superstructure of a Christian community.

Simon the Magician.

At this point we encounter the interesting personality of Simon the magician, or Simon Magus as he was known in early church history. This man, who was evidently a shrewd student of human nature, gifted with the powers of wonderworking which played so large a part in the magic and deception of that age, was incidentally attracted by the new movement, both because of its appeal to some remnants of conscience, and also because of its striking demonstrations of power which even baffled his knowledge of magic.

Simon Magus is a prominent figure in the traditions of the church. His contests with Peter are almost as notable in these traditions as are those of Cerinthus with the apostle John at Ephesus. He was reputed to have had special knowledge of charms and necromancy, owing to the fact that he had possessed himself by some means of the sacred relics of King Solomon; the magic ring which made the wearer invisible, and the prayer rug which had the quality of instantly transporting the one who stood upon it to any spot he wished to visit. These fanciful traditions, gathered about the man, showed that he was at least a person of some repute in his day and must have had great influence in the Samaritan communities.

Philip's Preaching.

To this newly organized group of believers gathered by the preaching of Philip, the apostles at Jerusalem determined to send a deputation for inspection and counsel. Accordingly Peter and John as leaders in the Jerusalem church were chosen to make the journey, and their visit must have been a comfort and strength to the new Samaritan disciples. With wise counsels and earnest exhortations they gave them instructions regarding the Christian life. Moreover their presence awakened in the community a new sense of power which shows the result of the apostles' insistense upon the leadership and direction of the Holy Spirit as essential to the life of the church. Among the gifts of the spirit were those of healing and other powers, and these began now to manifest themselves not alone in the activities of Philip and the apostles, but in those of the church as well. This is one of the features of apostolic preaching which astonishes the modern mind, and yet it is not strange that such forms of power should show themselves among a people emotional to a degree and on the alert to detect the signs of power, such as the miracles of healing were in the hands of the first Christians.

Simon's Sin and Repentance.

Naturally Simon saw in this fact the opportunity for himself to add to his repertoire of wonder-working powers. The proffer of money to the apostles for the bestowment of this gift and the stern denunciation by Peter are the outstanding features of this experience of the Samaritan church. That Simon did not share the fate of Ananias and Sapphira was perhaps due to the growing sense of the value of instruction rather than condemnation in the heart of the apostle Peter. By prayer and repentance Simon was restored to the company of the faithful.

PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

THE HOLY SPIRIT AND FOREIGN MISSIONS.

Topic: February 24, Acts 13:1-4; 16:6-10.

The apostles at Jerusalem rejoiced "that they were counted worthy to suffer dishonor for the Name." They understood that the worth of their profession of discipleship was to be estimated on the basis of service and not in terms of favorable popular opinion or material comforts. Their glory was that of testifying before councils and rulers with a zeal that no persecution could quench. The church at Antioch evidently had other ambitions than that of securing itself a place of respectibility among the other institutions of the city. There was earnest prayer offered for the extension of the gospel to other cities. The gospel had been brought to Antioch from Jerusalem so recently that no member of the church could forget the debt he owed to missions. Momentous questions such as, "Where did Cain get his wife?" "What became of the lost tribes of Israel?" were doubtless ignored by these simple minded believers. It takes a modern Sunday-school class to discuss these.

Separate.

Confession of faith and baptism imply that the Christian separates himself from the world of sin. They imply more; there is a dedication to service. The kind of service and the place of it depend on the person and his opportunities. The church had one man of Paul's ability and training. To him fell the task of presenting the gospel to the Gentiles. The Holy Spirit called him away from fruitful ministry at Antioch and sent him to the regions where Christ had not been named. I do not know whether the church had a just appreciation of the power of Paul when it bade him go forth on his mission. There is no intimation of reluctance to give up the men who had added "much people" unto the Lord. The success of an invading army is hardly satisfactory when all its strength is exhausted in holding one fortification. It must advance and conquer new territory. The Spirit in the beginning of the gospel called for an advance and chose the ablest leaders to conduct it.

They Sent Them Forth.

Barnabus and Saul were sent forth by the Holy Spirit and by the church. Those who wait for the Lord to convert the heathen have managed to overlook the thirteenth of Acts. The church at Antioch had a desire to be used of God for his purposes. It sought divine guidance. The Spirit of God employs the intelligence and consecration of men. It is nowhere recorded in the Bible that indifference and ignorance are highly honored in the sight of God. The command is, "Watch," and that means that the mind and heart shall be open to all truth and to every opportunity of doing the will of God. "All great discoveries and inventions have been made by accident," is a statement worthy to be put by the side of "God will convert the heathen when he is ready." Certainly we rely on God for the success of his church, but we are poor students of the Bible if we think God does not ask of men that they dedicate to him their intellects and their coöperative ability. The sending forth of missionaries is apostolic. The church that is indifferent to the missionary enterprise is disregarding the example of the primitive church.

Into Macedonia.

Paul and his companions were forbidden by the Spirit to preach in the region of Phrygia and Galatia, in Asia and Bithynia. We look for the reason. We find it not merely in the woman at Philippi whose heart the Lord opened but much more in the great peoples of the continent of Europe. The Spirit calls men to stragetic points. Paul went to the centers of population. He spent three years in Ephesus, from which the gospel radiated into all Asia. He dwelt one year and six months in Corinth, the commercial city of Greece. And there was ever in his heart the purpose to preach the gospel in Rome, the capital of the world. If it was the wisest policy to go to the great cities, it was also wise to go to the peoples of greatest energy. And we must believe that Paul was called to Europe that he might prepare the way for the Christianization of the races to which the scepter of power should pass after the fall of Rome. What does this mean for us? Does it not bid us make disciples of the races that are destined to become dominant in the politics and commerce of Asia and Africa and the Islands of the sea? A Greenlander is precious in the sight of God. But if we must choose between him and a Chinaman, our decision ought to be influenced by considerations of the future. The Chinaman will have great power in world politics. He is therefore the man to win.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

February 28—Home Missions (Present Day Pioneers), Eccl. 11:1-4. Suggestive thought—Motto of the Religious Education Association: "The threefold purpose of the Religious Education Association is: To inspire the educational forces of our country with the religious ideal; to inspire tne religious forces of our country with the educational ideal; and to keep before the public mind the ideal of religious education, and the sense of its need and value."

It is very fitting, after we have been finding in the Old Testament a breadth of view which includes the heathen in God's plan of salvation, after Jesus' teaching has been seen to be that of one who takes the whole world upon his heart, after our missionaries have given us lectures and stereopticon views on the need of the heathen and the great work of foreign missions, when we have learned that the statesmen of Japan are looking to Christianity to give their people a rock to cling to in the upheavel of their old traditional faiths, to turn our gaze inward for awhile and see just what sort of Christianity we have at our own doors.

It is said that Christianity is not working out in America and that foreign peoples would have far less respect for it if they could see how much we lack of being a "Kingdom of God," how our masses chase the brazen ideal of wealth, how our youth pursue the tinsel aim of pleasure to the almost total exclusion of all more serious pursuits, and how our business is so full of selfishness.

But the long caravan of immigrants making its way to our shores is a picturesque indication of the fact that America is much nearer to being a Kingdom of God than any other land. I stood in the balcony of a great building at Ellis Island and watched the long line of immigrants filing by. The faces of some were stolid and the eyes almost unseeing, but the faces of most were as faces turned toward the promised land, and the rude hand of an official as he pulled back cap or shawl was but a small thing between them and the reward which lay ahead.

But America is very far from being a Kingdom of God, and when we endeavorers realize that our future Christianity is dependent upon the kind of religion our young people are now developing, it gives us food for sober thought. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days." Since then the religious life of the people of twenty years from now will be largely decided by the religious training of the youth of our present time, we are concerned especially with the Christian Endeavor Society as a home missionary force. Our young people are full of religious feeling. Let it be the noble function of the Endeavor Society to draw out and direct this feeling. Do we presidents and leaders go to our societies with our hearts full of the passion for saving souls? Do we throw our own warm experiences, our deep sympathy, into the Psalms and scriptures that we read? Else we were as tinkling cymbals and sounding brass. Are we climbing the heights with our followers, holding them by the hands? Else we were as wooden mile posts, pointing the way, but never moving a step.

Above all other church activities the Christian Endeavor is a "present day pioneer." Its work has been exceedingly crude. It has solemnly sworn to a semi-legalistic pledge which the great body of its members have never kept. It has often forgotten that religion is its primary aim. But it has no doubt been one of the factors in the preparation for the great wave of religious education which is just now beginning to sweep over our land. Certainly there is a place for the Christian Endeavor society in our church, certainly there is room in it for missionary zeal, when the closing sentence of the Religious Education Association of America reads, "—and to keep before the public mind the ideal of religious education and the sense of its need and value."

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

Lesson XI. Course of Study.

I. GENERAL PRINCIPLES. While there is some difference of opinion about the details of the ideal curriculum for the Sunday-school, certain principles are generally agreed upon. (1) The course of study must be GENETIC. It must take account of the differences in mental development in the different grades. (2) It must be PEDAGOGICAL in its methods, keeping in line with the latest developments of teaching science. (3) It must be correlated as closely as possible to the SECULAR EDUCATION of the pupils, so that there may be no sense of breach between the Sunday and Monday life. (4) It should be as COMPREHENSIVE as possible, using all that is best in literature and life to illustrate and enforce the truths of religion.

II. USE OF THE BIBLE. The Bible is preëminently the text-book of the Sunday-school. For the main school it is imperative to use a portion of Scripture as the basis of each week's lesson. In the adult classes extra-biblical courses of study are permissible and even desirable. The plan of uniform Bible lessons for the whole school has little to recommend it; what is gained in the sense of unity is more than lost by the attempt to nourish children with adult food. It is sometimes said in defense of the uniform system that if the method be graded there should be no necessity in changing the material. But the fact is that much of the material in the Bible is suited only to the adult intelligence and that some of it is not suited to Sunday-school teaching at all. The principle here stated has been virtually recognized by the great exponent of the uniform system, the International Association, when at the Louisville Convention of 1908, it instructed its Lesson Committee to prepare a thorough series of graded lessons for the whole school. These, meanwhile, will only be optional, but the time is sure to come when they will entirely replace the old system.

III. SUGGESTIONS FOR COURSE OF BIBLE STUDY. The Bible is particularly rich in material for the religious education of all grades. How this shall be best used is one of the pressing problems of the Sunday-school. While laying no claim to be authoritative the following outline may be suggestive.

(1.) KINDERGARTEN. Wonder stories from the Old Testament and selected stories from the Life of Christ. These may be accompanied and illustrated by nature studies and secular myths.

(2.) PRIMARY DEPARTMENT. Here stories from the Old Testament emphasizing the senic elements; brief biographical studies, undetailed in the Old Testament and the Life of Christ.

(3.) JUNIOR DEPARTMENT. Old and New Testament stories bringing out the personal and dramatic interests.

(4.) INTERMEDIATE DEPARTMENT. More detailed study of the Old and New Testament history and biography studies in the Life of Christ, setting forth the heroic elements in His character and work.

(5.) SENIOR DEPARTMENT. Historical study of some portion of the Old Testament; the history of the New Testament church; the character and teachings of Jesus.

(6.) ADULT DEPARTMENT. Studies in prophets and poetical literature; detailed study of Epistles and New Testament doctrine.

The above outline is not meant to be exhaustive, but to indicate the general line along which a proper course of Bible study should proceed.

IV. SUPPLEMENTAL WORK. Owing to the nature of the regular Sunday-school lessons. it has hitherto been found advisable where the International Lesson service has been used to furnish supplemental lessons, designed to give a connected view of the Bible history as a whole, and a knowledge of the contents of its separate books. This, however, is at best an expedient to correct the weakness of the uniform lesson series. Where the lesson material is properly graded, a consecutive view of Bible history and doctrine should appear in the regular lesson at the appropriate age. Supplemental work would then be done in the study of missions or temperance. But it is not hard to conceive a series of Bible text-books that would have missionary and temperance teachings as part of the regular lesson, thus doing away with the need of supplemental material altogether. Such a comprehensive series of Bible lessons is one of the great needs of the hour.

V. EXTRA-BIBILCAL STUDIES. In one grades below the Adult these should probably be confined to missions and temperance. In the Adult Department, where the school is large enough to justify it, special classes may take up the study of Church History, Christian ethics, Sociology, Bible Introduction and Doctrine. MISSIONARY STUDY classes are found very useful in this department. Men especially, are interested in the civic and economic conditions around them as they relate themselves to active Christian service, and it is safe to say that with the emphasis laid on social service in the modern church, no Sunday-school is fulfilling its duty to the future generation that has not at least one class in SOCIOLOGY. These extra-biblical studies, however, should be in no sense technical, but should aim at giving a general view of the subject in a brief and popular manner. Text-books for the special use of such classes can easily be obtained.

VI. GIVING AS EDUCATION. The offering is too often treated as a mere question of finance, but in the Sunday-school the emphasis should be laid on its educational value. To this end a proper motive in giving should be inculcated from the earliest years. It should be made INTELLIGENT. Let the scholars know for what purposes they are bringing their offering. It is well for each department to have a SPECIAL OBJECT to which their offering goes outside of the Sunday-school expenses. Thus, the Primary Department may maintain a native evangelist in one of the foreign countries; the Junior Department may have a share in a mission; the Intermediate may contribute to the Home Mission Offering of the church; the Adult classes, if large enough may have their special object of benevolence. Where local charities are supported it is well to arrange for occasional visits on the part of the department or class to the institute helped. The giving in general should be SYSTEMATIC, and stress should be laid on the fact, not amount, of the gift.

QUESTIONS: (1) What general principles must be regarded in the selection of a Curriculum? (2) What place should Bible-study have in it? (3) Are extra-biblical studies permissible? (4) Is it sufficient to have a graded method without graded material? (5) Outline a course of Bible lessons for the main school. (6) Are all parts of the Bible equally valuable for all grades? Illustrate your answer. (7) Discuss "supplemental work." (8) How could the necessity of it be avoided? (9) Name some of the educational features of the offering. (10) What are some of the extra-biblical studies that may have a place in the adult department?

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

Youngstown, Ohio

A Man's Job

"My Kingdom for an idea" seems to be the cry of our men just now. Mr. Macfarlane has written a number of our leading men asking for such an idea. In a coming number of "Christian Men" he will give these ideas. There will be as many ideas as writers and it will be interesting to see our new secretary mold one idea out of this mass. In a recent number of THE CENTURY the editor tackles this problem and after showing how clubs of men frazzle out because of a lack of a big idea, Christian Union is suggested as an ideal big enough to challenge all our men. This may be the solution. Our men may become enthusiastic over it. If they do it will certainly be a big innovation. But just as men do not want to work merely for the sake of working, but demand some ideal toward which they can work, which will gild all work with the light of hope, so men do not care for union for its own sake. Union is not an end in itself. Jesus wanted union for the sake of its effect upon the world. We must not forget that our objective is man. Men will grow enthusiastic over making society better. They always have. They always will. When we sum it all up there is little worth while in this world, if anything, except making people better. We often speak of union as though it were a thing to be sought directly and for the sake of attaining it. Suppose we had just literal union. What of it? An army comes together to fight. They do not assemble merely for the sake of assembling. Some mighty cause has brought them together. The getting together is the result of that cause. It will stay together just so long as that cause is operative. Men are not very enthusiastic over union, as such, just because it is not an ultimate thing. Union is not to be sought directly. Like happiness it is an incidental thing, never to be found as the result of direct quest. Historically we have come closer just in proportion as we have worked at common tasks. I firmly believe that the essential union of Christ's hosts is just ahead, and that union will come to pass as, in the spirit of our Savior, we work together for the uplifting of society. We will stay together because the passion to serve will endure forever. When life is seen to be more essential than dogma, as we are now clearly perceiving, we will find ourselves together in a common work.

In this city of Youngstown we have just passed through a blessed season of union meetings. Impelled by a common desire to lead men to Jesus the ministers got together, brought their congregations together, into the sweetest fellowship ever known in this vast valley. Prayer meetings in which the very spirit of God was present were held. Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Lutheran, Christian and Episcopalian, among others, sat side by side and sang, "We are not divided, all one body we." They were not seeking union as such. They were unconsciously united in real service.

I have the high privilege of presiding once a month over the deliberations of a board of twenty-one people representing nearly every denomination in our city. This is the board of a Gospel Social Settlement. The settlement is doing a wonderful work. I would like to tell you some of the great changes that have taken place in lives in whole sections of the town. Sometimes I think these settlements are functioning more acceptably to God than the church itself, as at present organized. But this is the point I wanted to score, that the fine fellowship of this board is the result of our work together for people. Union is the product of social service and never of agreement of theologies. We will never hammer, nor preach, nor persuade union into the world. Union will come in when in our common love of folks we work together for them. And we will work together for them because we cannot accomplish what we want to alone.

Yes, by all means let us have a big idea for our men's clubs. But I venture to say that the big idea will be, not the vague dream of a united Christendom, but rather some form of social service. It will probably, in the practical working out of the problem, not be any one form. Many forms will have to be used differing with the community. Different communities have different problems. Some are more advanced than others. I recently had a letter from a man in Kentucky, asking what his club could possibly do, for, he said, the saloons had been put out, there were no houses of ill-fame, everyone had steady work and there was nothing to do, as he saw it, for social betterment. Certainly he dwelt in a most enviable community, but his work was not done. Missionaries and preachers should be developed in such a place. Thousands of things could be done to improve the community itself. A garden is just ready for use when the stones are gathered out.

Every church should afford every man in its membership a chance for complete masculine expression. Jobs that challenge men should be provided. A prominent Illinois senator recently said that he would join a church just as soon as a man's job was offered

ASPIRATIONS.

Oliver W. Stewart.

Give me, Dear Lord, a quiet heart,
A calm and peaceful mind;
That I each day may do my part,
And joy in service find.

Let me not judge. My knowledge small
Will lead me far astray.
Let confidence and faith in all
Mark what I do and say.

Help me be strong. The helpless fall,
So long and fierce the fight.
On Thee in weakness now I call—
Endue with strength and might.

Keep my life sweet. My fond desire
Is that I grow like Thee;
That all the time I may aspire
Gentle and kind to be.

Make me be true. And that I may
Be loyal to the end,
Renew my courage day by day,
As to my task I bend.

Thus will I serve. And serving gain
More strength for all I do.
Good will I get from every pain;
And through all life hold true.

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER.

THE UNHAPPY PRINCE.

Once upon a time there was an idle prince who had always been unhappy. He wore a shining crown upon his head, but his face was always dark. Great rewards had been offered to the one who would bring happiness to him. All of his wishes were granted and many, many presents were given him. But still he was not happy, and oftentimes at night when everybody else was asleep he would bury his head in his arms and weep.

One day, tired of everything around him, he took off his royal robes and went strolling down a country lane. By the roadside he came upon a laborer, working the soil with his hoe. This man was very happy. For his face shone, and he sang as he worked.

The poor prince looked on and envied him. "Oh laborer," he said, "why are you glad?" But the laborer didn't know. "Will you let me change places with you," said the prince, "and see if I shall be happy too?"

So the prince took the hoe and began to work while the laborer explained the value of the growing plants, and how they would be helpful to men. At last the prince, becoming tired knelt down at a spring near by to drink. As he saw in the clear water a flushed face and dancing eyes, he suddenly knew that he was happy, and leaping to his feet he cried, "I have found it, I have found it!! Happiness lies in doing useful work.

LIKE THE ARABS.

By Grace Wood Castle.

Tom and Bobby were having a beautiful time in the garden digging worms preparatory to going fishing next morning, for they lived near a pretty little river and during vacation spent part of nearly every day with hook and line, once or twice actually bringing home enough fish for the family dinner. The days on which this happened were red-letter ones in the boys' calendar—long to be remembered.

Today, for some reason, worms were very plentiful and after filling two baking-powder cans with the wriggling things the children mourned that so many were, from their point of view, going to waste. Just then Tom was reminded of a picture in one of their books—a picture in which both he and Bobby had been much interested.

"I say, Bobby," he exclaimed, "I wonder if papa'd let us fish through a hole in the ice next winter—like the Laplander picture, you know."

Bobby, too, wondered, but was inclined to be pessimistic. "I don't b'lieve so, and anyhow what'd we do for bait. The grasshoppers and worms'll all be froze dead by that time."

"Well, sir," said Tom excitedly, "I've thought of something. Let's take a box and put earth in it and then dig a lot of worms and put them in it and nail it up tight and put it down cellar till next winter. I wouldn't wonder," he finished breathlessly, "if papa would be so 'sprised when he sees the worms that he'll let us fish through the ice with them."

Bobby, as usual, fell in with his elder brother's scheme; mamma gave them an empty soap-box without even asking what they wanted it for and the digging proceeded merrily. It was Black Friday for the worms, but after awhile the children decided they had enough.

They packed them in the box, thick layers of earth alternating with thin layers of worms—"just like a jelly-cake"—then Tom found the hammer and nails and fastened on the lid. He did his best, but it was not a very good job; however, they agreed that the cracks were necessary to admit air for the inmates.

"Course we don't want to be cruel and smother 'em," said soft-hearted Bobby.

By dint of much tugging, the box was dragged and pushed to the outside cellarway, then shunted down the stairs. In a dark corner the little prisoners were left to their dreams.

The floor of the cellar was not cemented, but was of earth much the same as that of the garden and this fact has an important bearing on the outcome of my story.

The next day—a beautiful Saturday in October—the children fished to their hearts' content and talked much of their captives, but after that they almost forgot them.

Winter was a long time coming that year and it was near Christmas when the boys woke up one morning to find the windows thickly frosted and to hear papa saying that the thermometer had fallen nearly to zero during the night.

"That means ice," said Tom gleefully.

"And fishing through it, if papa'll let us," added Bobby joyously, remembering their plan. "Let's go down right after breakfast and wake up the worms." Tom agreed and they sped down to the dining-room.

"Why are you fellows in such a hurry to get through breakfast?" asked their father, "something special on hand?"

"It's a secret," answered Tom and Bobby in unison. "May we be excused?"

Mamma excused them and armed with hammer, chisel, and an old iron spoon, they hurried down cellar and went to work. Tom soon had the cover off and began dipping out the earth while Bobby watched intently.

"I sh'd think you'd come to them pretty soon," he said uneasily, when the box was half empty.

"P'r'aps," said Tom hopefully, "they all went to the bottom so's not to be lonesome."

When they still fail'd to appear Bobby cried despairingly:

"I don't believe there's a single solitary worm in that box"—which proved to be the case. "And we put in more'n a thousand. I guess," wailed Tom. "I'd like to know what became of 'em."

Very soberly they dumped the earth in the back yard and the box on the wood-pile, then went to mamma—who never failed them—for sympathy and an explanation of the mystery. They were much puzzled and a little indignant when she laughed heartily and chanted:

"They folded their tents like the Arabs,
And as silently stole away."

Aunt Chloe was burdened with the support of a worthless husband, who beat her when he was sober, and whom she dutifully nursed and tended when he came home bruised and battered from a fighting spree.

One Monday morning she appeared at the drug store and asked the clerk for "a right pow'ful linerment foh achin' in de bones."

"You might try some of this St. Peter's Prescription, Aunty; it's an old and popular remedy, cures cuts, bruises, aches and sprains. One dollar the bottle. Good for man and beast."

Aunt Chloe looked at the dollar bottle and then dubiously at her flat purse. "Ain't yo' got some foh fifty cents?" she ventured. "Some foh jes' only beasts. Ah want it foh my ol' man."—January Lippincott's.

WITH THE WORKERS

J. W. Reynolds will soon close his work at Salem, Ohio.

F. W. Prigsley is in a meeting with the church at Kellogg, Ia.

S. A. Cook is taking up the work with the church at Selling, Okla.

Work has been begun upon the new building of the Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, Ohio.

There is a contest on between the Sunday-schools of the church at Brazil, Ind., and at Greencastle, Ind.

E. L. Day is leading the church at Brazil, Ind., in an aggressive way. There are additions at nearly every service.

Josephine M'Rill Cook made her advent in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Cook, pastor of the church at Enid, Okla., January 21.

There have been forty additions to the church at Arkansas City, Kansas, since Thomas H. Popplewell began his work there five months ago.

The pastor, J. W. Underwood, is doing the preaching in a meeting being held by the church at Ashtabula, Ohio. Marked success is attending the effort.

There were 103 additions to the High Street Church, Akron, Ohio, in the first two weeks of the meeting being held with the assistance of E. E. Violet.

The Evanston, Ill., church has instituted a weekly calendar, which it prints on its own press, announcing its services. We trust it will not fall into conflict with the printers' union.

A good meeting has been held with the church at Camden, Ill. The pastor, George F. Chandler, did the preaching. There were eight additions to the church, seven by confession. A book study, in the Bible, was a feature of each service.

A note in "Upward," the weekly paper of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., reads: "The Jefferson street people are getting to feel that the passing of a Lord's Day without an addition to the church is like the passing of a day without the glimpse of the sun."

Robert Lord Cave, pastor of the West Side Church, San Francisco, announces the following series of Sunday evening sermons: "Jesus' Call to the Heart—His Surpassing Sympathy;" "Jesus' Call to the Conscience—His Imperative Ought;" "Jesus' Call to the Will—Ability and Responsibility;" "Jesus' Call to Service—The Life of Simple Usefulness."

The Men's Brotherhood of the First Church, Springfield, held a recent banquet, with addresses by R. F. Thrapp, Jacksonville; Mr. Stearns, Springfield, and A. P. Gill, the architect, supervising the construction of the tabernacle for the Sunday meetings. The brotherhood adopted the ideal of winning one hundred men to Christ and the church during the revival meeting.

F. L. Davis, pastor, did the preaching in a meeting at Flora, Ind., which lasted thirty-one days. There were thirty-four additions to the church, two of these confessions. At the close of the meeting there was but one person in the house who did not belong to some church. Sixteen families were reached by the meeting. The church worked hard and the meeting is counted a very successful one in its influence upon the membership of the church.

The church at Elyria, Ohio, becomes a Living Link in the Foreign society.

H. J. Crockett has resigned the pulpit of the the church at Bartlesville, Okla.

The Oklahoma Ministerial Association will hold its annual meeting in Elreno, in April.

President E. V. Zollars gave the address before a recent meeting of the Men's club at the church at Enid, Okla.

O. F. Jordan, pastor, is to do the preaching in a meeting to be held by the church at Evanston, Ill., beginning March 21.

The West Madison Avenue church, Cleveland, Ohio, where F. C. Ford has ministered for five years is holding a meeting with home forces.

The average attendance of the Sunday-school at Elreno, Okla., for last year, was 236. There was an average of nine new members each Sunday.

The Park Church, New Albany, Ind., begins a meeting February 21, in which they are to have the assistance of John W. Marshall. F. T. Porter is the pastor.

A. L. Ward, at Boulder, Colorado, has led his church in the organization of a "Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ." There seems to be a spirit of aggressiveness in all departments of the church work.

During the month of January there were seventeen additions to the University Church, Champaign, Ill. The church is working together with unamimity and enthusiasm to clear up the last dollar of indebtedness before the close of the centennial year; after which it hopes to double the size of its building.

The official board of the church at Champaign, Ill., is setting a good example before the church by tithing their income for the month of February. This is a part of the campaign that has been carried on to bring the church to a tithing basis. Many of the 1,200 members of the church are expressing themselves as ready to accept this standard of giving and some are already practicing it.

Chas. E. McVey is leading the singing in a meeting at Mason City, Ia.

The church at Ponca City, Okla., has called G. B. Kellum as its pastor.

Miss Lura V. Thompson spoke at the Evanston Church last Sunday evening.

J. E. Davis, of Beatrice, and H. H. Harmon, Lincoln, Neb., exchanged pulpits on a recent Sunday.

A good meeting is in progress in the church at Wilmington, Ohio. There were seventy additions the first two weeks. Small and Shaffer are the evangelists.

The church at Table Grove, Ill., Fred S. Nichols, pastor, held a Lincoln Centennary service, February 7. The meeting was in charge of the George N. Kerr Post.

The Netz sisters are singing in the meeting being held at Millersburg, Ohio. P. H. Welshimer, of Canton, is doing the preaching, and is meeting with splendid success.

Chas. M. Fillmore held a meeting with the Hillside church, Indianapolis, of which he is pastor, during the month of January. There were thirty-two accessions to the church.

There were twenty-five additions to the church at Aamargo, Ill., during a four weeks' meeting which closed January 31. The pastor, L. B. Pickerill, did the preaching.

F. D. Ferrall, pastor; Bruce Brown, evangelist; and J. P. Garmong, leader of song, constituted the fine combination in the recent meeting at Bloomfield, Ia., in which there were 104 additions to the church.

The North Side Church, Kansas City, Kans., has just closed a short meeting during which there were forty accessions to the church. W. A. Gardner conducted the singing. The pastor, J. S. Myers, did the preaching.

A very interesting program has been prepared by the Home society for the use of the Endeavor Societies, in their Home Missions topic February 28. These programs will be cheerfully furnished those who will address H. E. Denton, secretary, Y. M. C. A. building.

WITH THE WORKERS

E. H. Williamson writes encouragingly of the outlook at the East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo., where he has just begun work.

The Central Illinois Christian Ministerial Institute will meet in Decatur, Illinois, April 8 and 9. The program has many strong features.

George Wolfe, minister at Weatherford, Okla., has been doing some hard work assisting the church at Arapaho, to a sound financial basis.

Lew D. Hill, who has been doing excellent work for the church at Winchester, Ill., has been called to remain another year. During the past year there were one hundred additions to the church.

During the first month of the work of Harvey Hazel with the Boyle Heights Church, Los Angeles, there were nineteen additions to the church.

The church at Madisonville, Ky., has granted its minister, S. M. Bernard, his time during February, March and April, to visit the Orient. He goes in company with George H. Combs, Kansas City, Mo.

The ministers of the various churches of Knoxville, Tenn., have arranged for a general interchange of pulpits. Phillip H. King, of the Park Avenue Christian was very properly the leading spirit in the plan.

The church at El Paso, Texas, where H. B. Robison, is the pastor, has adopted the apportionment plan for raising the current expenses of the church. The church treasurer will make monthly reports to the church of the financial condition.

S. G. Buchner, is assisting his brother, C. C. Buchner, in a meeting with the Indiana Avenue Christian Church, South Bend, Ind. The church is so encouraged by the meetings and its audiences so overflow its building, that the congregation has decided to build in the spring.

The young people of the Portland Avenue church, Minneapolis, Minn., announce a series of three services of especial interest to young people. The pastor, P. J. Rice, will preach on the following themes: "A Fast Young Man," or "Sins of the Flesh;" "An Unbrotherly Brother," or "Sins of the Spirit;" "A Fatherly Father," or "Love in Action."

Evangelist Allen Wilson assisted the church at Winchester, Ill., in a five weeks' meeting in which there were seventy-four additions to the church. One week of the time the evangelist was ill, and the pastor, Lew D. Hill did the preaching, and was assisted in the musical part of the service by J. W. Sniff, who was home a few days between his meetings.

The following series of Sunday evening sermons is announced by W. D. Endres, pastor of the Christian church, Harvey, Ill.: Young People's Problems—The Nature and Aim of Education, The Formation of Habits, The Determining Principles in Recreation and Amusements, Withstanding Temptations, Choosing Life's Work; Love, Courtship and Marriage, or Founding a Home; Settling the Religious Question.

Our readers will be interested in the following note:

W. F. Richardson recently preached several sermons in a union meeting of all the Protestant churches of Independence, Mo. On one afternoon every business house was closed, including eight saloons. Every saloon keeper, with one exception, and many of the bartenders were present."

TELEGRAMS.

Des Moines, Ia., Feb. 14: Closing day in terrific blizzard. House packed and thirty at last invitation, 631 in all, by confession, letter and statement. This is in every way a great church and is being led on to wonderful victories by one of the greatest spiritual men among us, Brother Finis Idleman. Delighted with our second campaign with him, although we have gone through the fourth blizzard in this one meeting. The church was loyal to the work. Have just read of the great meeting at Jerusalem and wonder what some of our brethren will think of it. The report says, "There were added unto them about three thousand souls." There may have been some excitement for report says, "A multitude gathered together." Report does not say how many came at the first invitation but does say that "With many other words Peter testified and exhorted." He must have held on pretty long, possibly all day, for the report says, "As many as gladly received his word were baptized and the same day the three thousand were added unto them." I marvel that somebody didn't object to numbers before night, yet the report says, "They continued steadfastly in the apostles doctrine and fellowship." So their work must have been genuine, though some who do not believe in great meetings of course will not believe that. I see a later report from the Jerusalem Church says "A great persecution arose and these converts were scattered," but the report doesn't say they were lost, for "They went everywhere preaching the word." I wonder what the end of the influence of that great meeting will be.

Charles Reign Scoville.

Louisville, Ky., February 14: Ninety-three in fifteen days New Albany, Ind., Central Church. Sellers and St. John, evangelists.

B. F. Cato, Pastor.

A new parsonage is to be build by the Central Church, Moberly, Mo.

Richard Martin has just closed a meeting at Eureka, Kansas, during which he reports one hundred additions, thirty of these the last day of the meeting.

The new church building at Hutchinson, Kansas, will be dedicated the first Sunday in March. It is with this church that the state convention meets this year.

CHICAGO

A CHICAGO PREACHER FALLEN AT HIS POST. PARKER STOCKDALE STRICKEN SUDDENLY IN THE MIDST OF BROAD PLANS, LARGE ACHIEVEMENTS AND HIGH HOPES. JACKSON BOULEVARD CHURCH IN MOURNING. MINISTERIAL ASSOCIATION STRICKEN WITH GRIEF AT THE TAKING AWAY OF A PARTNER AND FRIEND.

The heart of our Chicago brotherhood was shocked and smitten by the news of the death of Parker Stockdale, pastor of the Jackson Boulevard Church. He was recovering, as all supposed, from an operation for appendicitis, when suddenly, with not an hour's warning, death took him away from family, church and brethren. The physicians explained his death as due to a blood-clot. He expired on Wednesday, February 10. Funeral services were held in the Jackson Boulevard Church the Sunday afternoon following. A great multitude came through a savage blizzard to lay their tribute on his bier. The large auditorium of the church was crowded. The Sunday-school room below was filled with an overflow congregation which waited until the close of the service only to look upon the dead pastor's face. Our ministers of the city attended in a body acting as honorary pallbearers and having charge of the service. H. L. Willett read the Word of God, W. F. Shaw offered prayer, E. S. Ames read a sketch of Mr. Stockdale's life, C. G. Kindred preached the sermon and C. C. Morrison pronounced the benediction.

To Minister, Not to be Ministered Unto.

Mr. Kindred preached to the church, primarily. Their pastor was a minister, he said. Like his Master he "came not to be ministered unto but to minister." The church is the minister of the community. Its business is that of the servant—to do the disagreeable things in the home of man. Its function is to carry away impurity, to keep the home clean of pollution and to fill it with wholesome, helpful things that will make it fit for the dwelling of the spirit. A church that sits like a mendicant at the side of the highway of life where men go back and forth to home and work begging gifts and service from them, is a misnomer if called a church of Christ. Only a church that exists to give, to serve, this weary, blundering, sinful multitude, no matter at what cost, has the right to be called after Christ's name. This was the spirit of Parker Stockdale. He was a servant of the community. He loved folks. He loved the unloved. His big open nature had room in it for the overlooked boys of the street. He made religion real to men who could not understand its creeds but could understand it when revealed in a warm, wholesome, democratic personality like their fallen pastor.

The body was taken to the old home in Shelbina, Missouri, for interment. George A. Campbell and O. F. Jordan were appointed by the ministers' association to accompany the stricken family on the dreary journey.

The following sketch prepared and read by E. S. Ames at the funeral service will give the significant facts of Mr. Stockdale's life:

Parker Stockdale was born in Monroe county, Missouri, June 26, 1872. He was therefore in his thirty-seventh year at the time of his death. When he was six or seven years of age his parents moved to Barton county, Missouri. He was left at eleven by the death of his father, to assume responsibilities and tasks beyond his years. He became during his teens the chief support of his mother, two brothers and a sister. With his team of mules he worked on a little farm in summer and got such schooling as he could in winter. From boyhood he was passionately eager for knowledge, and no toil could entirely withhold him from his books. An incident from these early days of struggle displays two traits of his personality which have impressed all who have known him, the traits of ceaseless energy and of restless intellectual curiosity. While working in the fields he was accustomed to take an hour at noon in the heat and weariness of the day to read his books. Since the humble home had no clock he would mark the position of the sunlight on the floor and read until the improvised dial marked the passing of an hour, and then take his mules and hurry back to work.

First Pastorate at Twenty.

He taught school the winters when he was eighteen and nineteen. At twenty he became pastor of the Baptist church at Shelbina, Missouri. The following year he took a pastorate near San Diego, California. But with the old craving for education he returned to Liberty, Missouri, after one year, to study in Parker Stockdale.

William Jewell College. Here he was a student for six years, paying his expenses by tutoring and preaching. He preached for churches in the neighboring towns of Meadville, Tipton, California and Salisbury. It seemed a natural and simple thing for his buoyant nature to assume the full measure of manhood's obligations while still a youth paying his own way through college, for he was married in 1895 to Miss Priscilla Maddox, whose good companionship has heartened him these fourteen years. In 1900 he graduated from William Jewel College with the honors of his class—as though poverty, extra labor and the care of a family aided rather than lessened his strength. During the two years following his graduation he was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Independence, Missouri. Then once more the craving for further knowledge moved him and he went to the Theological Seminary at Meadville, Pennsylvania. Here for two years, from 1902 to 1904, he moved in new fields of religious thought, experiencing contact with a radically different type of academic life and of church fellowship. In 1904 he became pastor of the People's Church in Aurora, Illinois, and continued there until April, 1906, when he became identified with the Disciples of Christ and was called to the pastorate of the Jackson Boulevard Christian Church, Chicago. His death last Wednesday, February 10, followed complications arising from an operation for appendicitis a little more than two weeks before.

He leaves his wife and four children, Rider, twelve years of age; Frances, eight; Laura Dean, five; and little William, who is three. One child, a boy of five, died five years ago. His mother, brothers and sister survive him. His remains will be buried in the village of Shelbina, Missouri, where he began his ministry seventeen years ago.

Inner Currents Warm and Swift.

This brief survey of dates and names indicates a life history whose inner currents ran warm and swift, full of resilience and great strength. Only a glimpse may here be taken into the deeper experiences involved in one of these events. That event was his coming among the Disciples and entering upon the pastorate of this church. As he himself described the change, it was evidently prompted by his active, enthusiastic, sociable nature. He was not by temper fitted to adjust himself to any cold intellectualism or to any formal ritualism in religion. His whole being urged him to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ with fervor, with direct practical application to the needs of particular people, and with the zeal to building up in tangible and visible ways the church and the allied agencies of the church. He was happy in his ministry in this fellowship and in this pastorate because, as a Disciple, he could so consistently ignore the old theological dogmas as ultimate things and yet could use their terms and phrases so long as they helped him to reach the consciences and control the lives of men. He was happy to find himself the leader of a warm-hearted, busy, hospitable people. His hearty, genial nature made him a lover of men, a good mixer, as we say. He was therefore an excellent pastor. He carried people out of themselves by his exuberance, his simplicity and his sincerity of purpose. He established himself in the same way among his fellow ministers.

GOOD CHANGE
Coffee to Postum.

The large army of persons who have found relief from many chronic ailments by changing from coffee to Postum as a daily beverage, is growing each day.

It is only a simple question of trying it for oneself in order to know the joy of returning health as realized by an Ills. young lady. She writes:

"I had been a coffee drinker nearly all my life and it affected my stomach—caused insomnia and I was seldom without a headache. I had heard about Postum and how beneficial it was, so concluded to quit coffee and try it.

"I was delighted with the change. I can now sleep well and seldom ever have headache. My stomach has gotten strong and I can eat without suffering afterwards. I think my whole system greatly benefited by Postum.

"My brother also suffered from stomach trouble while he drank coffee, but now, since using Postum he feels so much better he would not go back to coffee for anything."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

He took it for granted that we all had the same human interests and the same lofty purpose as himself, and he was therefore at once at home with us. Every man of us felt that he was our friend, and that he was a devout and ardent fellow servant of the Master. He won his way quickly, the very first year among us, in all our organized work, in our ministerial association, our city missionary society and our social union. He gained recognition also in the work of the brotherhood in state and national concerns.

Wide Sympathy and Fellowship.

This practical, inexhaustible good fellowship not only established him quickly as the trusted leader of his great church, and the sure friend of his brother ministers, but it enabled him to become identified with his neighborhood and with the life of the city as perhaps no other pastor among us has ever done in the same length of time. He was a man among men. He exemplified the brotherly, neighborly spirit of Jesus by numerous and close associations with many classes of people. He belonged to several fraternal orders. He had a considerable acquaintance among people whose profession it is to amuse and entertain, yet his best friends knew that he never lowered the dignity of his own profession nor compromised the high ideals of his faith. He craved vital and varied experiences but he did not forget his first duties for any secondary pleasures. It is beyond question that his natural and easy conduct among so many classes of people served to impress more than one individual with the possibility of combining virility and sanity and companionableness with piety and godliness.

He has been taken from us without warning, in the seeming full power of a sinewy and growing manhood. His splendid physique appeared to promise the full four score years of life. It is as though death had openly menaced another of our number and then stealthily struck this giant while we thought him safe. He went down as Markham says of Lincoln:

"As when a lordly cedar, green with boughs,
Goes down with a great shout upon the hills,
And leaves a lonesome place against the sky."

Stricken in the Day of Hope.

He felt himself just settling to his task. He had his tools in readiness, keen edged and fitted to his hand; he had a well-equipped work-shop here for fashioning the materials of human nature into diviner types; he had his assured place in the affection of his fellow workmen; and he had tender companionship and restfulness in his home with the happy, innocent faces of his children about his knee. He looked forward to many joyous, arduous, fruitful years. The vast tides of life in the city never overwhelmed or dismayed him, but rather stimulated him to eager service. The numerous problems which perplex so many pastors—shifting membership, the tension between the church and the masses, and innumerable doctrinal questions—were not ignored by him, but they had no power to daunt his aspiring and courageous spirit. He went into the hurrying streams of human life and befriended men and women while the burdens were upon them and while their lives were feverish in toil or pleasure or disaster. He made them feel the hollowness of their excuses and gathered people into his church for rest and worship and for spiritual comradeship with a resistless energy which made religion new and fascinating. His audiences increased, money was easier and many scores of people gained faith in Christ and in the holy things of Christian service.

Who can believe our dear brother's work on earth is ended? He will still summon the souls of men to this place of worship. Many will still hear his impassioned appeals for loyal discipleship and faithful service. Among his fellow ministers he will still be a loving, urgent, genial influence. He was the first to go from us in death while in the active ministry, but he will continue to be a definite and powerful helper in the labors of his church and of all Chicago Disciples. We shall think of him as we think of our beloved Brother Larrabee, as one whose presence still abides with us and whose heroic spirit still fights at our side in the wars of God.

His Work and Presence Still Abide.

And he will still abide in his family, silent yet powerful and gracious. His companion and his sons and daughters will still look upon his kindly face and gain counsel and encouragement. In tender affection and deathless love they will meet him ever more in the silent watches of the night and in moments of great anxiety and of worthy deeds.

For who can take from us what we have known
We that have looked into each others eyes?
Though sudden night should blacken all the skies,
The day is ours, and what the day has shown.

What we have seen and been, hath not this grown
Part of our very selves? We, made love-wise,
What power shall slay our living memories,
And who shall take from us what is our own?

Our dear brother scarcely could have known that death was near him when it came, and yet we know his dauntless soul would not have been afraid if he had felt its cold hand upon him. For in his life with us he told us what he thought of death. His greatest sorrow would be for those he loved and for the work he longed to do. For himself he had met too many difficulties in his life to be afraid of death. And then he had an undimmed faith in immortality. He believed the souls of good men live with God and expected in another world to have still greater opportunity than here, to find the truth and to employ it in great achievements. He could take Browning's words to himself:

"O, Saul, it shall be
A face like my face that receives thee; a man like to me,
Thou shalt love and be loved by, forever; a Hand like this hand
Shall throw open the gates of new life to thee!
See the Christ stand!"

Once each quarter H. D. C. MacLachlan, of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., holds a children's service at the hour of the regular church service. A feature of the service is a sermon to the children. The plan is proving helpful to the work of the church.

WRONG BREAKFAST
Change Gave Rugged Health.

Many persons think that for strength, they must begin the day with a breakfast of meat and other heavy foods. This is a mistake as any one can easily discover for himself.

A W. Va. carpenter's experience may benefit others. He writes:

"I used to be a very heavy breakfast eater but finally indigestion caused me such distress, I became afraid to eat anything.

"My wife suggested a trial of Grape-Nuts and as I had to eat something or starve, I concluded to take her advice. She fixed me up a dish and I remarked at the time that the quality was all right, but the quantity was too small—I wanted a saucerful.

"But she said a small amount of Grape-Nuts went a long way and that I must eat it according to directions. So I started in with Grape-Nuts and cream, two soft boiled eggs and some crisp toast for breakfast.

"I cut out meats and a lot of other stuff I had been used to eating all my life and was gratified to see that I was getting better right along. I concluded I had struck the right thing and stuck to it. I had not only been eating improper food, but too much.

"I was working at the Carpenter's trade at that time and thought that unless I had a hearty breakfast with plenty of meat, I would play out before dinner. But after a few days of my "new breakfast" I found I could do more work, felt better in every way, and now I am not bothered with indigestion.

Stomach Gases and Torpid Livers

Give Way Before the Peculiar Purifying Power of Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges.

A Trial Package Sent Free.

The foul gases of the stomach and the torpid action of the liver are easy victims for charcoal to overcome.

This great natural cleaner and absorbent will most certainly be relished by a system afflicted with gaseous or sluggish tendencies.

Charcoal has long been known as a great absorbent of gas. A panful of charcoal will positively purify a room filled with foul odors and decay. Its absorbing ratio is one hundred times greater than its own volume.

The ancients gave charcoal for many human ills successfully. The North American Indians used it for snake bite, poison from eating wild herbs and cured what they called "stomach bad medicine" with it.

Willow charcoal seems to be the best product for human use, and no doubt the peculiar curative property of the willow is represented in a chemical quality in its charcoal.

Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges are pure willow and sweet honey blended by tremendous power and compression into a very palatable lozenge. Two or three lozenges eaten after meals will prevent the process of digestion from producing noxious gases. They will vivify a lazy liver and aid every organ which is most likely to be overcome through its contact with impurities.

They cleanse the stomach and intestines, bring purity and sweetness out of fermentation and decay and aid digestion by allaying gas. They will aid you and your stomach. The beneficial effects are made evident after each meal when you use charcoal as Stuart prepares it. To allay gas at night they are excellent and one arises in the morning without that terrible nauseating bad breath which destroys appetite and renders one miserable.

All druggists sell Stuart's Charcoal Lozenges, price twenty-five cents, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 200 Stuart Bldg., Marshall, Mich.

OUR CHURCH MEN.

him. I tell you I would like to have one hundred men make me that offer here in Youngstown. We are in the midst of a local option fight. Will you believe it, we had to hunt through the churches to find one big fellow who would dare to take up the work with enthusiasm? He was found, thank God, and his great business ability is being used to conduct this fight. But the search convinces me that there are not so many men crazy for big jobs. It is easy enough to talk loudly about the church not affording men big jobs, but I can tell you the names of some men who would be scared to death when the big jobs came their way. There are, I suppose, some churches and some pastors that do not afford big tasks for men, but I have a very exalted conception of the masculinity of our preachers. We have men who do things. Some may have the emphasis slightly misplaced, but they are honest men and they will do much good. Moreover, our fellows are interested in social problems. They stand for clean towns, honest government and sober citizenship. Any senator wanting a big job would do well to apply to any one of our men.

Last year we had one hundred men in our church club here and we had a great season. What held us together? Work for civic righteousness. We were interested in the election of a good mayor. We were concerned in cleaning up our notoriously bad town. The enthusiasm was grand. There was no frazzling. We struck some powerful blows. What we did required nerve, sacrifice and persistency. We got results. We delivered the goods. And if I know anything about it, men like these things.

Our men's clubs will not, ought not, to do any one type of work. All their work should, however, be like the work of Jesus, for the good of men. Every pastor, every group of sensible laymen will be able to select the work that lies nearest at hand in any given community. The work will not be limited to local conditions. The masculine task of missions will carry men's interests to the outmost rim.

In subsequent papers various men will deal with various big jobs and with many methods.

GREAT DAY FOR PEORIA

W. F. Turner's Ministry Opened with State Wide Reception.

Friday, February 5, will be long remembered by the congregation at Peoria, Illinois, for on that day they received with open arms and hearts, William Franklin Turner and his family. The Peoria Church has been without a regular minister since the resignation of Harry F. Burns last July, the pulpit being filled in the interim by Prof. E. E. Boyer of Eureka College. In casting about for a minster, they were attracted to Joplin, Missouri, where Bro. Turner was just rounding his tenth successful year, and where he was beloved both by the church and the community. A messenger was sent forth, who returned with glowing reports of the Joplin pastor. How two thousand had been added to the church; two new congregations established and self-supporting; additions nearly every Lord's day; living link in both foreign and home societies; etc, etc. Brother Turner was invited to visit Peoria with matrimonial intent, and he was present at the annual meeting of the Peoria Church November 8, when the congregation met around the banquet table to listen to the reports of the year's work. This gave the prospective pastor an opportunity to size up the congregation and its various departments. The reports showed the church to be in a prosperous condition. No debts and money on hand. The Peoria Church building is one of the modern structures of the city, built in 1894, at a cost of $25,000.00 contains auditorium, Bible school assembly and class rooms, pastor's study, choir room, parlors, dining room, kitchen, etc. Has pipe organ valued at $2,000.00 and modern heating plant. Seating capacity of auditorium 600, of parlors 350; parlors also serve as banquet hall with seating capacity of 300. The Howett street congregation (not a separate organization as yet) occupy a neat structure in the lower end of the city; have a bible school of 150, and the children's day offering in 1908 was $125 for foreign missions. Ladies' Aid society of 25 members, and commendably active. William Price, just now finishing his course at Eureka College, minsters to this flock, and has already proven the valuable assistant needed by the Central Church Pastor.

To make a long story short, the Peoria church made love to Mr. Turner so fervently and persistently, that he and his wife decided that it was the place to go, so they are there. On arrival they were met by a delegation, and every courtesy possible was accorded them. On February fifth, the members and friends of the congregation gathered at the Central Church for the public reception. From 8 to 8:30 o'clock, a continuous stream of humanity passed before the new pastor and his wife and children. The clergy of the city were there, as were the Y. M. C. A., Y. W. C. A., and other church workers. At 8:30 the congregation sang together "All hail the power of Jesus' name," and prayer was offered by Prof. Boyer, temporary minister. Dr. Clifford U. Collins, Vice Chairman of the Board of Elders and Deacons of the Peoria Church, was chairman of the evening. Resume of correspondence was given by E. E. Elliott, Chairman of committee which prepared the service. Greetings were read from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and all teeming with love and esteem for the incoming minister. The following program was then presented.

Addresses of Welcome.

On behalf of the Central Congregation, Prof. E. E. Boyer.

Onbehalf, of Howett St. Congregation, William Price.

On behalf of Peoria Ministerial Association, Rev. W. H. Geistweit. President.

On behalf of Eureka College, Robert E. Hieronymus, President; Harry H. Peters, Field Secretary.

On behalf of the Christian Church in Illinois, J. Fred Jones, State Secretary.

Personal Greetings.

Frederick W. Burnham, Minister First Church Springfield, Ill.

F. L. Moore, Minister church, Abingdon, Ill.

O. W. Lawrence, Minister Central Church, Decatur, Ill.

Alva W. Taylor, Minister Church, Eureka, Ill.

Stephen E. Fisher, Minister First Church, Champaign, Ill.

Telegrams and letters were received from the following:

Russell F. Thrapp, Minister church Jacksonville, Ill., R. H. Waggener, representing Christian Standard, Cincinnati, Ohio, James A. Barnet, Minister first Church, Galesburg, Ill., P. C. Macfarlane, Secretary National Brotherhood of diciples of Christ, Kansas City, Mo., J. G. Waggoner, Minister Church Canton, Ill., Paul Moore, Assistant Editor Christian Evangelist, St. Louis, Mo., F. O. Norton, Dean of Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa. Edgar De Witt Jones, Minister first church Bloomington, Ill., Edgar S. Potter, Quincy, Ill., W. A. Fite, Minister Church, Fulton, Mo., L. W. McCreary, Minister Hamilton Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo., W. D. Hurlbut, Elder Church, Joplin, Mo., Thos. L. Robertson, Ozark, Mo., W. B. Clemmer, Minister Memorial Church, Rock Island, Ill., Geo. L. Peters, Minister So. Joplin Church, Joplin, Mo., A. W. Baker, State Evangelist of Washington, M. R. Ely, Living Link in home Society of Joplin Church, J. M. Famuliner, Minister Villa Heights church, Joplin. J. H. Gillaland, Minister second church, Bloomington, Ill., Mrs. N. A. Turner, Marionville, Mo.

To all of which Mr. Turner very feelingly replied. After the reception proper, the young people served light refreshment in the church parlors. The outlook in Peoria is good. The first Sunday saw the house well filled both morning and evening. The music of the chorus choir is excelled by no church in the city. The various departments of the church are active. The Men's brotherhood has been in existence five years and has been placed on a stable basis. The Peoria church probably has more men workers per membership than any church in the city, a fact which was favorably commented upon by several of the speakers at the reception. All in all both pastor and people should be congratulated. The field is ripe for the harvest. Peoria county has only one church of our brotherhood, and the population of the city alone is 85,000, with a well populated rural district. The community is cosmopolitan. The merchant, miner, manufacturer, farmer, educator, are of various nationalities, none predominating. The complexion of the religious community is not pronounced. In a recent religious canvass of the city it was found that some 700 families of the city have a preference for our brotherhood. This has been the start of a series of visits by members of the congregation, with view of increasing the membership in Peoria. Averyville, a thriving suburb, joins Peoria on the north. Many of our members are located therein, but on account of the distance to the city, have found fellowship with the other churches established at their doors.

Among the preachers who have served the Peoria congregation in the past may be mentioned, Ira J. Chase, J. G. Waggoner, J. M. Kersey, Jesse P. McEnright, G. B. Van Arsdall, Barton W. Stone, N. S. Haines, Wm. Davenport, Wm. Brown, Milton P. King, J. B. Mayfield, Barton R. Ailsworth, Ira R. Carman, John Miller, John O. Kane, William Thompson, and H. F. Burns, the last to occupy the pulpit prior to the advent of William Franklin Turner. E. E. Elliott.

DR. ROYAL J. DYE AT SANTA BARBARA, CALIFORNIA.

Last Thursday Dr. Dye of Bolenge, Africa, spoke to our people of his work on the Congo. It is not easy to get a large Sunday congregation in Santa Barbara, and midweek meetings are generally very poorly attended. But this time the fame of the Lord's doings with our workers in the dark continent, and the wide advertising given his meeting brought out a full house. For one hour and a half Dr. Dye held the attention spell-bound with the thrilling story of the gospel transformations of these cannibal blacks into Christians of such faithfulness, in life, zeal, in service, and liberality in giving, as shames us Christians at home. At the close an offering was received of $15.77 in cash and over $60 in pledges to apply on southern California's Centennial offering of $10,000, to enable our African missionaries to open up another station. I think this sum will be increased largely by persons not present at the meeting.

So intense was the interest shown in the story related by Dr. Dye that after the congregation was dismissed a good part of the people crowded around the missionary to ask further questions, look at the curios, and find out more about the marvelous works of God in this land of darkness. Dr. Dye's visit will mark an epoch in some lives, and all who heard him will be the better for it. Sumner T. Martin.

CHRISTIAN TEMPLE, BALTIMORE.

The Christian Temple has entered upon what promises to be the best year in its history. The figures for the Bible-school have been set at 1,200, which is little more than 200 of its present enrollment in all departments. During January there were sixty-two new scholars added and at that rate, we will easily go to the 1,200. The figures for the church membership have been set at 900, which would make about 200 new members to come in during the year. During January there were thirty-six, nearly all of them by confession and baptism at the regular services. The figures for the seminary enrollment are 200, which is almost double what we have now and out of our present student body ten have volunteered to enter some other educational institution in the fall to complete their course. The orphanage society has set twenty-five more children under its care and during January three were added to this list. we are expecting to double our Chinese school and to open a mission among the Italians in the fall. Five of our members including the minister are studying Italian for that purpose. Plans are already on foot for the erection of a new house of worship for one of our mission churches. These are a part of the things we have enlisted to do for the glory of God and for the salvation of our race. Peter Ainslie.

A Moral Equivalent of War

"What we now need to discover in the social realm is the moral equivalent of war; something heroic that will speak to men as universally as war does, and yet will be as compatible with their spiritual selves as war has proved itself to be incompatible."—PROFESSOR WILLIAM JAMES.

Our thoughtful men all thank God that war is passing away. Without doubt war is on the whole and in the main obstructive to civilization and debasing to man.

Yet the pursuit of warfare has without doubt produced strength and hardihood and nerve in the character of men engaged in it. A man's character may be measured by what he can do without. In war the soldier comes to despise those material comforts deemed necessary in the piping times of peace. War demands depth beyond depth of exertion, both in degree and in duration. Discomfort and annoyance, hunger and wet, pain and cold, squalor and filth, cease to have any deterrent operation whatever. Death is despised as a commonplace matter. The soldier is able to fling his life away like a flower.

In the passing of war will there pass away also that hardy type of character which war develops?

Certainly there is no call so urgent today as that for a strenuous mortality. Our morality is in danger of debility through æstheticism. Christ is admired, but men lack the moral energy to lay hold of his ideals and practice them.

In the church, even, we cannot evade the fact that there is a flabbiness of character, a pampered, easy going sentimentalism where a vigorous morality is demanded. The reaction against the puritan and the ascetic has left us enervated. The appeal to the heroic is not common in the modern church.

A society fast approaching a peace basis needs a moral substitute for war. If men are not to develop bravery and strenuousness and romance in fighting one another can we discover a pursuit of peace which will carry with it all the heroism and romance, the endurance and consecration, which war involves? We can.

Missions is the moral equivalent of war.

It is the biggest enterprise in the world. The end it sets out to attain is the most daring conception the mind of man ever entertained. The methods by which it hopes to reach this goal are more complex, involving a higher order of strategy, than any military campaign of Alexander or Von Moltke. It lays under tribute every sort of resource in the social order and the personal life.

Conceived in its true proportions and inherent dignity the missionary enterprise is nothing less than the moral incarnation of the war spirit.

Missions, like war, captivates the imagination.

It is a vast and complex program, calling into play every faculty of the mind. It calls for wide vision, laying under tribute the best statesmanship of the church. The naive conception of missions, the one we received as children and which the funny papers still perpetuate in the picture of a clergyman in a frock coat and white tie standing under a cocoanut tree reading out of the Bible to a group of cannibals—this conception is very well to begin with as children, but it must be abandoned when we become men.

Missions includes world politics. It involves a grasp of economic and industrial conditions. The misionary is working with social forces as well as personal. His purpose is not simply to make individual converts but ultimately to reconstruct heathen society. His map of the world shows the streams of industry and politics and social customs with which he must reckon, either by taking advantage of them or by re-directing them.

No scholarship is superfluous in this gigantic and complex task. Our missionaries are among our best educated class of men and women. They establish hospitals and schools of the best type our money will allow.

Missions is the educational enterprise, the social enterprise, the political enterprise, the moral enterprise all rolled into one. It is human life in all its variety and complexness. To approach the problem of human welfare in the missionary spirit is to find oneself in the midst of the most thrilling campaign that was ever waged.

Missions, like war, develops heroism.

The consummate flower of Christian character grows upon the mission field. Since St. John's death no man more like him has appeared than John G. Paton, the hero of the New Hebrides. Where in the records of military heroism can be found such a story as that of Dr. Susie Rijnhart, the first missionary to Thibet? While he yet lives among us and speaks to us will we have discernment to recognize that Dr. Royal J. Dye is building his heroism into the Africa of the future? Or must we wait until his work is ended before we shall know that in him we have the kind of greatness that goes into history?

But the heroism of missions, like that of warfare, is exhibited at home as well as at the front. Parents who yield up their children to go to the ends of the earth for Christ's sake and the gospel's are among those who drink of the cup of the Lord's sufferings. Ten thousand instances of self-sacrifice in giving money to support the missionary cause often disclose a heroism in those who send equal to that of those who go.

Missions, like war, demands and secures a unified organization.

In war times all small partisanship fades out. Petty differences are laid aside. The flag belongs to all. All are compatriots, no matter what their party affiliations. The sense of brotherhood grows as men together face a common enemy.

Similarly the missionary enterprise is bringing Christ's divided hosts together. Sectarianism is almost nil on the foreign field. The differences over which we quarrel at home are despicably irrelevant to those who face the blackness of heathenism. And as the whole church comes to see that its essential business in the world is the missionary business it is becoming ashamed of its divisions and drawing closer into unity.

Missions, like war, demands absolute obedience.

The first duty of the soldier is to obey. It is not given him to reason why;

"His but to do and die."

Missions is organized upon the authority of our Leader. Christ has left us his imperative. Not his words only but his spirit is compulsory. Our Commander stands on little Bethany's hill, his campaign perfectly mapped out, and calls his soldiers to him. Ye are to be my witnesses to all mankind, he tells them. "Go ye therefore and preach my gospel to all nations."

War is now declared. The battle is on. The Leader is with us. The mightiest victory of the campaign of centuries is about to be won.

Is there a church among us that can falter? Is there a preacher who can face God if he lets the month of March go by without rallying his people to the conflict?

Such a church, such a preacher, would deserve the unmeasured scorn with which Henry IV greeted the tardy Crillon after a great victory had been gained:

"Go hang yourself, brave Crillon!
We fought at Arques
And you were not there."

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE PRESS THE SEARCHLIGHT OF CIVILIZATION

Turkey cannot get paper enough to print her new journals on. Persia has twenty-five papers where she had none, aside from three or four duly censorized, four years ago. China not only loads all available presses down with day and night work, but has even developed the "yellow journals." The old Dowager sliced up a few over ardent editors who took her sanction of the printing press too lightly and printed some criticisms of her policies, but there is practically no censorship longer. Here is the guarantee of the future of the new era in these lands. The newspaper lets in the light. It furnishes things to think about and so sets men thinking. Russia's greatest need is a reading peasantry and papers for them to read that dare print the facts, for Russia can never be free until there is a mass movement to overcome the "government by assassination" and the rule of the Cossack. The autocracy keeps the Duma because Russia needs loans. Without the Duma no nation will loan to her. She must needs keep the Duma because the people will arise in their might if they have not a parliament, ere she can be free.

THE MAN BEHIND THE PLOW

When an orator in the House of Representatives referred to the farmer the other day as the man who fed the nation and upon whom we all depended, and said he had no lobby in halls of state but trusted the men he sent there, but that he was least considered, his remarks received great applause.

The Commission on Country Life make some salient recommendations in their recently presented report. They believe the immediate needs of the farmers are, (1) effective coöperation that will put them on a level with the organized interests with which they do business, (2) schools in the country that will fit them for country life and give them outdoor instruction as well as indoor, and prepare them for country instead of, as at present, for city life, and (3) good roads and a parcels post, which they are with good right everywhere demanding.

It may be here noted that the Farmers' Grain Dealers' Association, representing 250 coöperative associations and 50,000 farmers in five states, recently met at Sioux City and reported great success in their enterprise. This interstate association owns a great drain tile factory at Mason City. This is evidence that they are developing true coöperating capacity.

ENFANTS TERRIBLES

After the war of the sixties was over the doctrine of protection for infant industries maintained the high tariff duties that had been fixed for war purposes. They have been both lowered and raised since, but always on the plea of protection for infant industries. Tariff revision is to be the task of the hour under the incoming administration. Some of these "infants" seem to have become formidable. Indeed the cry of the hour is that they are "terrible." The question is whether or not they have become so lusty as to prevent the removal of their pap.

The "sound doctrine" of tariff protection is that the cost of labor abroad is so much less than at home that there must be a tariff great enough to cover the difference. The cry of the tariff reformer is that the duty as levied is greater than the difference in labor cost and that it has not only done all required of it, but under the specious plea of helping the toiler has possessed the land of his protector.

The Congressional Record recently contained a table that is very enlightening to the layman. It is compiled from United States Census returns by a Mr. Miles of Racine, Wis. Mr. Miles is a manufacturer, a protectionist, and member of the party of protectionist principles. Here is what he shows.

The Brass Trust enjoys a protective duty of 45% while the labor cost of its product is but 17%. The Sugar Trust spends 3% of the cost of its product on labor, but is "protected" by a 50% duty. The Linseed Oil Trust spends the same as sugar for labor and is safely behind a wall of 72%. The woolen industries pay 18% to labor and their weak arms are saved the battle of the world by duties ranging from 55 to 135%. The two greatest of the great, the mightiest industrial organizations in the history of the world, deserve separate paragraphs.

The Steel Trust. The cost of labor in producing the finished product, from the mine to the warehouse, averages 25% of the selling price. The duty is 40% on pig iron and 29% on steel rails. The tax which protects their other products runs from 8 to 65%. Manifestly if the whole labor cost is but 25% it cannot require 29 and 40% to cover the difference between cheap foreign labor and well paid American labor. And the further fact that this trust sells as much as $8,000,000 worth of steel rails abroad in a year, and at considerable less than they charge us at home, is frank confession that they can compete with the world, and that our "protection" simply imposes the higher price upon ourselves.

Standard Oil. This "Mother of Trusts" has been cited as an example in the contention that the traiff did not create the trust. It was said there was no duty on oil. This is true and yet nothing could be more untrue. There is a duty of 99% on oil from any country that protects its own oil fields from our (i. e. Standard) exportations. Russia is the only competing producer of consequence. Thus there is no tariff where there is no competitor. This is of great benefit to American workingmen.

Now Standard Oil derives its power, not from owning all the fields, but by its refining business. Crude oil must be refined and the Standard, as we find ourselves, must refine the most of it. All prices thus are more or less in the hands of the monopoly of refining. It both names the buying and the selling price. The means by which this is maintained are not for explanation here, but the facts everyone acknowledges quite as sensibly as he acknowledges that the sun has a monopoly in the lighting of this mortal sphere.

So it matters less about the duty on crude than on refined oil. Here our Uncle Sam levies a tax of 7% on all competitors who come to the gates with their cause. The cost of labor in oil refining is but 6%. Manifestly that 7%, insignificant as it seems, is sufficient, for it covers, not alone the difference between cheap Russian labor and well-paid American labor, but both the difference, and the entire cost of the labor needed, and a safe margin beyond both. Then Standard sells 45% of all its product abroad and thus, while protected in its own domain, does bold battle with the oil cans unto the uttermost parts of the earth and asks no aid of any other nation.

Summing up the case Mr. Miles says: "Invariably these trusts charge the home consumer from 15 to 25 and sometimes 60%, more than their foreign customers" and charges that the tariff is added to the actual cost here at home.

CORN STALK PAPER

While we are discussing the devastation of our forests an interesting discovery is made by the scientists of the agricultural department and one that bids fair to do much for the solution of the problem. The paper mills are the voracious mouths that eat up the forests. The climes of the earth and the shores of the seas have been searched to find some grass or other fibrous substance that would take the place of wood pulp. Then, as often, it is found right at our door.

Dr. Galloway, whose industry and honesty were accorded a loud round of applause in congress the other day, told the agricultural committee of the House of the new find. He says it is no novelty merely but that it has been practically demonstrated. Corn stalks will make all kinds of paper from the finest vellum to tissue paper. It can afford to pay five dollars per ton for the stalks and will leave the glucose and protein in them, uninjured for the feeding of stock, and thus they will be worth five dollars per ton to the feeder after they have gone through the factory process. This means a new asset to the farmer as well as a great saving to the forests and perhaps cheaper paper as well. It may be added that the claim is also made that cotton stalks will do as well as those of the corn. A mixture of the corn stalk fiber with that of the cheapest woods also makes them usable. Every expert called by the committee corroborated Dr. Galloway's testimony.

Religious Matters in Mexico

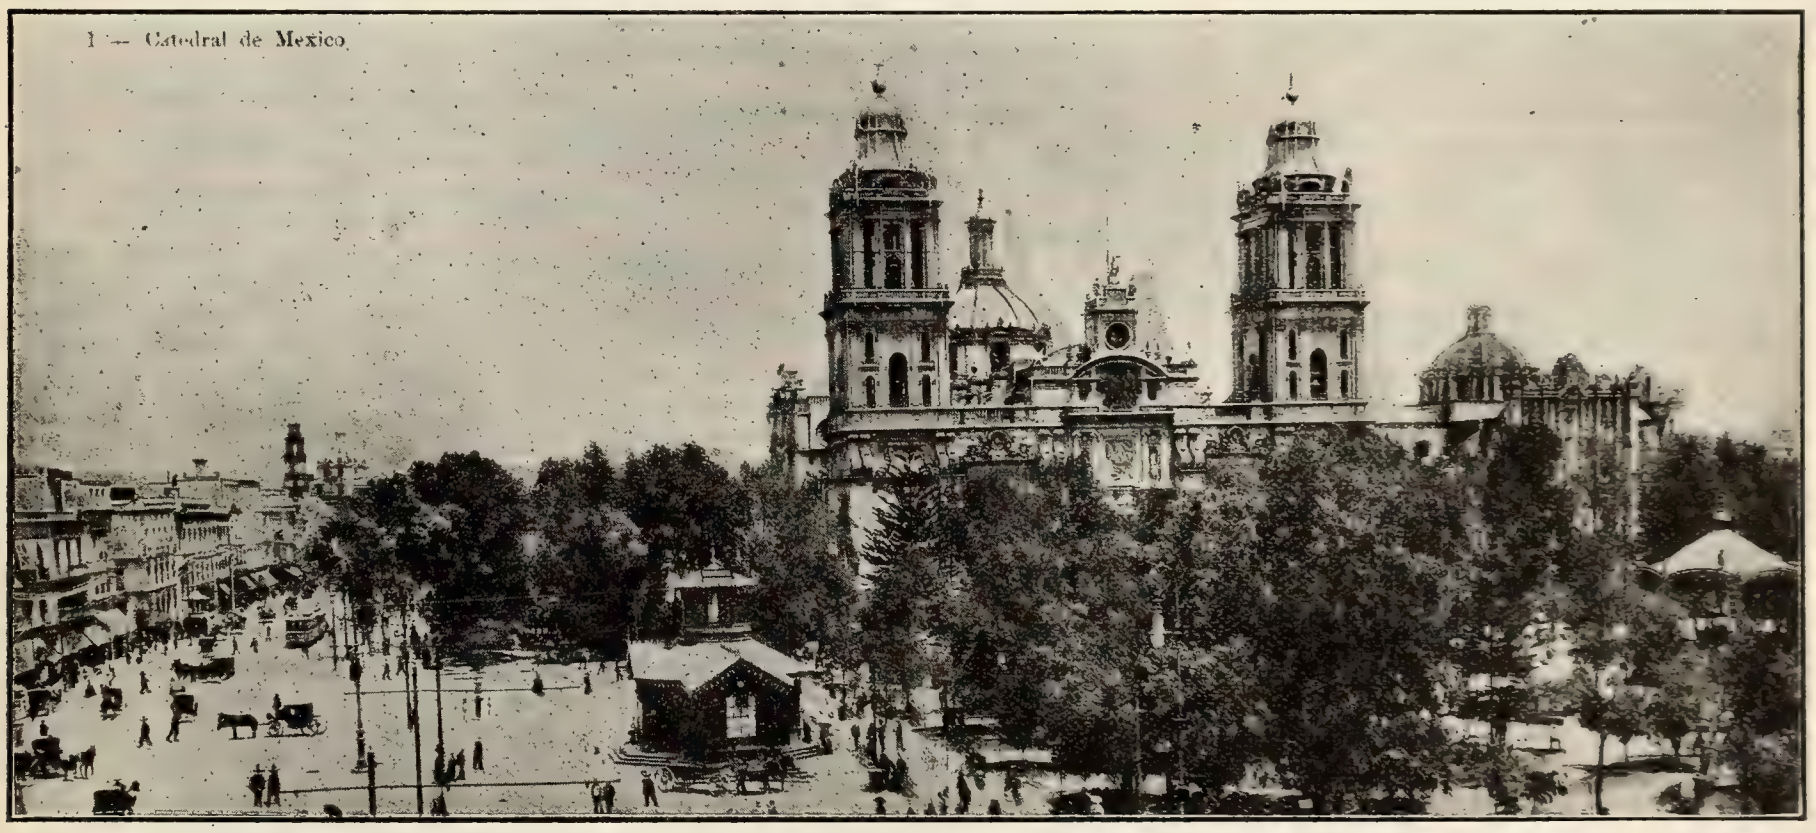
A Peculiar Situation—The Church Outlawed but in Possession—Christian and Pagan—Points of Improvement—Relics of Barbarism

BY. J. A. ADAMS

The religious situation in Mexico is peculiar. The Catholic Church is outlawed, but it is there. Officially the authorities are opposed to it; but individually and personally they bow to it. Many of the upper classes are said to be agnostics while they live, but Catholics when they die. Intellectual rejection and superstitious acceptance play fantastic tricks with one another in the same mind. The Cathedrals were taken away from the church, but the churches used them. Monasteries are forbidden, "but we have them," said a priest to me with a smile. Under the famous "Reform Laws" Jesuits, sisters of charity and other secret religious orders were expelled, but they are all there. Clerical dress on the streets and religious processions outside of church walls are prohibited, but shop windows are full of crucifixes, beads, candles and all the other paraphernalia of ecclesiastical performance. Church bells are "not permitted" to be rung except at hours of service, and yet during our three days' stay at Cordova the Cathedral bell rang hundreds of times. The frenzy with which it broke into its evening chimes was startling. The first time it swung off I thought it must be a fire alarm.

The constitution is declared more Protestant than that of our own country, and yet within thirty years of Protestant missions thirty-eight martyrs have paid for their faith with their blood, Methodist missions alone losing twenty-nine of their people through the violence of fanaticism. By the same constitution the door is open to the Bible and yet high missionary authorities say that "the Bible is still a prohibited book."

We repeat, the situation is peculiar. Catholicism has been hit over the head, and yet the whole country is clinging to its skirts. Indulgences are still sold, the lips of the people are still at the ears of the priest in the confessional, and clerical guards still keep the gates to heaven.



Catholicism a mixture.

Catholicism itself is peculiar. Grafted upon the old Aztec religion by the violent and bloody hand of Cortez and with roots reaching still further down into the worship of the Toltecs, it is a strange mixture of Christian symbols and idolatries of a thousand years ago. That many of the adherents of the church are pagan worshipers under the name of Catholics seems clear. Their knees bow before the altars of the cathedrals but their hearts are in the temples of their ancestors. The images of Christ and of the saints before which they cross themselves are little more than substitutes for the idols which fill the corners of the Museum. Even Catholics themselves have admitted this. The wife of the first Spanish minister to the Republic was a devout Catholic and her zealous soul was troubled at what she discovered. "The cross was planted here in a congenial soil," she said, "but the statues of the divinities frequently did no more than change their names from those of heathen gods to Christian saints, and the poor Indian bows before visible representations of saints and virgins as he did in former days before the monstrous shapes representing the unseen powers of the air, the earth and the water." A special missioner from Rome is known to have made the admission that "the Mexicans are not Christians; to them the Virgin of Guadalupe comes first, Hidalgo, the martyr priest and patriot second, and Jesus Christ third."

Some Solid Reforms.

But anomalous as the present situation seems to an American, it is undoubtedly a great improvement over the condition which prevailed before the adoption of the Reform Laws in 1857. Mexicans can live under present conditions; they can marry and be given in marriage, and the church no longer owns the greater part of their property and all their souls. Under the old conditions the priests held them up while living and took another grip on them when they died. They were taught that without "extreme unction" they could not go to heaven, and if the dying man had desirable property he was denied the last sacrament until he made over a good share to the church. Marriage ceremonies cost so heavily that only the well to do could afford them; others entered into "a contract." All the functions or sacraments of religion were made lucrative means of heaping up wealth for the church and its orders. The cities and towns were filled with costly cathedrals, with convents and monasteries, while the people lived in huts. One convent in Mexico City covered four blocks. The interior of the great temples of worship were decorated with gold leaf, and altars were sometimes surrounded by elaborate railing of solid silver. The monks and nuns of the capitol are said at one time to have owned three-fourths of the private houses in the city and to have had immense holdings in the country. The whole amount of property in possession of the ecclesiastics has been estimated at $300,000,000, with an annual revenue of $30,000,000.

It was during the administration of Comonfort in 1856 and '57 that the movement to relieve the church of this heavy burden upon its piety took the form of a new constitution, but the credit for the reform is more commonly given to Benito Juarez. Juarez was one of the fifty presidents which Mexico had in less than forty years. He was of pure Indian blood, and began at the foot of the ladder, but Secretary William H. Seward pronounced him the greatest man that he had ever met. Undoubtedly he did a great thing when he compelled the church which had been exploiting the Mexican people for three hundred years and more to disgorge and to give the little man in the big straw hat and bare feet a chance to have a marriage ceremony, and the rich man the privilege of dying without mortgaging all his property for a pass at the celestial gate.

The Cathedral—Mexico City.

The Government Helped by its Debts.

In this bold and radical movement against an establishment which practically numbered the whole population as its adherents, the authorities were materially assisted by the almost hopeless indebtedness of the government. Like other Latin countries, the Mexican government had an army filled with generals and colonels, and it was badly behind on their salaries. To square up the government gave the officers church property. The generals and colonels who had been whistling for their back pay liked the arrangement and their adhesion to the new order of things was made solid. No man bleeds and dies to put down his claim to his own property.

By permitting the church to use the cathedrals and chapels for worship, ecclesiastical opposition was somewhat allayed. But relations between the state and the church are badly strained, and Mexico is winking at much in practice which it forbids by law. Should the man of brains and iron who now rules the country be followed by a weakling this anamalous condition might contribute to disaster.

Sunday a Holiday.

Sunday is a holiday in Mexico. It is true that there are many worshipers in the leading cathedrals, men and women kneeling on cold floors, or sitting on long hard benches while a well fed priest stands under the sounding board of an elevated box called a pulpit and delivers his message; but the mass of the people are on the streets or in the parks. Their passionate fondness for music is gratified by brass bands which begin soon after breakfast to play in the parks and keep it up throughout the day. A multitude of people gather around the stand in the main plaza in front of the great cathedral, while another throng is attracted to the Alameda, where the famous Mexican Band can be heard on any Sunday.

A Relic of Barbarism.

In the afternoon there is a bull fight, and then comes the carriage parade on the principal thoroughfare, in which everybody that can afford a vehicle, or likes the admiration of the staring crowd, takes part. The bull fight which took place the first Sunday of our stay in the city proved irresistible to a large part of the American visitors. It was a benefit performance, for the earthquake sufferers in Italy, and the papers announced that President Diaz and all his cabinet and the brilliant corps of diplomats who draw salaries and accommodate visitors with passes would be there. It was also announced that the bulls would be more distinguished than usual, and that they might even show a disposition to fight. With the threefold attraction of the President of the Republic, the distinguished diplomats and the distinguished bulls, numerous American church members, being in a far country, yielded to curiosity and spent their substance on the show. I am not counting it any special act of heroic self-denial that I stayed away, for after attending mass at nine o'clock and hearing a fine sermon by a young preacher in the Presbyterian church at eleven o'clock, the principles which I had brought across the Rio Grande were sufficiently re-inforced to resist an attact of the devil in cloven foot and horns.

Brutal but Grotesque.

I should also say from the information which sifted into my mind, that there is about as much attraction in a Mexican bull fight as there is in a butcher shop. The alleged fight consists in killing from six to eight horses and the same number of bulls. The bulls kill the horses and the two-legged brutes kill the bulls. There is no fight about it. The picadors and matadors are not in half so much danger from the bulls as I am from automobiles when I cross a South side boulevard on my way home in the evening. There would be more fairness in the game if "machines" were sent flying around the ring and the matadors had to dodge them or spear the chauffeurs. When complaint was made that the killing of the horses was cruelty to animals, the newspapers replied that the horses selected were old, or broken down and worthless, and that a favor was conferred upon them when they were decorated with ribbons and relieved of their miserable existence by a handsome bull. Unfortunately the horses cannot express their opinion about the matter.

The bulls are said to be comparatively harmless until goaded into indignation by darts and other mean devices of their tormentors. But the sight of blood has been fascinating to the Latin race from the days of old Rome until now, and the throng of Spanish-Mexicans who crowd into the big amphitheatre are said to go wild over those absurd performances.

The Present Crisis

By W. L. Hayden

A lengthy article recently appeared in one of our leading papers that directs attention to the centennial and the present crisis. The identity of the writer is discreetly concealed by an assumed title of dignity to add influence that is unmerited and to shield him from the abuse which is invited by his tirade. There is no discussion of principles but a liberal use of offensive personalities, strange contradictions, gratuitous flings and inexcusable misrepresentations. It clearly illustrates and strongly emphasizes the necessity for fuller information on the subjects involved.

What then is the present crisis? It is simply this: Shall the brotherhood acquiesce in the action of the committee, appointed by as representative an assembly as the Disciples can convene, in their appointments on the centennial program? Or shall they refuse acquiescence in the well considered action of their committee and cause division?

Protest is made against certain appointees who are representatives of a group of scholarly and able men in our ministry and colleges. A bitter controversy has thus arisen which involves loyalty to the word of God that requires "all of you to be subject one to another" in just such a matter in which "our distinctive plea" demands liberty of opinion.

The denial of a rightful place on the centennial program to such a man as Bro. H. L. Willett and others of like views on the ground alleged, is a surrender to the very tyranny of opinionism against which A. Campbell so mightily fought during his whole life.

The fact is Campbell himself might be denied a place on the program if he were living today on precisely the same ground which Willett et al. are opposed by our misinformed protestants.

Bro. H. L. Willett is of Disciple parentage, was reared in a Disciple home, graduated from Bethany College, has been a preacher among the Disciples for over a quarter of a century. His character is unimpeached, his ability is unquestioned, his scholarship is of high rank among scholars of this generation, and doubtless he would deliver an address which the brotherhood of all shades of opinion will be delighted with and proud of as a representative address. He has expressed some views on some phases of the Old Testament that many of us, Disciples, do not agree with. But I have heard him on the devotional materials of the Old Testament, and never heard that address equaled by any man on that theme. No honest man can hear that address and not be convinced that Bro. H. L. Willett is a devout student of the Hebrew scriptures, a firm believer in them as containing the word of God and unfolding, in their history and prophecy, the great purpose of God in the redemption of our race through his son, our divine Saviour.

If such a man has no rightful place among the Disciples and is not worthy to appear on our centennial platform, the restoration movement is a colossal fraud.

Our fathers were sad when their broad principles resulted in 1830 in an appearing brotherhood—"a denomination among denominations"—and their intelligent and loyal children should rejoice to become "a disappearing brotherhood" that they may reappear as recognized leaders among the redeemed hosts of the Lord in bringing the Christian bodies of this century into a reunited Christendom.

They too will be saddened, if our centennial shall reveal us to the world as "a disappearing brotherhood" shrivelling into a narrow sect among sects.

Another dreadful danger looms large before the excited imagination of ill-informed brethren, as a half-witted youth once saw a mullen stock in the twilight and swore it was the devil. That terrible Campbell Institute is imagined to be a hot-bed of heresy in which self-conceited youths are sowing the seed of destructive criticism and from which they are distributing the thriving plants among the churches wherever they gain access to pulpits. This is utterly untrue. Let us take a square, honest look at this "horrible thing."

An organization is effected, composed of a membership who have completed a college course in some university of first rank, leading to the B. D. or Ph. D. degree, or have spent at least two years in such graduate study. Its purpose is to encourage and keep alive a scholarly spirit and to enable its members to help each other to a riper scholarship by a free discussion of vital problems; to promote quiet self-culture and the development of a higher spirituality among the members and among the churches with which they shall come in contact, and to encourage productive work with a view to making contributions of permanent value to the literature and thought of the Disciples of Christ. It is called the Campbell Institute in honor of the great man who is the acknoledged leader in the movement with which the members are identified by firm conviction and to the advancement of which they have devoted their lives and their best efforts.

These are worthy purposes and these scholarly men have a perfect right to enter into such a society of congenial and helpful fellowship if they choose to do so. Their titular degrees are the testimony of their respective institutions of learning that their honors are merited.

Titles are not evidences of pride and self-sufficiency nor does absence of titles evince modesty or efficiency.

If some young men make an offensive display of learning or publish some things that are logically or theologically unsound and philosophically off base, older and wiser men should treat them kindly, point out their mistakes and give them time to correct their errors and stand erect on the solid rock of truth. If they have the true scholarly spirit they will thus be saved for usefulness in the cause which is nearest their hearts.

Such an organization is an excellent clearing house in the world's commerce of ideas, where there may be a balancing of accounts by free discussion without precipitating a crisis in our democracy or a panic in our churches.

Adapting Pitt's reply to Walpole: "The atrocious crime of being young men which venerable gentlemen have with such spirit and decency charged upon them, they will neither attempt to palliate nor deny, but content themselves with wishing that they may be of those whose follies may cease with their youth and not of that number who are ignorant in spite of experience."

It is a grievous sin to malign and attempt to boycott one hundred well-equipped Christian men who cannot be overmatched by any other hundred men of equal age in the brotherhood. Some of them are offered pulpits in other Christian bodies with salaries double what they are receiving. Their consciences hold them where they are. Less conscientious men have accepted such offers. Others will be compelled to seek pulpits among worthier representatives of "our plea," if this ungodly persecution does not cease.

This hunting heresy is not limited to members of the Campbell Institute. Every university trained minister, or other modernly equipped man is marked. Keen-scented sleuths are put on his track and baying hounds sound the alarm. Church officials sit up and take notice. Good and cultured men are shunned only because false reports are sent abroad and self-appointed guardians of the faith sanction them without hearing the accused parties and learning the truth.

Bro. E. M. Todd is an instance of this flagrant injustice. He too is of Disciple parentage, nurtured in a Disciple home, educated in Disciple institutions of learning, has had valuable experience in old England and is a worthy son of a noble sire.

Yet he is disparaged, belittled and denounced by these know it smalls, who conceal their individuality to avoid their just rebuke who draw on their imagination for facts and assert what they do not know to be true and some of us who know the Manchester situation know to be unjust. And all this for no other reason than that he delivered an address by request on Sanity in Evangelism that was in excellent spirit and without censoriousness. That address was able, discriminating, sane and just, except a few statements were a little overdrawn. These statements stirred the opposition of some evangelists who hastened to manifest that they were hit in a tender place and so confirmed the truth of the criticism. This suicidal attempt to hamper and drive out of our pulpits such well furnished men of God from our own families or other homes is a heinous sin against God and righteousness and treason against our restoration movement. The Disciples of Christ need only to know the truth on this matter and they will unitedly stand against any such crime by whomsoever it may be aided or abetted. If successful, this ruinous policy of discouraging and driving out our bright young men for no other reason than the exercise of their right to use the faculties that God has given them in an open-minded search for truth and the right of opinion on subjects which do not weaken their faith in Jesus Christ as the Son of God, will bring certain destruction to the movement which dates its rise from the publication of the declaration and address of Thomas Campbell in 1809.

"Christ in Modern Life"

By Earle M. Todd

What do we mean by "Christ in modern life"? Does the phrase stand for a fact, or for a mere pious sentiment? Is Christ in modern life in any real sense? or is the phrase the exclusive property of the mystic and the poet? The writer recently listened to a paper on the subject before a body of ministers, in which the author poured scorn upon Mr. W. T. Stead for writing about "If Christ Came to Chicago,"—Christ, said he, is in Chicago; he has never been absent from Chicago. And he attempted to make his statement quite lucid by saying that He was here, not mystically, nor figuratively, but really. But the ministers present, who were practical men, did not seem to be equally enlightened, or to find much reality in such phrases.

Or, again, we may ask, what did Paul mean when he declared that the church is the body of Christ? Are we here again in the sphere of pure mysticism? Or is there here a profoundly significant fact? The phrase has its traditional interpretation among the Disciples; it is a figure of speech which teaches that the church is in subjection to Christ as the body is to the head, and from which may be drawn as a corollary the lesson of unity in diversity. But has the phrase significance merely for the doctrinaire?

No; it has practical significance as well, as does also the expression, "Christ in modern life." The two phrases are, in fact, mutually interpretative. Christ is in the world today in so far, and only so far, as the church, his body, is indwelt by his spirit. The things that Christ accomplishes in the world today are accomplished not by miracle nor by mystery, but by means of flesh and blood hands and feet and tongues, just as he did nineteen centuries ago.

The writer of these lines has this week been attending the sessions of the great convention of the Religious Education Association in Chicago. The one theme of the 118 addresses given in the various general sessions and departmental meetings was "Religious Education and Social Duty," and the thought, iterated and reiterated until it became a commonplace, was that the function of all education, whether from the pulpit or the professor's chair, by the church or by the state, in day school, Sunday-school or young people's organizations of various kinds, is to fit men and women for social service. More and more it is forcing itself upon our attention that the whole function of the church is to be hands and feet and tongue and heart for Christ. In the days of his flesh Jesus sought but little to influence the beliefs of men. So that they believed themselves to be God's children he was satisfied, the rest would take care of itself; their beliefs would adjust themselves to their practice. Jesus was interested supremely in social service. And he would say to every man and woman today, who wishes to live the Christ life, "Stand in your place and lift." And those who do stand in their places and lift are members of the body of Christ; in them Christ is anew incarnate and present in modern life. Men and women must still be loved back into the right way. There is no other way in the universe to save the lost. Preaching cannot do it, teaching cannot do it, denunciation and threatenings cannot do it,—only love can do it. The love of God up in heaven cannot do it; it must be human love —the love of God finding a channel in the human hearts, as it does in the heart of Jesus. Men and women must still be gone after; and they must still be taken by the hand and lifted up. The function of the church is to supply, not merely a pulpit, nor a "plan of salvation," nor a high and mighty testimony by which it "washes its hands of the blood of all men"; but real flesh and blood bodies, indwelt by his spirit that so he may actually lift the burden off of men's shoulders and build the temple of humanity.

Is Christ present in modern life? Yes, and no. Yes, because the church is in a very real sense inspired by His spirit and the instrument of His will. But what a poor blind, deaf, paralyzed body it is! The paralysis of the church is one of the outstanding facts of our day. It is almost blasphemy to call it the body of Christ. And it is manifest that, if we are to identify the body of Christ with the church, and make the church the organ through which His presence in modern life manifests itself, we must re-define the term church: it must be so defined as to include all who have His spirit and are laboring for the redemption of humanity.

Earle M. Todd

Christ will have come "again," "in glory," when the church, which is His body, shall have become completely the organ of His will and the instrument of His redemptive power.

Congress for 1909 Postponed

The Disciples of Christ will not hold their regular annual congress this year. This is the decision of the committee after thoughtful canvass of the situation. The date of the congress is generally about the last of March or early in April. The Disciples held a joint congress with the Baptists and Free Baptists in Chicago last November. To hold another congress in March or April would bring three meetings for those who attend within the period of twelve months. The item of expense of travel alone makes it undesirable to hold another meeting so soon. Furthermore the majority of our state conventions and ministerial institutes come in the spring or summer, the brethren will attend these. But the chief consideration determining this decision of the committee was the Centennial Celebration at Pittsburg. The face of the brotherhood is turned toward Pittsburg and your committee felt that the interests of our Zion demand that every minister should go to Pittsburg. We would not lay any unnecessary burdens upon our brethren and in our judgment three congresses within the period of twelve months would be an unnecessary expense, however profitable the discussions of the congress might be. A committee was appointed at Chicago to confer with a similar committee from the Baptists upon the proposition for a permanent joint congress of Baptists and Disciples. This committee is to report to our congress and our action upon their report will be submitted to the annual Baptist congress at Pittsburg. Then our answer to the overture from the Baptists will be submitted to them at their annual meeting in November. This course will, we believe, serve all the interests of our cause better than to have a congress meeting this year. In this decision your committee was unanimous. Now let us all pull together for the greatest religious gathering of modern times at Pittsburg in this year of Grace 1909. On behalf of the executive committee of the Congress of the Disciples of Christ.

A New Gateway to Panama

By Louis H. Stine

Pastor Central Christian Church, Gulfport, Miss.

Gulfport, a new seaport on the Mississippi coast, land-locked and storm-proof, the largest lumber exporting point on the Gulf of Mexico, is a thrifty city of more than 10,000 population and is doing business in handsome brick and stone buildings and living in beautiful homes that line broad streets and wide avenues. A commodious government building has been promised the city. Street improvements are in course of construction at a cost of more than $100,000.

In this city of brilliant outlook, we have a vigorous young church, harmonious, hopeful and persistent, that is fearlessly facing a great future. Owing to the industrial and commercial importance of this city and to the millions of money that have been expended on its deep water harbor, the only deep water haven for ships of all nations to line up at a mile long pier by their own steam aided only by a pilot, and to receive their cargoes of lumber, resin, turpentine and cotton from trains of cars that run alongside, and while Gulfport is the natural gateway to the Isthmus of Panama and to all countries that will be reached by that canal as well as to all South American countries, there will be a continuous influx of people to this section and it is reasonable to suppose that among them will be many members of the Christian Church.

The two trunk lines already here and other lines definitely projected to this city as a terminus and the millions of dollars invested in factories, mills, carshops, elevators, public buildings, business enterprises, hotels, electric power plants and such public works as sewer system and water works will raise the expectation, near and far, of still greater industrial and commercial growth for Gulfport than in the past. Disciples of Christ elsewhere will share in this increasing expectation.

To this land of oranges, lemons, strawberries, sugar cane, grape-fruit, corn, rice, oats, grapes cotton, every known variety of vegetable, pecan nuts paying from a ten-year-old grove $200 to $250 per acre, plums, figs paying $90 per acre at three years, magnolias, palms, oleanders, japonicas, roses that never stop blooming, balmy breezes, equable temperature, live oaks draped in their heavy curtains of long-moss that line this coast, and a soil of sandy loam underlaid with clay from which an industrious man can raise three crops a year, to this land of possibility and to this city of opportunity the writer feels confident that many of our own people will come.

The location of Disciples of Christ in this city is in the direct interest of the patriotism of the gospel; for it is an evangelistic necessity that at this gateway to the South where people of every nation are coming, a church should be found that is established on the basis of the simple teaching, spirit and service of Christ and is free from a confused mass of encumbering tradition and authoritative dogma. The imperative need of Gulfport is a church whose creed is Christ and whose plea for Christian unity is that of the fathers.

The writer has a favor to ask of our church people living north, east and west of this section to kindly report to him the names of Disciples, of friends of our church who may come to this coast, either at Biloxi, Mississippi City, Long Beach, or Pass Christian, as a scenic trolley system connects all these places with Gulfport, and in this way they can render him valuable assistance at the insignificant cost of a postal card.

Texas Christian Lectureship

By J. C. Mason

The Texas Christian Lectureship was held in the hall of Texas Christian University, February 1-4 inclusive. It was more largely attended this year than for two years past.

H. L. Calhoun was the chief lecturer. He handles themes on the line of criticism and apologetics with ease, fairness and a dignity that compelled respect. Calhoun is easily a master of assemblies and as such rounded off the rough corners of controversies on the subjects that all parties seemed well pleased with his positions. Dr. Lockhart reviewed him in one address in a clear cogent and forceful way which delighted his hearers. It was evident that he intended to give the facts impartially as far as they have been brought out by investigation and to frankly admit the fact that a number of things were yet to be learned on the subject of criticism. He was conservative and confident without being dogmatic and more than ever endeared himself to his many friends in Texas.

One of the best papers of the Lectureship was by W. T. Hilton, pastor of the Central Church at Greenville, on Our Church Polity. Bro. Hilton had evidently given a great deal of thought to the preparation of his paper. It was a timely and well delivered address and was well received by the convention. This paper was referred to C. M. Schoonover, of Bonham, to review, which indicated that the paper had been carefully studied and really brought out some points of criticism which were considered well taken. The writer called attention to the fact that while the paper was excellent it was incomplete in that it gave no attention to the committee feature of church government as revealed in the New Testament, see Acts 6: 1-8 and other Scriptures. He called attention to the fact that Paul and others constituted a committee to bear the contributions of the different churches to the poor saints at Jerusalem and that in the New Testament time and at the present time the churches use committees in many different ways and claim that since we had New Testament precedent for such committees, it was a mistake to concede that the authority for such rested simply with expediency.

Dr. Addison Clark had a very thoughtful and helpful paper on the subject of "The Legal and Moral Effects of Our Plea." This paper was reviewed in an able manner by E. L. Crystal, pastor of the Central Christian Church in Waco.

A goodly number of us thought that the program committee made a mistake by placing on the program Rabbi Isidor Warsaw of Waco, for an address on, "The Temple and the Synagogue." He is as he claimed to be a representative of the modern Jewish thought, which rejects the Bible as revelation, denies the personality of God, claims that all things are as they have been from the beginning and that it is the duty of men to so teach and conduct themselves as to raise the standard of humanity in order that men may be happy. The lecture was really a mixture of Atheism, Agnosticism, and Pantheism, left man without any information as to his origin, or any hope of immorality. This address was heard by the entire student body of the school and was couched in beautiful language and delivered with a kind cocksureness of the average man who boasts that he does not know.

There were other excellent papers in the lectureship which cannot be mentioned.

The Lectureship was preceded by a two days' mission rally which was very enjoyable and helpful.

One of the best papers of this rally was delivered by C. G. Brelos, who is now located at Galveston and who gave us stirring facts with reference to the influx of foreign population to our state and country, through Galveston port. He called attention to the fact that as the foreigner landed there were one hundred saloons open to receive him and debauch him while there was just one place supported by the church to give him welcome or directions. Here are facts of tremendous importance which ought to stir our brotherhood to the heart until the saloons are wiped from the map of our country and the church is prepared to receive these men from other countries with Christian design.

The writer recently spent fifteen days in Monterey, Mexico, preaching fifteen times. The mission of the C. W. B. M. is progressing. The Mexican school has two hundred and fifty pupils enrolled, all that they have room for. It was my privilege to speak to these young people once in the school session and once at their Christian Endeavor meeting—both times through an interpreter, and I assure you that I had an appreciative audience.

Bro. Enrique Westrup is pastor of the Mexican Church. He is a bright young man, speaks two or more languages fluently and is doing a great work among his people. He also edits the La Via De Paz which is printed in Spanish. Through the columns of this paper many people in the denominations who are seeking for larger liberty, a simpler faith, and a closer union among Christians have been reached.

I was in a conference where Dr. Brewer, superintendent of the Baptist Missions in the Republic, and two other Baptist ministers were present and Enrique and his father

T. M. Westrup, and J. H. Fuller, president of the school and pastor of the English Speaking Church, were in conference. Dr. Brewer complained that through the paper and otherwise many of the Baptist people had become dissatisfied and he insisted that in as much as the two churches were teaching substantially the same doctrine that there should be no conflict between them. His method of avoiding this conflict was to have our representatives refuse to recognize dissatisfied members of the Baptist Church or give them any encouragement. In other words, he seemed to think that we ought to leave the field to the Baptists. We explained to him that this sort of thing had been going on for years in our own country, also that if we were to leave the field the inquiry for light and liberty would still go on. We proposed, however, to sign a memorial to our respective mission boards and also to the local mission points in Mexico offering to unite on the simple New Testament faith employing a Baptist minister where the churches preferred such, or one of the Disciples where it was preferred, each receiving the members of the other church without question as to their particular views, calling the churches, Churches of Christ and urging them to avoid any unnecessary conflict. To this Dr. Brewer replied, "That would be organic union, I could not encourage that," still we replied, you say we teach substantially the same thing. Your plan would require that we leave the field, with our people and this field orphaned so far as oversight and encouragement are concerned. It would mean a surrender of our efforts and the Mexican mission field and we assured our brother as much as we regretted a division, we could surrender only such things as might be without Scriptural ground and must contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints. The Doctor left the conference in an apparent bad humor, threatening to publish to the world what seemed to him an unseemly interference with his field of labor. It is not too much to say that in two years our missionaries have accomplished more in Monterey than any other church has accomplished in thirty years. The preaching by your scribe was attended by the members of the other churches with a larger attendance and interest up to the last. Bro. Leroy Anderson led the singing for these meetings and we are able to give the regulation report, "Closed with the largest attendance during the meeting, left money in the treasury, and called to hold the next meeting." The English speaking church numbers only about thirty-three members. They meet in a room of the college building and are very greatly in need of a chapel. The writer is proposing to be one of ten to give one hundred dollars each toward such building. The C. W. B. M. has a good lot, well located. The members at Monterey have something over two hundred dollars for their building fund and we are now asking for pledges due when a thousand dollars additional shall have been pledged to enable them to build a chapel in which to worship. These pledges may be sent to the writer or to J. H. Fuller, Apartado 236, Monterey, Mexico. We shall have more to say of this at another time.

Southern California Notes

By Grant K. Lewis, Secretary

Business Men's Banquet.

On Friday evening, January 29, the Business Men's League of the Christian churches of Los Angeles gave a banquet in the splendid new Y. M. C. A. building. Mr. P. C. Macfarlane of Kansas City, the National Secretary of the Men's organization, was guest of honor. 150 men prominent in the churches of Southern California sat down to the "feed." Men came in from Pasadena, Long Beach, Covina, Pomona, Rialto, San Diego. Frank Tyrrell, president of the League, introduced J. G. Warren as toastmaster. In a tactful, witty way and with becoming brevity he introduced the toasters.

F. M. Dowling facetiously spoke on "The Modern Order of Aaran and Hur;" Dr. Royal J. Dye in an earnest voice told about "The Long Arm of the Church;" C. C. Chapman emphasized the sterling worth of Christian manhood in response to "The Strong Arm of the Church." Mayor Windham of Long Beach made all face timely duties when he talked concerning "Christian Men in Civic Affairs;" and Mr. Macfarlane gave the address of the evening as he described the present "Layman's Movement" in the great churches of the land and told of the origin, purpose and scope of this new organization for men in our churches to be called "The Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ."

It was a most inspiring occasion. The consciousness and stimulation of a mighty power for good is felt when such a company of business men sit together and look into each other's eyes. It is multiplied ten fold when the sentiments of purposes pent up in each heart find expression in the striking speech of an orator.

It is with pride, joy and hope that California gives the business men's secretary and his work this initial push which faith sees develop into a mighty movement of men in our great Brotherhood.

A. K. Wright, who recently held a meeting at Needles, being asked for a report, sends the following:

"Our meeting at Needles lasted just two weeks. Had three conversions. These were baptised Sunday in the presence of a great crowd as they were the first baptisms ever seen in this desert railroad town of four thousand. Indians and Japanese were present nearly every service. Organization was effected with eighteen members, fifteen women and three men. This band of sisters has worked for years and has a church lot well located and paid for. They are strong in the Lord and the power of His might and are worthy of our love and support.

"Missionaries of the Nazarene Church gave us the use of their neat chapel, charging only electric light expense, and assisted us otherwise. I have not met finer spirits than these missionaries to the Mojave Indians. Needles claims 4,000 population and claims an unusually large percentage of young men, and we ought to by some means aid this new church in securing and maintaining a regular minister."

The Cross of Christ has no truer, braver champions in the world than many home missionaries who are planting the church at great self-sacrifice in this Western country. The Secretary often wishes that he could take the public into confidence and let them read his mail. Here is an excerpt from a recent leter received from one of our missionaries in Arizona: "The raising of back indebtedness in the matter of current expenses was arranged for in December, but nothing tangible was done until after Christmas. Since then all of the back indebtedness amounting to $231.68 has been raised. So the preacher was able to square accounts with the city, having raised the sum of $735 from the church since January, 1908, and the $50 from your Board, making $785. Yet have I been courageous and have not doubted that success must attend our efforts."

We have a preacher who is standing by the guns in a county seat town in Southern California, trying to maintain himself until our Board can find the means to come to his relief. During January he received $36.20 and during December he received $35.40. Unless relief comes soon he cannot hold out long. He and the little church are making a most heroic struggle.

J. W. Maddux recently undertook a meeting at Huntington Beach with T. L. Young. The heavy rains which continued for two weeks compelled the meetings to close, not without results however, in a church greatly edified and two conversions. These heavy rains greatly interfered with a number of meetings and public enterprises.

O. P. Spiegel assisted by Mrs. Princess Long has been fighting for an audience under these adverse circumstances at the Broadway Church. Since the skies have cleared a good hearing favors this meeting and there have been sixteen conversions. The meeting continues.

Dr. Royal J. Dye is among our churches for three weeks and wherever he goes great crowds hang on his every word. Under the financial difficulties of these times he is making splendid progress towards the goal of this centennial year set up by our churches at the Long Beach Convention. The aim is to raise $10,000 for a new station on the Congo. Something like $6,500 has thus far been secured. This reporter does not claim to be exact, but so far as he could learn this money comes from the following sources:

W. H. Watters, Pomona, Cal.	$5000.00
Naomi Ave.	150.00
Pomona	50.00
East Side	45.00
Santa Ana	80.00
West Side	45.00
Magnolia Ave.	500.00
San Diego	300.00
University Heights	50.00
Pasadena	50.00
Covina	40.00
Budlong	15.00

There are other churches yet to be visited and a great down-town rally is planned for next Monday night. The Committee feels confident that the goal will be reached.

Dr. H. O. Breeden has let the warmth of his genial personality expend itself in our environs again. He lectured recently at Magnolia Ave. Church and also at the San Diego, from which he chased himself across the border into Old Mexico and with pastor Crabtree made the quail scarce in that region. He is now in a meeting at Fresno.

Booker Smith, who has been doing special work at Santa Monica Bay is holding a meeting for the church at El Monte.

L. B. Anderson has been compelled on account of illness to relinquish his splendid work with the church at San Jacinto.

E. A. Child has accepted a call to the church at Imperial.

E. D. Chapin has taken up the work at South Figueroa Blvd., Los Angeles.

The C. W. B. M. District Convention at Pasadena was largely attended and $1,000 was pledged for the Japanese work in Los Angeles.

Yesterday was the greatest preachers' meeting in the history of the Southern California work. Some 300 people were in attendance. The occasion was a rally in the interests of the March offering and the enthusiasm ran high.

A. C. Smither gave the forenoon address. It is the third address in the Centennial Series and in this case will be repeated at the Long Beach Convention next August and in Pittsburgh at the Centennial. "The life and work of Alexander Campbell" was the theme. The matter of this thoughtful address showed painstaking research and its manner denoted a skillful hand at literary work. The afternoon program consisted of stirring addresses delivered by the missionaries present. They were Sister and Brother Frost of Hiram; F. E. Hagin and wife of Japan; W. G. Menzies and wife of India; E. S. Stevens and wife of Japan; Brother Enos and wife of The Azores; Calla Harrison and H. H. Guy and wife of Los Angeles, and Dr. Royal J. Dye of Africa.

Thus a great juicy slice of a rich national convention cake was handed out for the delectation of a regular monthly preacher's meeting. All of these meetings are great and every member of our churches in the environs of Los Angeles should remember this regular "red letter day" at the First Church on the first Monday of each month.

Most of the objections to Foreign Missions come from those who either oppose the work or who give nothing for it whatever. Those who know about the work and pray for its success and give for its support, are not the objectors. They are satisfied with their investment. Their one and only regret is, that they can not do more that Christ may be glorified in the conversion of all nations and tongues and peoples.

The Gates of the West

By Burris A. Jenkins

The Men's Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ is fairly launched. Secretary Macfarlane is at his post, here at the Gates of the West, has opened his office in the R. A. Long Building, and the magazine of the movement—"Christian Men"—will be issued henceforth from his headquarters.

The new secretary began his work by keeping the committee the live-long day yesterday, bowed over the table studying the model constitution to be sent forth for the guidance of local brotherhoods. This is the committee appointed at the national convention in New Orleans; and, since Bro. Long has been chosen chairman of this committee, its motto seems to be:

"Let no grass grow in your tracks
Nor any moss grow on your backs."

Really, though, the work seemed not so arduous yesterday, in those big soft chairs in the directors' room in Mr. Long's office—a room in old English style of the Tudor period, high mahogany wainscoting, scenes of English chivalry painted on the walls, leaded window-panes,—and a sumptuous luncheon. No use giving the menu. Indeed, I haven't written what I started out to, anyway, which is the gist of the model constitution.

It must be understood at the beginning that this constitution is merely tentative, to serve as a guide, and to be changed and adapted to the peculiar needs of each Brotherhood as each church may see its own problems and peculiar environment. Only two things are required of each Brotherhood desiring to affiliate with the national organization, viz.: the first section of the Brotherhood covenant, and the payment of five cents a month per member as dues to the national treasury.

The need for such a model constitution is evident to any pastor or any man who has grappled with the problem of a layman's organization in his church. For myself, I have held off from forming a men's Brotherhood until I found the right things to ask the men to do. I knew it was useless to ask busy and practical men to organize for the purpose of doing nothing in particular unless it be eating. Personally, therefore, I am grateful to our secretary for studying out the matter so carefully, and giving us so good a guide right at the jump. Let me add here, that very few changes were suggested by the six men who fired criticisms all day

The Argument of Success

In all the affairs of life we are constantly asking if certain efforts or enterprises succeed. This is a perfectly legitimate question to raise concerning Foreign Missions. The friends of this cause do not avoid the question.

Statistics for 1908 show that we have in the United States 141,000 Protestant ministers, while there are less than 6,000 American missionaries on the foreign field. For 1908 the increase in Protestant church membership at home was 290,000, or about 1½ per cent; while abroad American missionaries won 87,000, an increase of about 12 per cent. The total number of native church members added in all fields, by all missionaries, during 1908 was 164,674 or 450 a day—an average of more than eight converts to each missionary. The average number of additions for each minister in this country was only about two. That is, each missionary on the field won four times as many converts as each minister at home, in spite of the great advantage in this country of existing churches, schools, Christian society, good laws, literature. Foreign Missions is, without question, the most successful enterprise in all the field of Christian effort.

How the success of our own work thrills all our hearts! The story of our progress in the Philippine Islands and at Bolenge, Africa, equals that of any missionary history that has ever been written. For the brief time, and the small force and limited equipment, nothing in all the annals of missionary progress surpasses our own marvelous achievements. We do not mention this boastfully, but humbly, and with a solemn sense of the responsibility that is involved. Not only the thousands of converts, but the genuineness of faith and rectitude of life is another illustration of the power of the simple gospel to transform and uplift the most degraded. The faith and daring and liberality in these missions put us all to shame. What a rich heritage of love and loyalty our churches at home have in these stations, which are bright stars in the black night of darkest heathenism. The story is the same, in a different form, in Japan, China, and India, and wherever our much loved brethren have gone with the gospel. When we have prayed for success, our prayers have been more than answered. Do we believe our own eyes when we see these miracles of grace? Will we take care of what we have won? Will we provide for our own offspring which God has given us? These and kindred questions will be answered March 7th.

In the past generation the Foreign Society has built up Christian communities where before only heathen darkness reigned. Its missionaries have preached the gospel in many cities and communities that had never heard it before. They have baptized penitent believers in waters never before disturbed by the observance of the sacred ordinance. They have spread the table of the Lord in numerous communities for the first time. Tens of thousands of children to whom the story of the Cross had never before come, have been gathered into schools to learn of Him whose cradle was only a manger. Hundreds of thousands have received the kindly and healing touch of the medical missionary, who before had never so much as heard of such merciful and helpful skill. Our brethren have opened the doors of 62 schools and colleges in these pagan lands, where almost 4,000 are in daily attendance. Christian homes have been planted; the cannibal has become an evangelist; the murderer has become a loving disciple; the opium eater has become the church builder; the idolater now worships in spirit and in truth; and the licentious life has been transformed into one of purity and holiness. What a mighty work is being done before our eyes!

If you have not ordered March offering supplies, do so at once. Address F. M. Rains, Sec., Cincinnati, O.

REMEMBER MARCH 7th!

long at the piece of writing, and these changes were minor in character. Perhaps after six thousand—or sixty—have had a chance to riddle it, it may need revision. After all, bear in mind it is only to be sent out as a suggestion to be altered as each community sees fit.

The only obligatory matters, as already stated, are the two:

First, the infinitesimal national dues, payable quarterly in advance.

Second, the first part of the Brotherhood covenant or pledge. This reads: "I recognize the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of man, and accept as ideal the social program of Christ and the church, and to that program I hereby subscribe myself. I agree to make an earnest effort to be guided by the Golden Rule in all my dealings. As a Brotherhood man, I promise to be

Gentle with children,
Chivalrous toward women, and Helpful to my fellowman;

to advance the Brotherhood objects and uplift the Brotherhood ideals.

Pledge to Prayer and Personal Evangelism.

In addition to this section of the covenant, which, it is thought, all men who would enter a church organization, whether church-members or not, could endorse, there is an additional section of the pledge which can be taken as optional by any member, and which reads:

"I further promise to pray each day of my life for the extension of the Kingdom of God, and agree to make a personal endeavor each week to bring at least one man under the sway of the church and Brotherhood influence."

Most of the discussion in the meeting of the committee was upon these sections of the covenant, and it seemed impossible to alter Secretary Macfarlane's wording to advantage except in the smallest particulars. He has evidently prayed as well as worked for the past three months—and more—over this document.

Membership in the Brotherhood is open "to all men of good moral character." No distinction is made in membership privileges between those who take only the first section of the covenant, and those who take both.

The special aims of the Brotherhood are declared to be:

"Brotherhood men for the ministry.
Brotherhood money for missions.
Brotherhood Bible classes in every Bible School.
Brotherhood business patronage lists.
Brotherhood banquets.
Brotherhood help to the Brotherhood men in distress.
Brotherhood culture.
Brotherhood fellowship.
Brotherhood men at work in church and Bible school, in Endeavor Society and Prayer meeting, and Brotherhood standards of efficiency maintained everywhere throughout the church.
Additional special aims may be declared at will."

Departments are provided for as sub-organizations, to promote each of these varied purposes. Here, now, are sufficient objects for men to set before them. Here is a purpose for organizing. Here is a raison d'etre, without which men are not going to come together, or if they come, are not going to stay.

The national connections of these organizations, moreover, will give them a solidity, a solidarity, a cohesion, a dignity that has long been needed. For one, I feel that the time has now come when I can go to work at a men's organization in my church feeling that there is something definite to go at, with a place for it "to be at," and a target for it to shoot at!

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Z. T. Sweeney and Miracles Again

In the Christian Century of January 30 I published an article by Brother Z. T.Sweeney on the subject of miracles to which I made reply in the same issue. In that letter Brother Sweeney included several paragraphs which, as it seemed to me, unduly lengthened the article without adding weight to its argument, and I omitted them. This I did for two reasons: First, because of the extra space required which would have made it impossible for his letter to receive the courtesy of a reply in the same issue. It is always a disadvantage to have a letter and its rejoinder separated where it is possible to avoid this treatment. But secondly, it seemed to me that the additional material was quite irrelevant to the discussion and weakened rather than strengthened Brother Sweeney's position. On this point I am prepared to let the readers of this department judge. The following is the omitted portion of Brother Sweeney's paper, including several sentences which were printed at the time:

"These five ilustrations indicate the whole trend of the New Testament. Your definition will not account for a single miracle in the New Testament, while the definition you denounce accounts satisfactorily for every one of them.

Now, my dear brother, there is just one of three courses open to you.

First: Show that your hypothesis does account for the facts.

Second: Deny your hypothesis.

Third: Deny the records as we have them in the four evangelists. And mark my words, it will not be two years until you will be denying the records.

As a scientist and a philosopher, you must recognize that your hypothesis is obliged to account for the facts. As a man of good common sense, you must see that your hypothesis does not account for the facts. You are left no logical alternative, therefore, but to deny the facts. I don't believe your present intention is to do that, but you are going to be forced to do it, just as other men have been forced to do it that have taken your position before now. Your position is no new one. It is the first step taken by any good man in his departure from a Christian faith.

As illustrative of the course you are traveling, I have but to refer you to your friend and colleague, Dr. George B. Foster of the Divinity School of Chicago University. I quote his language delivered to his class on the third day of this present month, and reported in the Chicago papers and wired to the New York papers and which I have never seen denied by him: "Professor George B. Foster of the University of Chicago Divinity School, whose higher criticisms of the Bible have agitated orthodox Christianity, told the budding clergymen of the school today that religion was not of divine or miraculous origin. 'It is not a religion from a God,' said he, 'but an achievement of man, who created his own gods, in ancient times, in order that he might have them to help him in his defenselessness and ignorance; to aid him in conquering his foes, and to dispel the darkness of his future and the fear of death.'

" 'More and more people are giving up the idea that their religion is something handed down to them from a divine source. They are coming to see that their religion is just as good and better than if it had been given to them without the work of human agencies. Consequently, religion is on a more rational basis, as people are cultivating it just as they cultivate music, language, science and morality.' " The premises you have laid down will logically force you to this same conclusion.

Again: You deny that Jesus was a visitant to this world. He was either a visitant to this world or he was a product of this world. If he was a product of this world, how can you account for his permitting his fellow products of this world to worship him? It is not right that one product of the world should seek to receive from other products of the world the homage that should be paid to God alone. Jesus repeatedly permitted and even encouraged men to pay him this homage. The Bible is full of illustrations of the fact that good men and angels refused to receive worship, witness, Peter at the house of Cornelius; Paul and Silas at Lycaonia, and the angel to John in Patmos. It is also filled with illustrations, teaching that bad men and devils coveted the worship of men. How can you account for Jesus permitting this, and yet being a pure man, if he was a product of this world? This is worthy of your serious consideration."

The publication of the foregoing section of Brother Sweeney's paper is in deference to his wishes, and is the result of the following correspondence, which is self-explanatory:

Columbus, Ind., February 2, 1909.

Rev. H. L. Willett, Chicago, Ill.:

My Dear Brother: The last copy of the Christian Century has been received and read. I do not think we can carry on a discussion that would be profitable to either one of us, or to your readers, unless it be a two-sided one. In the last issue, you have taken the liberty to edit my letter and srike out what I regard as the most forcible features in it. In fact, you have cut off the cracker to the whip, and then replied to what was left, and did not even put in a typographical sign to indicate that the letter had been changed. Now, I think, in all fairness and honesty, you should publish my letter as it was sent to you and then reply to it, if you can. If you don't feel disposed to do this, I think further discussion would be useless.

Sincerely and fraternally.

Z. T. Sweeney.

Chicago, February 6, 1909.

Honorable Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind.:

Dear Brother Sweeney: I have your note of February 2 and in reply would say that the reason for omitting a portion of your article, which I did not print in the Century, was two-fold. First, it was difficult to find space for so long an article, as you can readily infer. Secondly, the portion which was omitted was not at all pertinent to the argument with which you were dealing. It relates to the views and utterances of Professor Foster, and you not only inferred that my attitude toward miracles was similar but predicted that my conclusions would be identical with his at the end of two years. Beyond the point that Professor Foster is not connected with the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, I wish to say that I differ as radically from his views of miracles as I do from yours. Moreover, the views which I hold regarding miracles I have held for fifteen years and have publicly stated them scores of times in my biblical lectures in many cities. This portion of your article, therefore, as you will see, was in no sense an aid to your argument but quite the reverse, and I think you would be the last to admit that your article required such a "cracker," as you call it, to give it effect.

If it is your desire that I should publish the omitted portions of your article, I shall be more than glad to do so with the simple statement of their lack of relation to the question in hand. I should greatly regret any feeling on your part that I had, in the slightest degree, weakened your statement by omitting any portion of it, for it is my purpose to have you state your position in the strongest possible terms, without resort to any mere "ad hominum" arguments, such as frequently mar discussion of this kind

Very fraternally yours,
Herbert L. Willett.

The various points in Bro. Sweeney's article were dealt with in my rejoinder of January 30. In order, however, that the issue may be fairly understood, I take the liberty of reprinting the following paragraphs from that statement:

"It will be borne in mind by readers of all my statements on this subject that my insistence has been on miracles as the manifestation of a being living in the fulness of communion with God, and therefore competent to employ the forces of nature in ways impossible to our meagre and fragmentary life. That is my objection to such expressions as the one in the third item of the summary, that Jesus was a mere "visitant" to this world. Such terms rob him of that genuine humanity, which is as essential to all just comprehension of his nature as is his unique sonship to God.

"In the application to the miracles of the principle of the higher employment of law, rather than its abrogation, no difficulty is experienced. The "hypothesis," to use Bro. Sweeney's term, is in entire harmony with all the facts we have. Not one of them falls outside the range of the life of Jesus as the perfect realization of the divine ideal, the incarnation of the life of God in terms of flesh and blood. To deny that the work of Jesus, or that the circumstances of his life, are in complete harmony with the laws of nature, and the expression of their supreme employment, is to assume that one has explored all the resources of the universe and discovered that they suddenly became exhausted at the point where the miracles of Jesus begin. More than this. It is to assert that for the purposes of more fully revealing his nature, the Father suddenly, in the historic instances of which the Scriptures speak, shattered the structure of order and symmetry which through the centuries he had been constructing, and which to our own day constitutes one of our most assured sources of knowledge concerning his nature.

"But I wish to go further and point out the utter fallacy of the assertion that the contra-natural theory of miracle explains the work of Jesus. As a matter of fact it is a metaphysical refuge from the attempt to explain anything. When approached by such an event as one of the miracles, the virgin birth, the divine testimony to Jesus, the feeding of the multitudes, it merely asserts that God did it, or that Jesus did it by the power of God, naively unconscious that the question is as little answered as before. What the questioner still wishes to know is whether some suggestion can be made that will relate these events to the rest of God's work in nature.

"And now, to make the issue still clearer, and to come closer, more to the heart of the matter, I wish to ask Bro. Sweeney the following questions:

1. What is your definition of miracle?

2. What do you consider to be the value of Jesus' miracles today as evidences of his divine nature and purpose, in comparison with his character, his teachings and his program for men?

3. What do you consider to be the present value of the miracles of Jesus as aids to Christian living?"

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Prof. McGarvey Replies

Bro. Gates: I have read with care your long article in the Christian Century of the 6th, and I submit a brief reply.

I dislike discussion about myself; but as you comment very freely, though kindly, upon "the spirit" of my writing on critical subjects, I will speak of it briefly. My wife and I have four sons whom we have brought up to respectable manhood (a tough job) and we have found that a good spanking on occasion, was a very wholesome discipline. Sometimes I have thought that a similar discipline would be wholesome for writers who are reckless in their adverse criticisms of the Bible. But if I have ever given one of them a lick amiss, I am not aware of it. And if I have ever published about my brethren things as mean as those that you have recently published about me, I hope I will have a chance to repent of it before I die.

You argue, that the reason I gave for not believing that Moses wrote the account of his own death and burial, justifies a man who does not credit the virgin birth of Jesus. You forget that the latter is positively and explicitly asserted in the Scriptures as a fact, while the former is not. To disbelieve any event thus asserted because you cannot see a reason why it should have occurred, is rationalism.

But you say that the man who denies the virgin birth may say that according to my admission, it is a legitimate question of criticism whether or not this account is an addition or an interpolation. Certainly it is. No defender of it denies that it is. But they do deny that on the ground of either textual or higher criticism any evidence has been found to justify the rejection of the account.

Admitting, as you now do, that Jesus spoke phenomenally about the sun rising and setting, you turn upon me with the question, why, then, may he not have used "literary forms of expression," such as we use when we say that David said so and so. Of course he may have done so; but we must not say he did without proof. We can quote Hamlet without making the impression that we are quoting a real speaker, when our hearers know in common with ourselves that he is a fictitious character; but if we speak thus to persons who never heard of him before, we inevitably deceive them; or if they have heard of him before, and believe that he was a real person, we confirm them in this deception. So, when Jesus said that David in the spirit called the Christ his Lord, and quoted the 110th Psalm to prove it, he was speaking to the people who believed that David wrote that psalm, and if he did not write it Jesus confirmed the deception of his hearers. Moreover, his argument for the divinity of the Christ turned upon the fact that it was David, the father of the Christ, who said this, and his argument would have been a gross sophism if this was not true. Of neither was Jesus capable.

You ask, what difference does it make anyway what we believe about the Old Testament, seeing that Jesus says "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye love one another." It makes much difference. These words of Jesus Christ could not have been spoken to a club of infidels, no matter how much their love for one another. They were spoken to believers; and no man can reject the Old Testament without rejecting many assertions of Jesus and his apostles. We say, that faith in Christ is our creed, and so it is; but he who denies what Christ says about the Old Testament, as about anything else, has denied the faith.

Your remarks about what I have written respecting the Song of Solomon, are wide of the mark. To say, as I did, "If there be any book which found its place in the Bible by mistake or misjudgment, it must be this," is a very different thing from saying that it did thus find its place; and this gives me occasion to say, that as you are now in a good humor, you may be able to induce your editorial staff to undo a grievous wrong editorially in your paper in October or early in November last, that I had been so rash as to say that the Song of Solomon and the book of Ecclesiastes ought not to be regarded as a part of the canon. On seeing this statement I immediately wrote to the paper that I had never either said so or thought so, and requested that the needed correction be made in the next issue. It has not been made to this day and the only allusion they have made to it contains a misstatement both of what they said and what I recently said about it in the Standard. This is mean. Even if they do not believe my denial, common decency requires that they publish it.

In conclusion, let me say, as I have said many times, that higher criticism, properly defined as the art of determining the authorship, credibility, date, and literary character of ancient documents, is perfectly legitimate. It was in use both by believers and unbelievers many centuries before it received its present title. This title was given it by Eichorn at the close of the eighteenth century, and it has been so constantly appropriated by infidels and rationalists in their efforts to disprove the accredited authorship of many biblical books, and the credibility of nearly all in important particulars, that its very title has come into disrepute with the mass of believers. If you have read with care what I have written on the subject you are aware that I do not use it in this sense, except when I enclose it in quotation marks. The art is not "modern," as it is so often styled; for it was employed by Celsus of the second century to discredit the gospels, and by Origin to defend them. The so-called modern view of the book of Daniel was originated in the third century with Porphyry, who had been a Christian, but apostatized and became an atheist. Our "modern scientific criticism" has adopted nearly all of its "assured results" from enemies of the Bible extending all the way from Celsus to Wellhausen.

J. W. McGarvey.

Dear Brother McGarvey: So that is what you have been doing with the "boys" who are pastors of churches and professors in colleges during the last fifteen years in the department of Biblical Criticism—just administering a theological spanking. Some of the victims of your good-natured and well-meant spankings have not felt that way about it. If you had asked them what it seemed like they would have said it was more like a hanging than a spanking. When it was over they felt all twisted out of their true shape in the eyes of the public who looked on. When you got through with some of them they looked more dead than alive and many people proceeded to treat them as dead, and gave them a burial as professors and pastors. You did not mean to kill them and their work, did you? You did not mean to lay it on so hard that you would leave them cripples the rest of their days.

When you got through with spanking your boys as they were growing up in the home, how did they look and act? Did they act kind of limp and helpless and lie sort of quiet on the floor? And did your good wife put her handkerchief to her eyes to wipe away the falling tears? Did the neighbors, when they heard the boy fall, seem to realize what had happened, and hurry over and offer to do anything they could? Did the undertaker come over a few hours later and hang some white crepe on the front door?

And all that had happened was a spanking, in the McGarvey home!

The Boy's Good.

I am glad that you have at last divulged the nature, or at least the intention, of your discipline in the department of Biblical Criticism. It may be a little difficult for some of us to believe that that was all you meant, but we will try. You meant the boy's good, in your home, when you gave him the spanking. Like a true father you let him stay under your roof and sit at your table, and if he survived it, you helped him to get a place to work, even if he was not repentant. Some of your theological boys whom you spanked you turned out of the denominational home. You warned all your friends and neighbors if they came to their doors, to turn them away without anything to eat or a place to sleep. And when they appealed to you to help them find a place to work as pastor or teacher, or missionary, you refused to help them. But more than that, you warned all the churches, and colleges, and missionary societies not to have anything to do with them.

Was that fatherly treatment? And for no other reason than that they did not agree with you that Moses wrote every word of the Pentateuch, and that the whale swallowed Jonah!

Another Confession.

This new confession that you have just made of the comparative harmlessness of your Biblical Criticism discipline, at least in purpose, will be another most refreshing and gratifying admission to lay before the brotherhood. The offense must be as harmless as the name you have given the punishment. We spank our children for the daily minor misdemeanors; but we hang men who are guilty of atrocious crimes. After this the brotherhood of the Disciples will understand when you call a teacher or preacher an infidel, you are just administering a paternal spanking which is nobody's business but your own; and we shall understand that you do not thank the neighbors for rushing in and offering their services as pallbearers.

Our mistake has been in taking you too seriously. We should have learned a long time ago that that was just Prof. McGarvey's way, and that he did not mean anything unkind by it. There are some parents who are that way. For switches, they keep ropes, knotted and noosed; for slippers, they keep sandbags; for shingles, they keep headsmen's axes. They go on the theory that the severer the punishment, the less of it they will have to do. And it sometimes happens that way, much to the surprise of parents. I read of a man the other day who was given twenty years in prison for breaking his little girl's neck by shaking her for some slight offense.

I do not cite this horrible example to give you any alarm or regret, Prof. McGarvey, but more by way of kindly caution. I regret that some of your theological boys whom you have sent to their long home are not here to get your explanation of what happened to them. I am sure they would feel better about it. Others who have survived to tell their story, have forgiven you before this; but I have heard them say that they wished the pen you used on them had been a stub pen, and not quite so long; and that the fatherly hand you laid on them had been suspended from a steel derrick and lowered more slowly. They thought the risk was very great, and count themselves lucky.

A Correction.

Since the editors of the Christian Century have failed to make the correction you have asked, I will take the liberty of doing it myself. They were entirely mistaken when they reported you as saying that the book called the Song of Songs ought not to have been included in the canon of Holy Scripture.

What you really did say was: "If there be any book in the Bible which found a place in it by a mistake it must be this. And unless significance can be found in it hereafter which has not yet been pointed out, it will continue to be but little read, and of but little practical value."

Of course you think the Song of Songs should be included in the Bible, even if it is of "but little practical value." That makes no difference with your appreciation of it as Holy Scripture. You found it in the Bible when you came into the world; and while you cannot see why it was included, because "so totally unlike all the rest that it is difficult to see what connection it can have with the general design of the whole," yet you think it belongs there.

I might illustrate the very sharp and important difference by the farmer who had bad apples for sale. His son heard him say when they picked them in the fall that the Ben Davis apples were so small, shrivelled, and worm-eaten, that they were of "but little practical value." His father told him one morning that the grocer wanted a bushel of apples for his store, and asked him to fill a basket and put it in the wagon. The boy went out to the bin of splendid Northern Spies and filled the basket and put it in the wagon. The father came out and saw them and said: "Why did you not fill the basket with the Ben Davis apples?" The boy said: "I heard you say once that the Ben Davis apples were not fit to take to market." The father said: "I never thought and I never said the Ben Davis apples were not fit to take to market. What I did say was that they were of 'but little practical value.'"

You see, Brother McGarvey, how easy it was for the editors of the Century to think you said one thing when you really said another. It is a pretty fine point, you make on them, but it is a good one. I am on your side in this controversy with the editors. Their treatment of you in this lamentable affair has been unpardonable.

Really, Bro. McGarvey, if I thought as poorly of a book of Scripture as you think of the Song of Songs, I would not hesitate to say that it ought not to be included in the canon. You have the same right to exercise your reason, your knowledge, and your conscience, in judging of the worth of a book of the Bible as the men, like yourself, who put it together. They could do no better. If a book of Scripture does not have religious value, then it ought not to be a part of Scripture. You are in even a better position to decide questions of authorship, date, and credibility than the men who collected the books of the Old Testament. We are not saved by believing in the Old Testament, but by believing in Jesus Christ.

Higher Criticism.

I confess to a feeling of disappointment in reading what you have to say concerning the higher criticism in this communication. In your former article you seemed to have come clear over to the side of us higher critics. I thought you were going to help us correct that false and foolish impression in the brotherhood that the higher criticism is a dangerous thing. How that absurd notion got spread among us it is difficult to say. I regret to see you connecting it with the names of Celsus and Poryhyry, as if you wanted to perpetuate its bad name. Why not connect it with the names of Erasmus, Luther and Campbell, all of whom used it, and give it better standing.

There are a good many people who will scare at the name of Celsus, and refuse to have anything to do with what he touched. The calling of the higher criticism by bad names has never had either argument or terror for me. A good thing is a good thing, even if bad people use it and turn it to bad results. The higher criticism is like the multiplication table: it is used by the missionary secretary to calculate the offering to missions, and by the thief to calculate the value of his plunder. I never get scared at the multiplication table even if thieves do use it.

Let us agree hereafter to speak well of so good and so useful a method of inquiry as the higher criticism. And further, let us give every sincere and devout scholar the free right to use it, and to draw his own conclusions, even if they differ from ours. If some of the historical conclusions to which you hold, namely, that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, that the whale swallowed Jonah, that David wrote the Psalms, that the book of Daniel was written in the fifth or sixth century B. C., that Jesus had a human mother, but not a human father—if these conclusions can not stand the test of scientific and historic inquiry in our day, then let them give way to other conclusions.

Just because these historic facts and events are in dispute among equally sincere Christian scholars, they should not be made essential elements of the Christian faith. Our faith and hope should rest upon surer foundations.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER IV

In the Bluff.

It was very dark where Trooper Shannon sat motionless in his saddle gazing down into the denser blackness of the river hollow. The stream ran deep below the level of the prairie, as the rivers of that country usually do, and the trees which there alone found shelter from the winds straggled, gnarled and stunted, up either side of the steep declivity. Close behind the trooper a sinuous trail seamed by ruts and the print of hoofs stretched away across the empty prairie. It forked on the outskirts of the bluff, and one arm dipped steeply to the river, where, because the stream ran slow and the bottom was firm, a horseman might cross when the water was low, and heavy sledges make the passage on the ice in winter time. The other arm twisted in and out among the birches towards the bridge, but that detour increased the distance to any one traveling north or south by two leagues or so.

The ice, however, was not very thick as yet, and Shannon, who had heard it ring hollowly under him, surmised that while it might be possible to lead a laden horse across, there would be some risk attached to the operation. For that very reason, and although his opinion had not been asked, he agreed with Sergeant Stimson that the whisky-runners would attempt the passage. They were men who took the risks as they came, and that route would considerably shorten the journey it was especially desirable for them to make at night, while it would, Shannon fancied, appear probable to them that if the police had word of their intentions they would watch the bridge. Between it and the frozen ford the stream ran faster, and the trooper decided that no mounted man could cross the thinner ice.

It was very cold as well as dark, for although the snow which usually prepreceded the frost in that country had not come as yet, it was evidently not far away, and the trooper shivered in the blasts from the pole which cut through fur and leather with the keenness of steel. The temperature had fallen steadily since morning, and now there was a presage of a blizzard in the moaning and murky sky. If it broke and scattered its blinding whiteness upon the roaring blast there would be but little hope for any man or beast caught shelterless in the empty wilderness, for it is beyond the power of anything made of flesh and blood to withstand that cold.

Already a fine haze of snow swirled between the birch twigs every now and then, and stung the few patches of the trooper's unprotected skin as though they had been pricked with red-hot needles. It, however, seldom lasted more than a minute, and when it swirled away, a half-moon shone down for a moment between smoky clouds. The uncertain radiance showed the thrashing birches rising from the hollow, row on row, struck a faint sparkle from the ice beneath them, and then went out leaving the gloom intensified. It was evident to Shannon that his eyes would not be much use to him that night, for which reason he kept his ears uncovered at the risk of losing them, but though he had been born in the bush and all the sounds of the wilderness had for him a meaning, hearing did not promise to be of much assistance. The dim trees roared about him with a great thrashing of twigs, and when the wilder gusts had passed there was an eery moaning through which came the murmur of tormented grasses. The wind was rising rapidly, and it would, he fancied, drown the beat of approaching hoofs as well as any cry from his comrades.

Four of them were hidden amidst the birches where the trail wound steeply upwards through the bluff across the river, two on the nearer side not far below, and Trooper Shannon's watch would serve two purposes. He was to let the rustlers pass him if they rode towards the ford, and then help to cut off the retreat of any who escaped the Sergeant, while if they found the ice too thin for loaded beasts or rode towards the bridge, a flash from his carbine would bring his comrades across in time to join the others who were watching the trail. It had, as usual with Stimson's schemes, all been carefully thought out, and the plan was eminently workable, but unfortunately for the grizzled seargent a better brain than his had foreseen the combination.

In the meanwhile the lad felt his limbs grow stiff and almost useless, and a lethargic numbness blunt the keenness of his faculties as the heat went out of him. He had more than usual endurance, and utter cold, thirst, and the hunger that most ably helps the frost, are not infrequently the portion of the wardens of the prairie, but there is a limit to what man can bear, and the troopers who watched by the frozen river that night had almost reached it. Shannon could not feel the stirrups with his feet. One of his ears was tingling horribly as the blood that had almost left it resumed its efforts to penetrate the congealing flesh, while the mittened hands he beat upon his breast fell solidly on his wrappings without separate motion of the fingers. Once or twice the horse stamped fretfully, but a touch of hand and heel quieted him, for though the frozen flesh may shrink, unwavering obedience is demanded equally from man and beast enrolled in the service of the Northwest police.

"Stiddy, now," said the lad, partly to discover if he still retained the power of speech. "Sure ye know the order that was given ye, and if it's a funeral that comes of it the Government will bury ye."

He sighed as he beat his hands upon his breast again, and when a flicker of moonlight smote a passing track of brightness athwart the tossing birches his young face was very grim. Like many another trooper of the Northwest police, Shannon had his story, and he remembered the one trace of romance that had brightened his hard bare life as he waited for the man who had dissipated it.

Suddenly he stiffened to attention, for though a man of the cities would probably have heard nothing but the wailing of the wind, he caught a faint rhythmic drumming which might have been made by a galloping horse. It ceased, and he surmised, probably correctly, that it was Trooper Payne returning. It was, however, his business to watch the forking of the trail, and when he could only hear the thrashing of the birches, he moved his mittened hand from the bridle, and patted the restive horse. Just then the bluff was filled with sound as a blast that drove a haze of snow before it roared down. It was followed by a sudden stillness that was almost bewildering, and when a blink of moonlight came streaming down, Trooper Shannon grabbed at his carbine, for a man stood close beside him in the trail. The lad, who had neither seen nor heard him come, looked down on the glinting barrel of a Marlin rifle and saw a set white face behind it.

"Hands up!" said a hoarse voice. "Throw that thing down."

Trooper Shannon recognized it, and all the fierce hate he was capable of flamed up. It shook him with a gust of passion, and it was not fear that caused his stiffened fingers to slip upon the carbine. It fell with a rattle, and while he sat still, almost breathless and livid in face, the man laughed a little.

"That's better, get down," he said.

Trooper Shannon flung himself from the saddle, and alighted heavily as a flung-off sack would have done, for his limbs refused to bend. Still it was not from lack of courage that he obeyed, and during one moment he had clutched the bridle with the purpose of riding over his enemy. He had, however, been taught to think for himself swiftly and shrewdly from his boyhood up, and realized instinctively that if he escaped scathless the ringing of the rifle would warn the rustlers who he surmised were close behind. He was also a police trooper broken to the iron bond of discipline, and if a bullet from the Marlin was to end his career, he determined it should if possible also terminate his enemy's liberty. The gust of rage had gone and left him with the cold vindictive cunning the Celt who has a grievous injury to remember is also capable of, and there was contempt but no fear in his voice as he turned to Courthorne quietly.

"Sure it's your turn now," he said. "The last time I put my mark on the divil's face of ye."

Courthorne laughed wickedly. "It was a bad day's work for you. I haven't forgotten yet," he said. "I'm only sorry you're not a trifle older, but it will teach Sergeant Stimson the folly of sending a lad to deal with me. Well, walk straight into the bush, and remember that the muzzle of the rifle is scarcely three feet behind you!"

Trooper Shannon did so with black rage in his heart, and his empty hands at his sides. He was a police trooper, and a bushman born, and knew that the rustlers' laden horses would find some difficulty in remounting the steep trail and could not escape to left or right, once they were entangled amidst the trees. Then it would be time to give the alarm, and go down with a bullet in his body, or by some contrivance evade the deadly rifle and come to grips with his enemy. He also knew Lance Courthorne, and remembering how the lash had seamed his face, expected no pity. One of them it was tolerably certain would have set out on the long trail before the morning, but they breed grim men in the bush of Ontario, and no other kind ride very long with the wardens of the prairie.

"Stop where you are," said Courthorne, presently. "Now then, turn round. Move a finger or open your lips, and I'll have great pleasure in shooting you. In the meanwhile you can endeavor to make favor with whatever saint is honored by the charge of you."

Shannon smiled in a fashion that resembled a snarl as once more a blink of moonlight shone down upon them, and in the place of showing apprehension, his young white face, from which the bronze had faded, was venomous.

"And my folks were Orange, but what does that matter now?" said he.

Courthorne looked at him with a little glow in his eyes. "You haven't felt my mark yet," he said. "You will probably talk differently when you do."

It may have been youthful bravado, but Trooper Shannon laughed. "In the meanwhile," he said, "I'm wondering why you're wearing on honest man's coat and cap. Faith, if he saw them on ye, Winston would burn them."

Courthorne returned no answer, and the moonlight went out, but they stood scarcely three feet apart, and one of them knew that any move he made would be followed by the pressure of the other's finger on the trigger. He, however, did not move at all, and while the birches roared about them they stood silently face to face, the man of birth and pedigree with a past behind him and blood already upon his head, and the raw lad from the bush, his equal before the tribunal that would presently judge their quarrel.

In the meanwhile Trooper Shannon heard a drumming of hoofs that grew steadily louder before Courthorne apparently noticed the sound, and his trained ears told him that the rustlers' horses were coming down the trail. Now they had passed the forking, and when the branches ceased roaring again he knew they had floundered down the first of the declivity, and it would be well to wait a little until they had straggled out where the trail was narrow and deeply rutted. No one could turn hastily there, and the men who drove them could scarcely escape the troopers who waited them, if they blundered on through the darkness of the bush. So five breathless minutes passed, Trooper Shannon standing tense and straight with every nerve tingling as he braced himself for an effort, Courthorne stooping a little with forefinger on the trigger, and the Marlin rifle at his hip. Then through a lull there rose a clearer thud of hoofs. It was lost in the thrashing of the twigs as a gust roared down again, and Trooper Shannon launched himself like a panther upon his enemy.

He might have succeeded, and the effort was gallantly made, but Courthorne had never moved his eyes from the shadowy object before him, and even as it sprang, his finger contracted further on the trigger. There was a red flash, and because he fired from the hip the trigger guard gashed his mitten. He sprang sideways scarcely feeling the bite of the steel, for the lad's hand brushed his shoulder. Then there was a crash as something went down heavily amidst the crackling twigs. Courthorne stooped a little, panting in the smoke that blew into his eyes, jerked the Marlin lever, and, as the moon came through again, had a blurred vision of a white drawn face that stared up at him, still with defiance in its eyes. He looked down into it as he drew the trigger once more.

Shannon quivered a moment, and then lay very still, and it was high time for Courthorne to look to himself, for there was a shouting in the bluff, and something came crashing through the undergrowth. Even then his cunning did not desert him, and flinging the Marlin down beside the trooper, he slipped almost silently in and out among the birches and swung himself into the saddle of a tether horse. Unlooping the bridle from a branch, he pressed his heels home, realizing as he did it that there was no time to lose, for it was evident that one of the troopers was somewhat close behind him, and others were coming across the river. He knew the bluff well, and having no desire to be entangled in it was heading for the prairie, when a blink of moonlight showed him a lad in uniform riding at a gallop between him and the crest of the slope. It was Trooper Payne, and Courthorne know him for a very bold horseman.

Now, it is possible that had one of the rustlers, who were simple men with primitive virtues as well as primitive passions, been similarly placed, he would have joined his comrades and taken his chance with them, but Courthorne kept faith with nobody unless it suited him, and was equally dangerous to his friends and enemies. Trooper Shannon had also been silenced forever, and if he would cross the frontier unrecognized, nobody would believe the story of the man he would leave to bear the brunt in place of him, Accordingly he headed at a gallop down the winding trail, while sharp orders and a drumming of hoofs grew louder behind him, and hoarse cries rose in front. Trooper Payne was, it seemed, at least keeping pace with him, and he glanced over his shoulder as he saw something dark and shadowy across the trail. It was apparently a horse from which two men were struggling to loose its burden.

Courthorne guessed that the trail was blocked in front of it by other loaded beasts, and he could not get past in time, for the half-seen trooper was closing with him fast, and another still rode between him and the edge of the bluff, cutting off his road to the prairie. It was evident he could not go on, while the crackle of twigs, roar of hoofs, and jingle of steel behind him, made it plain that to turn was to ride back upon the carbines of men who would be quite willing to use them. There alone remained the river. It ran fast below him, and the ice was thin, and for just a moment he tightened his grip on the bridle.

"We've got you!" a hoarse voice reached him. "You're taking steep chances if you go on."

Courthorne swung off from the trail. There was a flash above him, something whirred through the twigs above his head, and the horse plunged as he drove his heels in.

"One of them gone for the river," another shout rang out, and Courthorne was crashing through the undergrowth straight down the declivity, while thin snow whirled about him, and now and then he caught the faint glimmer flung back by the ice beneath.

Swaying boughs lashed him, his fur cap was whipped away, and he felt that his face was bleeding, but there was another crackle close behind him, for Trooper Payne was riding as daringly, and he carried a carbine. Had he desired it Courthorne could not turn. The bronco he bestrode was madly excited and less than half-broken, and it is probable no man could have pulled him up just then. It may also have been borne in upon Courthorne, that he owed a little to those he had left behind him in the old country, and he had not lost his pride. There was, it seemed no escape, but he had at least a choice of endings, and with a little breathless laugh he rode straight for the river.

It was with difficulty Trooper Payne pulled his horse up on the steep bank a minute later. A white haze was now sliding down the hollow between the two dark walls of trees, and something seemed to move in the midst of it while the ice rang about it. Then as the trooper pitched up his carbine there was a crash that was followed by a horrible floundering and silence again. Payne sat still shivering a little in his saddle until the snow that whirled about him blotted out all the birches, and a roaring blast came down.

He knew there was now nothing that he could do. The current had evidently sucked the fugitive under, and, dismounting, he groped his way up the slope, leading the horse by the bridle, and only swung himself into the saddle when he found the trail again. A carbine flashed in front of him, two dim figures went by at a gallop, and a third one flung an order over his shoulder as he passed.

"Go back." The Sergeant's hurt and Shannon has got a bullet in him."

Trooper Payne had surmised as much already, and went back as fast as he could ride, while the beat of hoofs grew fainter down the trail. Ten minutes later, he drew bridle close by a man who held a lantern, and saw Sergeant Stimson sitting very grim in face on the ground. It transpired later that his horse had fallen and thrown him, and it was several weeks before he rode again.

"You lost your man?" he said. "Get down."

Payne dismounted. "Yes, sir, I fancy he is dead," he said. "He tried the river, and the ice wouldn't carry him. I saw him ride away from here just after the first shot, and fancied he fired at Shannon. Have you seen him, sir?"

The other trooper moved his lantern and Payne gasped as he saw a third man stooping, with the white face of his comrade close by his feet. Shannon appeared to recognize him, for his eyes moved a little and the gray lips fell apart. Then Payne turned his head aside while the other trooper nodded compassionately in answer to his questioning glance.

"I've sent one of the boys to Graham's for a wagon," said the Sergeant. "You saw the man who fired at him?"

"Yes, sir," Said Trooper Payne.

"You knew him?" and there was a ring in the Sergeant's voice.

"Yes, sir," said the trooper. "At least he was riding Winston's horse, and had on the old long coat of his."

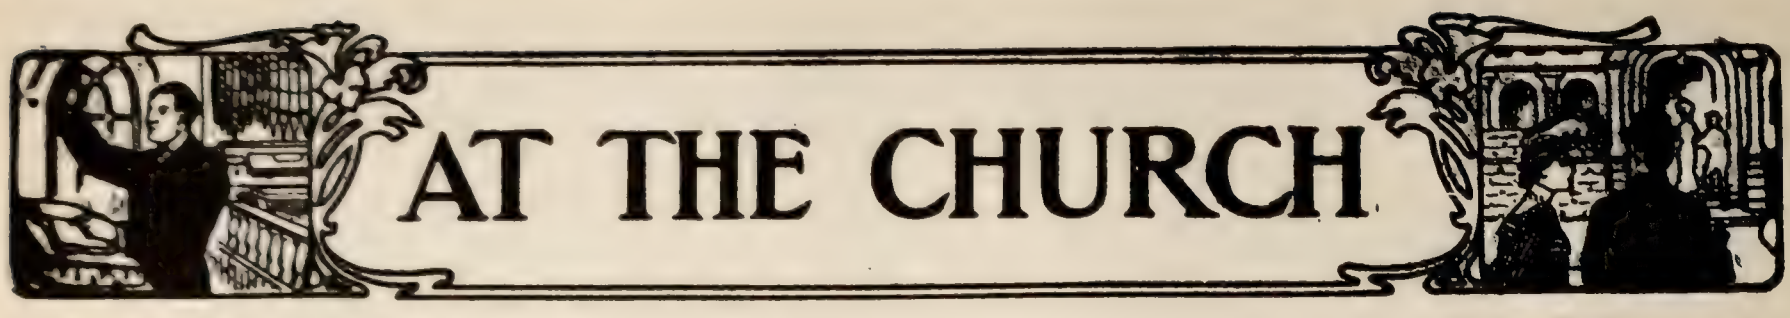
Sergeant Stimson nodded, and pointed to the weapon lying with blackened muzzle at his feet. "And I think you could recognize that rifle? There's F. Winston cut on the stock of it."

Payne said nothing, for the trooper signed to him. "I fancy Shannon wants to talk to you," he said.

The lad knelt down, slipped one arm about his comrade's neck, and took the mittened hand in his own. Shannon smiled up at him feebly.

"Winston's horse, and his cap," he said, and then stopped, gasping horribly.

"You will remember that, boys," said the Sergeant.



Payne could say nothing. Trooper Shannon and he had ridden through icy blizzard and scorching heat together, and he felt his manhood melting as he looked down into his dimming eyes. There was a curious look in them which suggested a strenuous endeavor and an appeal, and the lips moved again.

"It was," said Shannon, and moved his head a little on Payne's arm, apparently in an agony of effort.

Then the birches roared about them, and drowned the feeble utterance, while when the gust passed all three, who had not heard what preceded it, caught only one word, "Winston."

Trooper Shannon's eyes closed, and his head fell back, while the snow beat softly into his upturned face, and there was a very impressive silence intensified by the moaning of the wind, until the rattle of the wheels came faintly down the trail.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

The Ethiopian Treasurer*

It is one of the notable features of gospel history that the spread of the new faith took exactly those forms of extension at which Jesus had hinted in his farewell words to the disciples. The gospel was first preached in Jerusalem, then in Judea and Samaria, and then to the uttermost parts of the earth. It was first preached among the Jewish people and there seems to have been at first a feeling that only to them was it quite proper to bear the words of Christ. Probably if the early evangelists had been asked whether it was right to invite the attention of the Gentiles to the new truth, no one of them would have been willing to face the responsibility of such action. Christianity really came to the heathen only after a considerable period of Jewish evangelism.

Samaritans and Proselytes.

But there was a middle period and a middle territory into which the work was carried, somewhat beyond the limits of Judaism and yet not quite upon Gentile soil. When Philip went to Samaria and preached Jesus to the people of that despised race, he was, as we saw last week, not really crossing the frontiers of the covenant relations, but was still within what even the most orthodox Jew would have regarded as the bounds of their ancient national life. Similarly when the same evangelist, traveling southwest in the direction of Gaza, came upon a cavalcade whose chief personage was deeply interested in Jewish prophecy, even though he was a foreigner, the evangelist did not hesitate to speak to him regarding the great facts of the faith. Clearly in neither of these cases were the limits of propriety overstepped in the preaching of the gospel.

The Gaza Highroad.

What it was that led Philip into the great high-road which led from Jerusalem, past Gaza, down the long stretches of desert to Egypt, we do not know. Whether he had been doing other missionary work in that region and met the Ethiopian in the process of his work among others, or whether it was for this one purpose that he betook himself thither under the promptings of the Spirit, must be left to conjecture. So far as the expression "which is desert" is concerned, it appears to refer not to the road from Jerusalem nor to the city of Gaza, but rather to that section of the Philistine plain into which one comes as he approaches the city named. The route was one of the great thoroughfares from the hill country of central Palestine down to the great kingdom in the Nile Valley, and had been traversed many times in the history of the Old Testament. Along that way had come the armies of the Pharaohs to support the rebellions which they had provoked among the Palestine states against the powers of Babylonia and Assyria; and more than once they had retreated in confusion along that same great thoroughfare, pursued by the legions of the great eastern kingdom.

The Ethiopians.

Somewhere on this highroad, which winds down from the high central plateau, across the Shephela, and so through waddies down on to the Philistine plain, Philip met or overtook a company of travelers making their way southward. The chief personage of the cavalcade was the treasurer of the reigning Candace of Ethiopia. This name seems to have been a common one among the queens of that land. The man was probably the ruling eunuch of her court. The object of his visit to Jerusalem had been to join in the worship of one of the feasts, perhaps the Feast of Pentecost. He was not a Jew, but had accepted the principles of Judaism as a proselyte; either a "proselyte of the gate," one who merely observed some of the outward ceremonies of the faith, or a "proselyte of righteousness," one who, as far as his foreign birth would permit, became a thorough Jew, by circumcision, baptism, and the sacrificial rites of the temple.

The Suffering Servant.

At the feast or somewhere in Jerusalem he had possessed himself of one of the rolls of the Old Testament. It was the parchment of the book of Isaiah, which contained, as now, not only the work of the great prophet, the son of Amoz, but as well that exilic portion, the great "evangelical prophecy," which the Christian church has recognized as the very heart of Old Testament utterances concerning the Messianic hopes. Those great chapters from 40 to 55, describing the work of the Servant in terms of that stricken nation which was carried into Babylonia and compelled to suffer the hardship and humiliation in which it seemed like a lamb lead to the slaughter, helpless, dumb, and without hope for a future, had always been a puzzle and despair to Jewish commentators. It was clear that their meaning was not exhausted in the mere experience of the exile. There was a figure there greater than that of any of the prophets. If, as the reader was led to believe, it was the ill fortune and suffering of some prophet like Jeremiah that was pictured, the outline grew too large for any single human experience, and God's purpose shone out through words that could only refer to some great prophet and redeemer yet to be.

The Conversation.

It was this portion of the prophecy that the officer was reading as Philip drew near. According to the custom of the Orient, he was reading to himself aloud, trying thus to get a better sense of the words. Impelled by that same spirit which was always the guide of the Christian preacher, Philip drew near without presumption and fell into conversation with the traveler. Such salutations are common along oriental highways. Travelers have plenty of leisure; the meeting with strangers may yield the profit of news or the pleasure of entertainment. Friendships are thus easily formed. Their ways lay parallel and the preacher was bidden to join the officer in his conveyance.

Text and Audience.

His question, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" was not the abrupt and almost discourteous word that it might seem to be, but rather the natural inquiry when their conversation had reached the topic of the official's reading. It was natural for the latter to inquire whether the prophet was talking of himself or of some other sufferer. That splendid picture of the Servant of God, wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities, required some explanation beyond any that the Jewish proselyte had ever received. Who was the one to whom these words referred? This was precisely the question which Philip wished to have asked. It opened for him an opportunity to preach that Master whose life and death were the theme of all his work. From that very scripture he began. What better text could be asked? What better audience than an interested inquirer? Perhaps there were others in that company who, though less conspicuous, were equally concerned in the message preached that day.

Baptism of the Officer.

The discourse could have but one termination. As they came to one of those springs or pools which even in that rocky country may now and then be met, the Ethiopian officer, who knew quite well the significance of baptism as a Jewish rite in the initiation of proselytes to the synagogue, asked why he was not then and there ready to be baptized as a follower of this Jesus of Nazareth to whom ancient Scriptures pointed and whom Philip had been preaching. It is true that the 37th verse is to be omitted from the texts. But its presence even as a gloss in some of the manuscripts is no doubt due to the fact that its contents were believed by all early authorities to be exactly what happened. Some kind of a statement would be required by Philip before the baptism of the eunuch would have any value. That statement could be no other than the confession that he believed Jesus to be the Messiah and that he accepted him as his Saviour and Lord. This was sufficient. No other creed or test or belief was necessary. The simple act of baptism was soon performed in the water by the roadside, and the new convert went on his way to the ancient kingdom of the south full of the new enthusiasm of the faith. It is not impossible that his first efforts in his own country were directed to the establishment of Christianity in that region, and this may account somewhat for the fact that among the earliest translations of the Scriptures are those into Ethiopic, and that the church in Abyssinia is one of the oldest representatives of Christianity in Africa.

Meanwhile Philip made his way in the opposite direction to the northward and was next heard of at Azotus, the Ashdod of Philistine history, from which he made his way northward until he came along the sea coast to Caesarea.

PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

Loyalty to Christ.

Topic, March 3. John 12:26; Luke 9:23-27; Matt. 28:18-20; Mark 16: 15, 16.

"Then to side with truth is noble when we share her wretched crust,
Ere her cause bring fame and profit, and 'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
Doubting in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified,
And the multitude make virtue of the faith they had denied."

We live in an age that is greatly indebted to Christ. We dare not try to think what the moral condition of the nation would be without the Christian faith. Life and property are more secure because Christ is known among us. But let us not suppose that loyalty to Christ is displayed in all its fulness and perfection when we glory in the achievements of the past. There is a temptation to believe that the apostles and martyrs labored and suffered in order that we might live free from anxiety and have nothing to do for the furtherance of the gospel. We say the Lord is with us because persecutions have ceased and the church is socially and financially strong. Have we any right to talk about the presence of the Lord unless we are witnessing the regeneration of the race? We may confidently assert that God is with the American people when he raises up from the midst of them moral leaders like Washington, Lincoln, and Frances E. Willard. A temple of worship built by robbers is no sure testimony to the power of Christianity, in truth, it is a source of perplexity rather than of assurance. What are the forward movements of the church? With what determination do men address themselves to the unfinished task of putting Christ into every life and into every institution of society?

Self-Renunciation.

The self that Christ would have men renounce is the self of which no morally sane man can ever be proud. He warns against the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the vain glory of life. Only the moral idiot is insensible to the disgrace of yielding to these. The privilege of getting something for nothing is not allowed to the disciple of the Lord. This privilege is esteemed most sacred by not a few in the church. They sit in churches built by the sacrifices of other people. They listen to ministers whose training for service has cost them nothing in the way of money or of anxious thought. Their children have the benefits of the Sunday-school. To these people the plea for an enlarged activity of the church is strange and painful. They are filled with wrath when they are told that their kind of religion is not the standard for the whole church. The self that is regardless of the high obligations imposed by the benefits Christ confers through his faithful servants is to be renounced with all the moral energy at our command. It is a poor sort of loyalty that exhausts itself in denouncing the men of insight and courage who preach the gospel of sacrifice and give evidence of earnest endeavor to live according to their preaching. There is something wrong with a man who calls himself a Christian and at the same time fights with desperation the suggestion that he do a really generous deed.

Self-Appreciation.

The highest compliment ever paid to man is in the call of Jesus Christ. He who accepts that call thinks well of himself. He who rejects it on the ground that he has something better in his selfish schemes has a very mean opinion of himself. The conceited man of common talk is poor in ambition. He struts because he has an ancestry, or a fortune, or social standing. The disciple of Jesus dares to believe that he is capable of fellowship with God. His confession of sin is an assertion of his right to the blessing of God's presence, for his sense of sin is the feeling of estrangement from the God of righteousness. Such a man is disquieted when he has doubts about the service he is rendering, whether it is worthy of the claim he makes for himself. To him pain with Christ is pleasure and comfort, without Christ is pain. To be where Christ is, is to be where there is something to do. The post of danger is the post of honor. The disciple joins with Paul in acknowledging his indebtedness to all men. That debt he honestly tries to meet. He does it first by accepting and announcing the teaching of Jesus concerning the value of the human soul. He will not praise injustice even when it is practiced against the most vicious and savage. To him the church is a missionary institution. Its present members receive their spiritual culture by engaging in all the studies and activities that belong to a missionary organization.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

Lesson XII. Social Service in the Sunday-school.

I. THE IDEAL OF SOCIAL SERVICE. The term Social Service indicates that group of ideals which has to do with the establishment of the kingdom of heaven on earth. It includes charity, good citizenship, moral and economical reform, etc. As against the old individualistic interpretation of Christianity, it is becoming more and more central to the religious thought of today, and if we may trust present indications the church of the future will be a socialistic church. At the same time the movement in this direction is instinctive rather than intelligent. Isolated benevolences and moral crusades are common enough, and the institutional church has apparently come to stay; but there is no provision made in the average church for the systematic instruction of the people in the principles and ideals of social service. The conscience of the church is not at present being educated to feel that these activities are integral to the religious life and at least as "essential to salvation" as confession and baptism.

II. ITS PLACE IN THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL. If social service is to come to its own a beginning must be made in the Sunday-school. Its ideals must be made at least CO-ORDINATE WITH WORSHIP, bible instruction, missionary teaching and the like. The children must be trained to look upon practical benevolence as a necessary part of religion. The facts, figures and history of Christian philanthrophy must be set before them. They must be taught to visit the poor just as much as to attend church and read their bibles. Later on they should be taught the facts of slum-life as well as those of church history, and learn the APOLOGETIC OF THE SOCIAL SETTLEMENT as well as of the MSS., and "evidences." The adult classes, especially, should receive regular instruction in the duties and ideals of CHRISTIAN CITIZENSHIP and the religious value of a vote.

III. SYSTEMATIC STUDY. A systematic course of study in the facts and history of modern benevolence and good citizenship should be provided for in every school. The NEW TESTAMENT should have the first place as a text-book. The history of the primitive church is shot through and through with the social service idea. The lesson of Christ's helpfulness especially, should never be regarded as fully taught until the class has had a vision of its modern application in its own debt to the poor and needy. For the younger grades the stories of the HEROES AND HEROINES of THE SLUMS should be told in suitable language, but with no attempt to press home the philosophy of the subject. Later on the SOCIAL FACTS should be systematically taught, the related Christian duties indicated, and the responsibility for bad social conditions laid at the right door. Rack-renting, sweat-shop and child-labor, stock-gambling, civic unrighteousness should be taught to be as wrong as lying and stealing. In every large school there should be at least one adult class in SOCIOLOGY. So far there has appeared no series of competent text-books on these subjects for the younger grades—a defect which, it is hoped, will be supplied in the near future. In the upper grades there are available such books as: Strong's "Social Progress;" Riis' "How The Other Half Lives;" Strong's "The Challenge of the City;" Benedict's "Waifs of the Slums;" Hadley's "Down in Water Street"—together with a judicious selection from the many books and magazine articles dealing with civic and economic reform.

IV. INSPIRATIONAL METHODS. The heart must be enlisted on the side of social service as well as the head. To this end the GREAT MOTIVES of Christian benevolence should be insisted upon and the PICTURESQUE AND HEROIC ELEMENTS in philanthropy be kept before the pupils. Sacred songs and stories, special programs and addresses may all be used to create an "enthusiasm of humanity" in the school. CITIZENSHIP SUNDAY, if properly conducted, can be made a powerful incentive in the same direction.

V. THE SOCIAL SERVICE HABIT The will must also be socialized. This can best be done by providing regular opportunities for the outlet of the benevolent impulses. It is one thing to appeal to the feelings of a class concerning the poor and needy; it is another to catch the wave of emotion on the crest and let it bear the scholars to the scene of suffering with comfort and relief. Children shrould be early taught to PERFORM SOCIAL SERVICES, such as visiting the sick and caring for the unfortunate, and thus develop the HABIT OF PRACTICAL BENEVOLENCE in the years before the character has "set like plaster." Every school, or better, every department of the school, should have some SPECIFIC WORK of this kind to do as part of its regular course of study. The kind of work of course for each would be determined by the instruction it was receiving, so that the facts taught and the emotions aroused would be fixed by the appropriate action.

VI. SUGGESTIVE PROGRAM. The following scheme may be suggestive:

(1) PRIMARY. Song service under direction of superintendent and teachers at some charitable institution at least once a quarter.

(2) JUNIOR. In addition to a similar song service, each class may organize itself into a Sunshine Band for visiting the "shut-ins" and carrying flowers to the hospitals.

(3) INTERMEDIATE. Systematic visiting of the poor and sick, together with a definite charitable object such as paying the rent of some poor family.

(4) SENIOR AND ADULT. Systematic visiting of the sick of the class by its own members, together with such schemes as each class may decide upon for itself (newsboys' Christmas dinner, trolley ride or picnic for poor children, etc.). The men's classes might profitably visit the penintentiary, police court, all-night mission, etc., and members of the class can be asked to give their impressions of such visits.

(5) SCHOOL AS A WHOLE. Christmas tree and presents for the poor; fund for distribution of free tickets for Sunday-school picnic outside of regular membership; contribution to relief fund of the church and to charity organizations of the city.

VI. SOCIAL SERVICE LIBRARY. In every school library there should be a SOCIAL SERVICE DEPARTMENT containing the best modern books. If the school has no library, or cannot afford to install such a department, the secretary of benevolence (see next paragraph) should catalogue the best books in the PUBLIC LIBRARY of the city or vicinity, and place this catalogue in the hands of every officer and teacher of the school, and every member of the senior and adult classes. Every teacher should be required to read a selected number of these books during the year as part of the regular teacher-training course.

VII. SECRETARY OF BENEVOLENCES. Large schools should have a secretary of benevolences to supervise that branch of the school work; advise the library committee in the purchasing of new books; arrange in consultation with the superintendent of the departments the specific form of benevolence to be undertaken by each; and arrange for the various song services and visits to the charitable organizations. The success of special programs and addresses will largely depend on the zeal and intelligence of this officer. Citizenship Sunday is a good chance to crystallize the instruction of the year. The actual work of the poor relief should, however, be left to the relief committee of the school.

LITERATURE: "Education and National Character" being volume V. of the Proceedings of the Religious Education Association; Du Bois' "The Culture of Justice;" Henderson's "Social Settlements;" Henderson's "Social Duties from the Christian Point of View;" Matthews' "The Church and the Changing Social Order;" Peabody's "Jesus Christ and Social Problems."

QUESTIONS: (1) What is social service, and what does it include? (2) What is the defect in the churches' attitude towards it today? (3) Where can this be remedied? and how? (4) Indicate a line of systematic study in social service for the Sunday-school? (5) Name some of the social facts that should be taught in the school? (6) How may the feelings be enlisted on the side of social service? (7) What is the social service habit, and how can it be acquired? (8) Give a suggestive outline of social work for the different departments and the school at large. (9) What is the secretary of benevolences, and what are his duties? (10) What would you say about a social service library?

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

March 7, 1909. Subject—"Life Lessons for Me From the Psalms." Psalm 46:1-11. (Consecration meeting.)

Suggestive readings—I Kings 8:21. The story of the "still small voice."

The opening verses of this week's lesson read almost as if they had been written in the past few months. "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will not we fear though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof." How vivid and real would sound the closing words to an inhabitant of Sicily who chanced to escape. What tragic memories would be recalled.

The reason why we find this ancient lesson so fitting to our time is that our physical world, changing only through vast ages, is much the same as it was then. True, that olden time was full of plague, and flood, and constant warfare which our modern science and civilization have largely removed. But we are still the victims of great physical disasters which destroy the lives of immense numbers of men.

That which has so greatly changed is the view which man holds toward the world. It is true that the ancients looked upon disasters as punishments for wrong-doing. They had as yet no knowledge of the great system of law and order by which the universe is ruled. God was the direct agent of all natural events. He caused things to happen, and tragedies showed His anger while blessings showed His love.

But the secret of our own attitude toward Messina is found in the statement that it is one of the newest parts of the earth's crust. Our increasing knowledge is showing us that God's world is still in the making, and that we are right in the midst of a plan of world building and man developing too immense for us to understand. All we do know is that "the universe is governed by law," and that its subjection to this law means physical disaster and tragedy for man. "For we know that the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain ——"

We Endeavorers are living in a most difficult age. Everything is changing and growing, and groaning as it grows. Industry, society, religion, all are troubled and uptorn. In the midst of all this turmoil we must catch a vision or else we are lost. "—— your daughters shall phophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions." In another quite modern sounding verse the psalmist gives us the key to courage, faith, and consecration, in the present day. "He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; He burneth the chariot in the fire." Who cares for tired and blistered feet, for dust and heat, when he catches vision of some heart sought goal ahead? Let us grasp the truth that "the world moves," and that God through a great system of law and order, is the Mover. Then shall we be full of the glory of His presence. In the silent watches of the night our ears too shall seem to hear the words, "Be still and know that I am God. * * * * I will be exalted in the earth," and our hearts feeling the uplift of what is to be, beneath God's guiding hand, shall in answer cry, "The Lord of Hosts is with us!"

CENTRAL INDIANA MINISTERIAL INSTITUTE.

The institute will be held at the Downey Avenue Christian Church, Indianapolis, Monday and Tuesday, March 8 and 9. Following is the program:

Monday Forenoon—Regular Meeting, Indianapolis Christian Ministerial Association, 10:30; Address, "Do the Disciples of Christ Need a New Apologetic?" William Oeschger.

Monday Afternoon—Address, "The Preacher and His Library," Jabez Hall; Review and Discussion, C. W. Cauble; Address, "The Preacher and Practical Reform," J. C. Burkhardt; Review and Discussion, Samuel W. Traum.

Monday Evening—Song Service, Downey Avenue Choir; Address, "The Relation of Education to the Religious Life," President E. B. Bryan.

Tuesday Forenoon—Address, "Modern Evangelistic Methods," J. M. Rudy; Review and Discussion, E. J. Sias; Address, "The Growth of the New Testament Canon," Joseph C. Todd; Review and Discussion, J. P. Myers.

Tuesday Afternoon—Address, "The Unifiction of Our Missionary Interests," W. J. Wright; Review and Discussion, T. W. Grafton; Book Review, "Positive Preaching and the Modern Mind"—Forsyth, W. H. Smith; Review and Discussion, Cloyd Goodnight.

Tuesday Evening—Song Service, Downey Avenue Choir; Address, Alva W. Taylor.

Keep this announcement for reference.

To get to the meeting place, take an East Washington street or Irvington car (avoid the Gray street car) to Downey avenue, Irvington, then meander about one square in a southerly direction.

The Indianapolis Christian Ministers' Association will hold its regular session at the Downey Avenue Church on Monday morning, March 8, 1909. William Oeschger will make the address.

Lodging and breakfast will be free for all ministers who send their names to C. H. Winders, 108 South Ritter avenue, Indianapolis, Ind., on or before Saturday, March 6, 1909. The other meals may be obtained at the church for a nominal sum.

TO BRETHREN SWEENEY AND WILLETT

You have both been good personal friends of mine for years. Hence, I am taking unusual interest in your discussion in "The Christian Century." I believe in discussion when carried on in the right spirit, as I believe this discussion will be. In fact, I cannot help but believe that this discussion bids fair to be the beginning of a new epoch among us—an epoch of polemics marked by genuine Christian search for the truth.

I preached this morning on "The Bereans," and made a personal application of the sermon to myself, resolving to read this great discussion in the Berean spirit. It is evident that Brethren Willett and Sweeney have conceptions of a miracle that are fundamentally different. I am praying that if my conception has been wrong, I may be set right. I am praying the same thing for thousands of my brethren. I am praying for Brethren Willett and Sweeney. I urge the brethren everywhere to join me in the prayer that we may all come to see the truth and follow it wherever it leads.

OUR CHURCH MEN

Men and Missions

BY ARCHIBALD McLEAN

Now that the men in the churches have espoused the missionary cause, a new day has dawned upon the world. The enlistment of the men in the churches in the support of missions is one of the most significant facts in the "grand and awful time in which we are living." Men are reading missionary books; they are holding missionary conferences lasting for days; they are visiting the fields at their own churches, that they may see and know what is being done and be able to speak on the subject with the authority that expert knowledge gives. As a result they are giving of their substance to its support and are praying for it as never before and are urging others to do the same.

Thus, John Wanamaker, the greatest merchant living, made a tour of the world and visited the mission stations. He looked into the work as carefully as he would look into a mercantile establishment that he contemplated buying. He interviewed missionaries, business agents, consuls, ambassadors, and leading men of the country, both Christian and non-Christian. He came home a missionary enthusiast. He wrote his check for $100,000 for the work and called upon business men everywhere to investigate as he had done and to assist. His one regret was that he had not gone abroad earlier in life, that he might help more effectively and for a longer period.

Newspaper Man Becomes Missionary.

A newspaper syndicate sent Mr. Ellis, a trained correspondent, to look into the work and to report what he saw. The men who engaged him wanted an accurate report of the facts. Mr. Ellis did what he was employed to do. He scrutinized the work; he hunted down every evil story he could hear; he brought home an inspiring report. He did not find things as he anticipated; he found a work far greater than he had dreamed of finding. Since his return his principal business has been that of going from place to place to urge the churches to cease playing at missions and to engage in the work on a worthy scale.

Men are meeting in conferences to consider the work and their relation to it. As they learn about it they realize that they have not done and are not doing their full duty. They feel that they must do more. It was at a meeting of Presbyterian men that it was determined to ask an average of five dollars from the members of that communion. They had been giving an average offering of one dollar and they admitted that that was wholly inadequate and wholly unworthy of a great and prosperous people for the greatest work in the world. In a few years the Presbyterians will be giving six millions a year for foreign missions.

Thus far the work of missions has been left largely to women and children. Many men gave because their ministers asked them and to please them. Very many gave under protest and with the feeling that their money was being wasted. They did not think the subject of sufficient importance to examine it; they did not think it would bear examination. On this account they did not read missionary literature or care to hear missionary addresses; they did not deem them worth while.

Statesmen are Missionary Enthusiasts.

That attitude is now giving place to an intelligent and sympathetic interest in the subject. As these same men come to realize the magnitude and moral grandeur of the missionary enterprise, they are filled with wonder and admiration and an earnest desire to assist to the extent of their ability. When men like President Harrison, President McKinley and President-elect Taft and W. J. Bryan and Lord Lawrence and Lord Northbrook and Sir William Muir, after informing themselves, testify as to the great value of this work and summon the men in the churches to support it, it is not easy for honest men to sneer or to doubt. When consular agents and military and political men, who, upon entering the fields were either indifferent or hostile to the missionary propaganda, speak in glowing terms of the nature and extent of the work done in the chapels, schools, hospitals, orphanages and asylums, there is no room for anything but the heartiest sympathy and the most active support. When the men in the churches take up this cause in earnest, we may confidently look for such results as we have never seen. For the men make the money and hold the purse. The women and children have their pin-money; the men have the bank accounts. The women and children have done marvelously well with their slender resources in their hands; but the world can not be evangelized with pin-money. Men can give and must give to missions as they give to education and benevolence at home.

The fact that men are interested in missions will lead many of the ablest young men in the churches to volunteer. Until now there have been far more women to volunteer, than men. Most young men have preferred to enter pursuits that promised larger monetary returns. The sentiment prevailing among the men of their acquaintance influenced them in their choice of a calling. As the men in the churches come to understand and to appreciate this cause as they should, they will influence young men of ability and culture to devote their lives to what has been called the most influential and enduring work that is being done in this day of great enterprises. When that day comes and men do this, hundreds and thousands of young men will say, "Here we are, send us."

Temperance Work an Example for Missions.

The great temperance victories of our day are very largely due to the enlistment of the men. The women organized the W. C. T. U. and created an atmosphere. They took part in the temperance crusade and visited the saloons and prayed in or before them. The children were organized into bands of hope. But it was when the men who had votes and money took part in the fight that the saloons disappeared and the brewers and distillers began to exceedingly fear and quake because they saw their craft was in danger. The same results will appear when the masculine element in the churches will combine to send the gospel to all the ends of the earth.

The fact that Christ called men and not women to be His apostles is receiving considerable emphasis. Women followed him and ministered to him of their substance. They were last at the cross and earliest at the grave. The children took part in his triumphal entry into Jerusalem. They sang hosanna to the Son of David. The women had their place and their duties in the early church. They did their part as evangelists, as teachers, as helpers, as martyrs, and to them in no small measure was the success of that time due. But men bore the brunt of the battle. They were in the lead. That was so ordained by the Spirit of God. It should be so now. It must be so if the eternal purpose is to be realized.

Men Need Missions.

Men need to engage in this work for their own sake no less than for the world's sake. They need it to bring them into closer touch with their Lord and to tighten their grasp upon the truth of the gospel. They need it to save them from selfishness and sordidness, parochialism and provincialism, and to enable them to live complete lives. They need the inspiration of a great cause to greaten their own souls. The work of missions is the most unselfish work in the work; it is the one work whose reward we can only expect at the resurrection of the just.

The men in the church can and should have a part in the evangelization of the world. They can know about it, no matter how busy they may be. Literature is abundant and attractive and cheap. It is prepared so that the busiest man can read it and keep informed. In helping to bless and save the world they will bless and save their own souls, and please and honor Him who loved them and gave himself up on the cross for their redemption.

Chicago Church Notes

There were two additions at Hyde Park the first Sunday of January and two the third Sunday. An entertainment was given and the proceeds amounting to thirty-five dollars was given to the fund for the relief of the Italian sufferers.

On a recent Sunday, Keith Kindred, son of the pastor, joined the Englewood Church. Every member of the family is now in the church.

The meeting held by G. W. Thomas of Lynnville, Ill., closed with eight additions, five by confession of faith. Mr. Thomas finds one of the hard problems of the city the enlistment of the Disciples moving to Chicago.

On a recent Sunday there were three additions at the South Chicago Church. The church is enjoying a substantial growth in all departments.

The church at Douglas Park has installed a new piano. There was one addition there two weeks ago.

A large number of our churches have made pledges for the support of Mr. Colby in attending to the work of the Juvenile Court. He takes the homeless Protestant children and sees that they are properly cared for.

Dr. Ames has resigned his position as editor of the city section of the Messenger, the church paper which appears with a local edition in each of our larger churches. This eight pages of "city" material will be edited by O. F. Jordan. Every church in the city is urged to have representation in the eight pages of common news. Dr. Ames has published a complete directory of Chicago Disciples and has in many other ways demonstrated the usefulness of this means of communication.

WITH THE WORKERS

John Lord, Vigan, Philippine Islands, reports ten baptisms since his last report.

C. R. Piety of Farmersburg, Ind., occupied the pulpit at Sumner, Ill., Sunday, February 14.

H. C. Saum, Demoh, India, says: "We are planning for larger work." This is the sentiment of the whole missionary force.

A. McLean, in speaking of a recent visit to Hannibal, Mo., says: "You can depend upon Hannibal for the support of a missionary. I was there yesterday morning. I have no doubt of the result. They talk of nothing but living-link."

Pastor Leonard V. Barber closed a meeting at Carlisle, Ind., with sixty-two added to the church, thirty-six baptisms, eighteen by letter and statement, three restored and four from the Baptists. Mrs. Margaret Windsor, Muncie, Ind., had charge of the singing and Bible drill for the children.

Evangelist George L. Snively of Greenville, Ill., dedicated the new church edifice at Stafford, Kan., the 7th; $3,800 was needed, but more than $5,200 was given. There were five additions by confession during the day. This church is greatly prospering under the leadership of Pastor Ben D. Gillispie.

Geo. C. Ritchey, chairman of the committee in Oregon, that is undertaking to raise $15,000 for a boat on the Congo, reports over $4,000 raised. The church at Eugene has pledged about $1,000, and expects to give more. He is very enthusiastic and thinks the amount will be raised this centennial year.

"Our plan is to endeavor to pay off the entire indebtedness of our church building before the Centennial. This means we have to raise $21,000, but I don't propose to fall down in the missionary offering to raise the debt. I believe the debt can be raised, and the offerings to missions also made."—P. H. Welshimer, Canton, Ohio.

During George L. Snively's recent meeting at Marshall, Mo., Bro. R. B. Eubank, who gave him $5,000 while secretary of the National Benevolent Association, paid off a mortgage indebtedness of $3,000 against the parsonage. This, with the large ingathering to the membership, has made this a meeting long to be remembered. B. T. Wharton, the pastor, is one of the most popular of our Missouri preachers.

Walter M. White, Mexico, Mo., under date of Feb. 7, says: "Glory to God. More than $600.00 raised in less than twenty-five minutes this morning. We had a fine audience. I just could not wait until the first Sunday in March." This is the second positive promise of the living-link so far on the year, and these are only the beginning. Let the churches be stimulated by the splendid example of this church in acting promptly.

Christian Endeavor Day was observed by the church at El Paso, Texas, with a delightful program and a good offering, but best of all an excellent young man volunteered for the mission field. He is studying with the minister, H. B. Robison. The C. E. Society and the Junior Band each support an orphan in India. The El Paso Church has just raised $300 to become a living-link in the Home Field. The New Mexico and West Texas annual convention will be held here May 29 to June 2. There were five additions by confession during the ing January by statement and letter.

Under the direction of the state board of Kansas, O. E. Hamilton, evangelist, will soon conduct a meeting at Fort Scott. A tabernacle to seat 1,500 persons is to be erected.

W. F. Turner, who has just begun his work as pastor of the Central Church, Peoria, Ill., was given a very elaborate reception on the evening of February 5. The program was as follows:

F. E. Mallory, of Topeka, Kansas, has been called to succeed J. M. Kersey as pastor of the church at Parsons, Kansas. Mr. Mallory had been for fifteen years with his church in Topeka, and it was with reluctance that he acceded to the entreaty of the Parsons Church, and that the church allowed him to accept.

The church at Mason City, Iowa, is just beginning a revival meeting led by Evangelist Shearer of Angola, Ind., and Charles E. McVay as song leader and soloist. G. E. Roberts, the pastor, has made splendid preparations for the meeting and a great revival is anticipated. The meeting will continue at least four weeks. Mason City is a town

The third annual banquet of the Berean Brotherhood of the First Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb., was held Tuesday evening in the basement of the new church. Sixty-five men were in attendance in spite of the storm. L. C. Oberlies was toast-master and the following responded to toasts: Rev. L. N. Early, Havelock, "The Trip Hammer;" Dr. C. W. M. Poynter, "Pruning Knives;" J. T. Allensworth, "We of the Pew;" Rev. H. O. Pritchard, Bethany, "Our Sister Beth;" Edwin Jeary, "Our Own Vine and Fig-tree."

The church at East Liverpool, Ohio, just closed a series of meetings with sixty-five additions. Fifty-two by confession and thirteen by letter or statement. There were twenty-five heads of families. Percy H. Wilson did the preaching and by his forceful sermons, fine spirit and genial nature, made a deep impression and endeared himself to pastor and people. During the three years of the pastorate of E. P. Wise 291 have been added to the church, all without evangelistic aid except this recent meeting. The work is in excellent condition with bright prosjects.

D. W. Moore, Carthage, Ill., has made attractive announcement of a series of Sunday evening sermons for young people.

Royal Brown of Bellefontaine, Ohio, will hold a meeting in Metropolitan Church. Chicago, during March.

There is talk of enlarging the building of the Second Church, Warran, Ohio, that there may be room for the growing Bible-school.

There were sixteen additions the first week of the meeting at Mason City, Ia. Shearer, evangelist; Roberts, pastor; McVey, song evangelist.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the fiirst ten days of February amounted to $1,315.00, a gain of $792.00 over the corresponding time one year ago.

Joseph A. Serena is doing the preaching in a series of "Gospel Services" at the Bleecker Street Church of Christ, Syracuse, N. Y. There were seven additions the first week.

A beautiful and commodious new house of worship was dedicated by the church at Mackinaw, February 14, 1909. Prof. B. J. Radford of Eureka, and H. H. Peters, field secretary of Eureka College, had part in the service. J. W. Street is the minister.

Dr. C. L. Pickett, Laoag, Philippine Islands, reports twenty-two additions. He says their work is in splendid shape, and the prospects are most encouraging. Their greatest need is well trained native evangelists. He says they need the college at Vigan very badly. He reports 1,472 patients treated during the months of October and November.

O. C. Bolman and the church at Havana, Ill., are rejoicing over their recent meeting in which there were 155 additions to the church. It was after plans for a union meeting were frustrated by the death of the expected evangelist that the Christian undertook this meeting. Since the meeting fifty men have organized into a "Brotherhood of Disciples," and have as their motto "One hundred men in the Bible class before June 1."

WITH THE WORKERS

The Central Church, Pittsburg, Pa., is holding a short meeting led by J. A. Hayne, of the Belmar church.

Prof. H. L. Calhoun, Lexington, Ky., preached for J. J. Morgan at the Central church, Fort Worth, Texas, January 31.

C. A. Polson has been with the church at Akron, Ia., one month, during which time five young men have united with the church.

Mrs. L. W. St. Claire has been chosen president of Christian College, Columbia, Mo., to succeed Mrs. W. T. Moore, who retired because of ill health.

The Kentucky Sunday-school Convention holds an annual meeting at The College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky. The last meeting was February 8-11.

J. R. Ewers held a meeting in his church in Youngstown, Ohio, with thirty-six additions, twenty-four of them boys and men. This is his fourth consecutive annual meeting he has conducted for his own congregation.

T. J. Legg, Indiana state secretary, has been ill for a few days. He recently held a meeting at Windfall, Ind., with seventy accessions to the church. The pastor, A. A. Honeywell, says that the church was greatly strengthened by the service.

There were seventy accessions to the church at Paducah, Ky., in a recent meeting led by President R. H. Crossfield. Professor J. E. Sturgis led the singing. The pastor, S. B. Moore, is most hearty in his commendation of both the evangelist and the singer.

F. D. Power, the veteran minister of the Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., has been on a short trip through North Carolina, lecturing and preaching. We are sorry to learn that the occasion of his visit was the critical condition of Mrs. Power's health.

L. L. Combs has resigned the pastorate of the Central Church, Joplin, Mo., and will close his work the first of March. He will not, however, sever his relations with the Central Church, but will become their Living-Link missionary in the home field. The church has given a call to Thomas L. Cooksey to become their pastor, and he has accepted.

Paxton, Ill., February 1, 1909: Closed a four weeks' meeting last night. The most successful in the church's history. There were thirty-one sermons delivered and forty-four added. Thirty-three were by confession and baptism. The church is now in splendid condition. Broke all Bible-school records for attendance a week ago. Have a men's Bible class of forty-two. The minister did the preaching and was ably assisted by Mrs. MaudeJenkins Linton of Wilmington, Ohio, as leader of song and soloist.

S. Elwood Fisher, Minister.

Fayetteville, Ark., February 8, 1909: W. S. Lockhart was called to the pastorate of the First Christian Church of this place about three months since. His zeal, energy and sweet spirit have reached the hearts of our people, and they are partaking of his enthusiasm.

A few weeks since we had a banquet at which sixty men sat down. Out of these we organized a Men's Club, and a Young Men's Class for the Bible-school. These are growing in numbers every week and the interest in them is very great. He has averaged about one addition to the church each week since he came.

Sister Lockhart is a worthy helpmeet. She took charge of a young ladies' class the first of the year to which there are three or four additions each Lord's Day. It now numbers forty-five. B. R. Davidson.

Belding, Mich., February 12, 1909: On February 5, Evangelist William A. Ward of St. Louis, Mo., closed a successful meeting with our church. Twenty-five took their stand for Christ and the church. We count this a splendid victory. There were many adverse conditions. Bro. Ward is a strong preacher—fearless, forceful, convincing. He is not sensational. He does not resort to trickery. He does not appeal to the emotions alone; but to the judgment, the conscience, the will. His work is constructive throughout. We are glad to know him as a brother in Christ, glad he has worked among us, and bid him Godspeed in all his work for our blessed Master. All services well attended last Sunday. Fine Endeavor meeting, with the largest attendance in the history of the society. The program, "Our Damoli Boys," was rendered before an appreciative audience at the hour of the regular evening preaching service. New members have been received or new names proposed every Sunday since the beginning of the new year.

Miss Ethel Davis is the progressive and efficient president.

O. W. Winter, Pastor.

There were five additions to the Central Church, Wichita, Kan., Sunday, February 7, twenty-five for the month of January at regular services. E. W. Allen, the pastor, writes: "Brother M. D. Adams from India was with us on Sunday morning. It was a benediction to the church. In the afternoon he spoke to the Y. M. C. A. and made a great impression. We had a great foreign rally yesterday, notwithstanding the blizzard. Secretary Corey, and the sunshiney Shaw from China, with the dean of our foreign force, Brother Adams, made the atmosphere electric with missionary facts and triumphs. The moving pictures at night were worth a month's missionary institute. To bring the interior of pagan temples before our eyes and to show the very movements of the voteries of these horrible deities, is a startling accomplishment. The pictures spoke to the great audience more eloquently than any sermon could have done. I believe our churches do not realize what a power for righteousness these rallies might prove. Every preacher could afford to get out his whole church to have the effect upon their own lives."

WITH THE WORKERS

Williamsville, Ill.

Sunday evening, January 31, we closed our series of meetings, which had been in progress since January 1. Seventy-two persons responded to the invitation. Among this number were thirty-three young men. There were sixty-four baptisms. It was our plan to get everyone working and we succeeded. They talked the meeting in the homes, on the streets, in the stores. Since coming to Williamsville we have made a specialty with young people and we are now reaping the results of that effort.

H. C. Parsons.

Bloomington, Ill., February 14: Over three weeks of evangelistic services closed last week with a total of seventy additions and unabated interest. Despite very cold and stormy weather the audiences averaged above 500 and on Sundays the seating capacity of our commodious building was taxed. Brother Wharton and his chorus did faithful work. The twenty-one sermons preached were all devoted to the book of Acts. The first topic was "A Bird's Eye view of Acts;" the last, "Paul's Prison Life at Rome." Personally I regard this as the most satisfactory meeting of the kind I ever conducted.

Edgar De Witt Jones.
First Christian Church.

Fayetteville, Ark.: February 14 was a great day for this old historic church. For some time we have been trying to get ready for our offering for Foreign Missions. Pledges were taken last year but the large addition to the church house crowded out the collection of them, and we undertook to raise enough to make the church a living-link. Also we had been praying that we might have a volunteer from among our many young people. The morning was everything but inviting, a slow, cold rain was falling and it was fast turning to ice, but the folks came anyhow. The sermon was ended and just before we begun to take the pledges I asked if there was any one present that would come forward and by so doing give their life to the cause of Foreign Missions. There came forward Miss Ophelia McGraw, who is a Junior in the State University here. It was a joyful surprise to our whole church, and I have never seen an audience so affected. I need not tell you that the money was raised in just a few minutes. Every one wanted to give, and they did. We are not sure as yet, but we believe that when all the pledges are completed that we have enough to make us a living-link in the Home Board also. This church recently took up one of our mission churches in this county as a living-link under the State Board.

We should be glad to report three living-links before we go to Pittsburg.

Bro. Rains has promised us Bro. P. A. Sherman of Jubbulpore, India, as our missionary. He is the evangelist there. We will be glad to have him until Miss McGraw is ready to go.

W. S. Lockhart.

Editor Christian Century: I have been here for the past week preaching in the Baptist Church with good results. I find quite a number of people here who have been connected with the Christian Church in the east and who are very anxious to have an organization of our people effected here. I am planning a tent meeting for Blackfoot next summer at which time I hope to be able to organize a substantial congregation of Disciples in this city.

I should be glad to correspond with churches in the west wanting meetings. I make terms to meet the needs of the congregations for which I preach. Can furnish singer if desired.

I am here working in the interests of the Christian Colony of which I recently wrote. Should be glad to hear from Disciples who contemplate homes in the west. Write me and I will send you a booklet of information on Lands of Southern Idaho.

S. J. Vance, Evangelist.

Bozeman, Mont., February 9, 1909: Seventeen additions yesterday. Thirty-four in seven days of service. Prospects for a great meeting. Milton H. Lee pastor.

J. S. Raum,
State Evangelist.

February 7, 1909: There are additions to the church here almost every Lord's Day. Last Sunday two by statement. The Sunday before a whole family of three baptized, and three young women made the good confession. Today we expect to baptize a young man and his wife.

Sumner T. Martin.

Columbus, Ohio, February 10, 1909: The Brooks Brothers have just closed a good meeting with the Broad Street Church. Fifty-six presented themselves for membership. W. T. Brooks is a strong pracher of the Christ. He knows the Book and tells the story of redeeming love with power. He strikes sin hard blows. Our Scoville meeting of last year with 350 additions precluded a large ingathering this year. A. K. Brooks led the singing well. He has a fine voice and his "balcony choruses" were features of the meeting. In the five and one-half years of my ministry here I have received 884 persons and baptized 407—at many as I had baptized in the preceeding twenty-three years of service. Our Bible-school is now the largest in its history with 526 enrolled and with 456 in attendance two weeks ago. With our beautiful building we ought to do an ever enlarging work.

Walter Scott Priest.

Rock Island, Ill.: Memorial Christian Church in annual meeting, 27 ult., reports seventy-six additions last year, ending December 31. Fifty-four by confession and baptism, twenty-two otherwise. Over $5,000 received in all departments. $1,240 for all missions. Bible-school average 249, gain of forty-nine in average over 1907. Our recent offering Educational day was $63.55. Have been preaching at Silvis, where the R. I. shops are located, ten miles east on interurban, for four Sundays past to union meetings under Y. M. C. A. Three confessions there two weeks ago, three again yesterday afternoon. Three confessions also at our regular services last two Lord's days. Began meeting with pastor preaching, C. H. Altheide, singer, last Sunday, four added.

W. B. Clemmer, Pastor.

Webb City, Mo., February 4, 1909: We closed a two and one-half weeks' meeting here last Thursday evening with eight additions, six by baptism and two by letter. George L. Peters of Joplin did the preaching. We had a fine series of sermons and but for the bad weather we would have had a much more successful meeting.

Harry M. Barnett, Pastor.

Leslie Wolfe, Manila, Philippine Islands, reports forty-two conversions near that city. The missionaries expect to organize a church at this new point. The great need in the Philippine Islands is a Bible College in which young evangelists may be trained as heralds of the Cross. The success of our work in the Philippines is very encouraging indeed.

TELEGRAMS.

Somerset, Pa., Feb. 21, 1909.—Evangelist George L. Snively here. Staid Somerset mightily stirred by gospel. Additions from beginning. Twenty-one to date. Frequent storms, but house packed at every service.

J. D. Garrison, Minister.

Des Moines, Iowa, Feb. 21, 1909.—One hundred and fifty-nine converts today, first indications of the meeting with Brother Medbury and the University Church and the First Days service in the great new building. Began here Thursday night, three days of splendid preparatory services, whole church co-operating. Fifty-one converts this morning, 108 tonight, 127 by confession. Brother Medbury and his Associate Pastor, S. W. Brown, have thoroughly prepared the way. The great new Auditoroum was begun in August, entered today. Total cost $75,000. Temporarily seated with 2,500 chairs. With pews as ordered, will seat 3,000. Packed at both services today. Pastor announced first Sunday in January that he would be delighted to have 1,000 in his auditorium class first day they entered new building, organizing by tens, each one to win ten, each ten 100. They actually had 1,013 in class today with total Sunday-school attendance today of 2,593. President Bell and Drake University faculty co-operating. This is the greatest first day in all our experience. It is not only a big church, but a great church. Pray for our work and workers in this University center. A great meeting here will reach the ends of our brotherhood in its influences.

Chas. R. Scoville.

In last week's report of the final results at the Central Church, Des Moines, Mr. Scoville's telegram said 631. It should have read 831. A marvelous campaign is on in Des Moines.

PRIZE FOOD.

Palatable, Economical, Nourishing.

A Nebr. woman has outlined the prize food in a few words, and that from personal experience. She writes:

"After our long experience with Grape-Nuts, I cannot say enough in its favor. We have used this food almost continually for seven years.

"We sometimes tried other advertised breakfast foods but we invariably returned to Grape-Nuts as the most palatable, economical and nourishing of all.

"When I quit tea and coffee and began to use Postum and Grape-Nuts, I was a nervous wreck. I was so irritable I could not sleep nights, had no interest in life.

"After using Grape-Nuts a short time I began to improve and all these ailments have disappeared and now I am a well woman. My two children have been almost raised on Grape-Nuts, which they eat three times a day.

"They are pictures of health and have never had the least symptom of stomach trouble, even through the most severe siege of whooping cough they could retain Grape-Nuts when all else failed.

"Grape-Nuts food has saved doctor bills, and has been, therefore, a most economical food for us."

MORE ANNUAL MEETING ECHOES.

Shelbyville, Indiana, First Christian Church.

Money raised for all purposes, $6,514.60. On debt, $4,078.20. For missions, $489.60. For local expenses, $1,853.00. Ladies' Aid raised $1,513.12. Bible School attendance increased 75%. Net increase of 30 in membership. One addition by letter last Sunday. The pastor has a fine Men's Class that will be organized into the Men's Association of the church.

J. P. Myers, Pastor.

Bellevue, Penn.: Average attendance at Sunday-school about 325. Church raised for all purposes last year over $7,500 and had about seventy additions. Our Men's Bible Class of 150 has increased 135 last year and subscribed for forty copies of "Christian Men," taking the first issue. The young ladies' "Centennial Bible Class" of fifty has prepared the fine cantata "Belshazzar," and have arranged to give it to 2,500 people at fifty cents admission. Bro. Percy Kendall and wife have engaged to help me in a meeting to begin February 28. They were formerly with Scoville. Bro. McFarland is to speak to us Pittsburg workers at East End Church March 8. Over seventeen of our best men are to speak at our own Foreign Missionary Rally next Sunday night, February 21. The congregation meets on the 24th inst. to consider plans for enlarging church building.

William Ross Lloyd.

Buffalo, N. Y., Jefferson Street Church: The past year has been among the most delightful of my ministry of eighteen years. One hundred persons, mostly adults, responded to the gospel invitation. $4,421.22 was raised for all purposes by the church. $1,363.30 was raised by a Bible-school that averaged 474. Over $1,200 was contributed by the church and school for all missionary purposes. A house and lot joining the rear of the church property and facing on a side street, was purchased and will be used as a parsonage some time. The pastor made 1,252 calls, married sixteen couples, officiated at twenty-seven funerals, but two of which were members of his congregation, and made over thirty addresses outside the field or his over thirty addresses outside the field of his living-link in the Foreign field and will be reported the same in the Home field during the Centennial year. A large delegation will go to Pittsburg in October.

B. S. Ferrall, Pastor.

If some of the churches that have been called "great" will send an investigating committee around to the Buffalo, Richmond Avenue Church of Christ and look over its carefully kept records, the following will be found:

Year	Expenses	Miss.
1899	$3,243.53	$ 805.31
1900	3,323.84	1,220.65
1901	3,103.18	1,743.67
1902	3,646.28	1,319.61
1903	3,223.33	1,480.41
1904	4,586.89	2,381.12
1905	4,271.02	2,749.68
1906	4,163.61	2,927.17
1907	3,979.24	2,846.36
Total	$33,540.92	17,473.98

If (again) there is any church in the brotherhood that watch the above record let it speak out for the common benefit of all.

Silas.

Buffalo, N. Y., February 10, 1909.

Errett Gates has been spending some time in Grand Rapids, Michigan, working among the congregation of which F. C. Aldinger was recently pastor. The latter's relinquishment of the work left the church in a discouraged condition. Dr. Gates hopes to be able to save the church to the brotherhood. Some changes in the constitution and by-laws will be made. Dr. Gates was formerly pastor of the united church in Grand Rapids and is held in high esteem by all factions.

W. H. Bagby in conducting a centennial service in the church in Missoula, Montana, spoke on a recent Sunday morning of the work of Thomas Campbell. His address concluded as follows:

"As reiterated again and again in the declaration and address, the sole end and aim of the movement was to remove the causes that had disrupted the church and destroyed its harmony, and to prepare the way for the permanent scriptural reunion of the followers of Christ into one body as at the beginning. How much it has done to bring about the present state of feeling among the churches concerning the desirability and practicability of Christian unity God only knows. It is inconceivable that a religious body of such proportions as the one that has grown up about this idea is, has contributed less than a very great deal to the results that are before the eyes of all. It has touched American life from the peasant in his cottage to the president in the White House. It has no dream of becoming the universal church. If it can have some humble part in bringing about peace and good will and the unity for which Christ prayed, and along with all others, be of the one great fold, its highest aspirations will have been satisfied. The prime movers in it had no dream beyond this. But it will never be satisfied with less than this."

DEFINITE AIMS.

Certain definite aims should be before the church in the approaching offering for foreign missions.

1. Let every friend of the work undertake to enlist some church which has not hitherto been giving. No church should stand aloof from this world-wide campaign this centennial year.

2. A determined purpose should be made to have each church reach its full apportionment, or as hundreds are planning to do, double their apportionment. There was never before such vital interest in reaching the apportionment.

3. A loyal, persistent effort should be made to secure an offering from every member of the church. See to it that the base of supply is widened.

4. The foreign society is trying to secure one hundred gifts this year of $500 each or more. Already about twenty-five have been secured and the campaign has only begun. Ask individual men and women for $500 each in the March offering.

5. We are trying also to secure 500 gifts of $100 each. This can be done. The task will require careful attention. We ask the preachers and church officers to help in the effort. Thousands of business men will give $100 each if the subject is properly presented. Do not be timid about asking. Business men feel encouraged and really complimented by such requests, and the giving blesses their lives.

6. Please pay careful attention to the Foreign Missionary Rally in your church Sunday night, February 28. Make it a great service. You can have your church crowded at this meeting. In many churches this is one of the most successful services in all the year. A suggestive program will be found in the February number of the Intelligencer, and a program has also been sent to every church. The success does not depend upon the presence of a secretary or a returned missionary. Make use of home talent.

7. We are asking every preacher in our brotherhood to preach a sermon on the Centennial and Foreign Missions on Sunday, February 28 or March 7. It is a great theme for a great sermon. It affords a preacher an opportunity of a litetime. The people always respond to good preaching on great themes.

If you have not ordered March offering supplies, it will be well to attend to it today. There is every promise of the greatest offering in all our history. Let the whole army of the Lord move as one man.

HIT THE SPOT.

Postum Knocked Out Coffee Ails.

"There's a good deal of satisfaction and comfort in hitting upon the right thing to rid one of the varied and constant ailments caused by coffee drinking.

"Ever since I can remember," writes an Ind. woman, "my father has been a lover of his coffee, but the continued use of it so affected his stomach that he could scarcely eat at times.

"Mother had coffee-headache and dizziness, and if I drank coffee for breakfast I would taste it all day and usually go to bed with a headache.

"One day father brought home a pkg. of Postum recommended by our grocer. Mother made it according to directions on the box and it just "hit the spot." It has a dark seal-brown color, changing to golden brown when cream is added, and a snappy taste similar to mild, high-grade coffee, and we found that its continued use speedily put an end to all our coffee ills.

"That was at least ten years ago and Postum has, from that day to this, been a standing order of father's grocery bill.

"When I married, my husband was a great coffee drinker, altho he admitted that it hurt him. When I mentioned Postum he said he did not like the taste of it. I told him I could make it taste all right. He smiled and said, try it. The result was a success, he won't have anything but Postum." "There's a Reason."

Centennial Bulletin

Watch this column from week to week for important news and announcements.

It has been the custom of our annual conventions to appoint transportation managers in different sections of the country. The Pittsburg brethren feel that for them to attempt this for the Centennial is too vast an undertaking, and so they refer the matter back to the people of each city and section. Select your own transportation manager with great care. Upon the right choice will depend not only the size of your delegation but a large part of the pleasure and satisfaction of the trip.

In its third of a century of work and growth the Foreign Christian Missionary Society has had but three presidents. The contribution made by Isaac Errett, the first of these, to the Restoration Movement, is one of the eight Centennial themes for the great Saturday meetings at Pittsburg. President C. L. Loss of Lexington, Ky., the second president of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, will be one of the commanding and revered figures at the Centennial. Thousands of earnest Disciples will offer a special thanksgiving that his life is prolonged to cover this celebration.

Wanted—Photographs of all historic persons, places and objects to be sent to Frank P. Wright, Traverse City, Mich. He is preparing lantern slides that are furnished at reasonable rates to all who use the stereopticon.

An earnest Christian business man in Nebraska whose income is largely from investments wants to know how to compute the tithe. He should be cautioned against considering the increase in invoice over the preceding year as the entire income for the time elapsed. To that increase must be added what he has consumed during the year on the living of himself and family. Let him regularly give to the Lord the first tenth of his living and then at the end of the year devote also a tenth of the increase. In the same way the man who owns his home should count a fair rental as a part of his income and give a tenth of that as well as all that comes into his hands. In general the man who is trying to get his religion as cheap as possible will not be pleased with tithing.

The big church at Champaign, Ill., under the leadership of Stephen E. Fisher after a season of instruction in tithing is making an experiment of the practice throughout the month of February and promises an interesting report at the end of the time.

The First Church Bulletin of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, is called The Centennial Herald. Quite properly it carries on its title page seven Centennial ideals of the congregation. The minister, George B. Van Arsdall, is now preaching a series of special sermons on the Contribution of Disciples to Twentieth Century Christianity. A part of the contribution of the Cedar Rapids Church is the support of Charles Settlemeyer as its living-link missionary under the F. C. M. S. in Nanking, China.

Every one acquainted with the fact has been struck by the difference between the public attitude toward contributions to Gipsy Smith and Billy Sunday. The former works under the auspices of a missionary organization in England. He is paid a fair but moderate salary, and the surplus goes to support other missionaries. The latter doubtless makes good use of the tens of thousands of dollars placed in his hands, but it is altogether private and personal. The plan of the Gipsy is a hundred-fold better in every way. And now comes our own modern marvel of apostolic evangelism, Charles Reign Scoville, and proposes that all the leading evangelists of the Churches of Christ be regular and constantly employed by the American Christian Missionary Society through its department of evangelism. The proposal is worthy of the man, the cause and the Centennial year, and should receive earnest consideration by the whole brotherhood.

Last year there were about one hundred living-link churches coöperating with the F. C. M. S. A number of individuals were also each giving as much as the salary of one missionary. A striking thing is the rarety with which a church that takes up the support of its own missionary relapses into smaller and less definite giving. The general testimony is that it is easier to give $600 for a living-link than $175 for the general fund. It is definite. It is personal. It is large. Not less than two hundred living-links should satisfy us in the Centennial year.

The March number of the Missionary Tidings will tell how the Third Church, Indianapolis, raised the salary of its living-link in India the first Sunday in February. Every person present was given a card and pencil. Then the India Sunset Song was sung. During the chorus after the first verse every person wrote his name and address on the card. During the chorus of the last verse he put down the amount per month of his pledges for the year.

$400,000 of our Centennial offering to foreign missions could be made by a thousand strong churches and ten thousand well-to-do members, but it would be a three-fold calamity if it were so provided. The effort is to get five thousand contributing churches for the blessing it will bring to them as well as for the salvation it will carry to the lost, and the glory it will give to the King. But in the Centennial year we are not satisfied merely to have these churches represented however worthily, in the amount of the offering. We want every member to share in the victory. The tens of thousands of March offering envelopes fluttering into the baskets simultaneously amid the prayers of those who give in sacrifice, as well as those who wait in anxiety on the other side of the world, will prove as nothing else can that we are really worthy to celebrate the Centennial of the Declaration and Address, and to call ourselves the lineal successors and heirs of the Man of God through whom the call to liberty, unity and loyalty was given to the world.

CENTENNIAL BULLETIN (Special).

The Central Passenger Association has granted a rate to Pittsburgh for the Centennial of a fare and a half for the round trip. This covers the region north and west of the Ohio River and south of the Great Lakes to Chicago, Burlington and St. Louis. This rate will be the basis for action by the passenger associations farther west and south. Tickets will be on sale October 10 and 11, and 15 and 16, and will be good for return until October 25. A longer allowance will be made on trans-continental tickets.

DEDICATION, STAFFORD, KAN.

The First Christian Church of Stafford, Kan., was dedicated February 7, by George L. Snively of Greenville, Ill. More than $5,000 was raised—twelve or fourteen hundred more than the indebtedness. Not one dollar of this was pledged by a church society. We purpose using a part of the funds to complete and equip our basement for social and other purposes. As a fitting climax to the work of the day, four persons made the good confession and one united with the church by statement, at the evening service.

Pimples Cannot Live

When The Blood Is Purified With Stuart's Calcium Wafers.

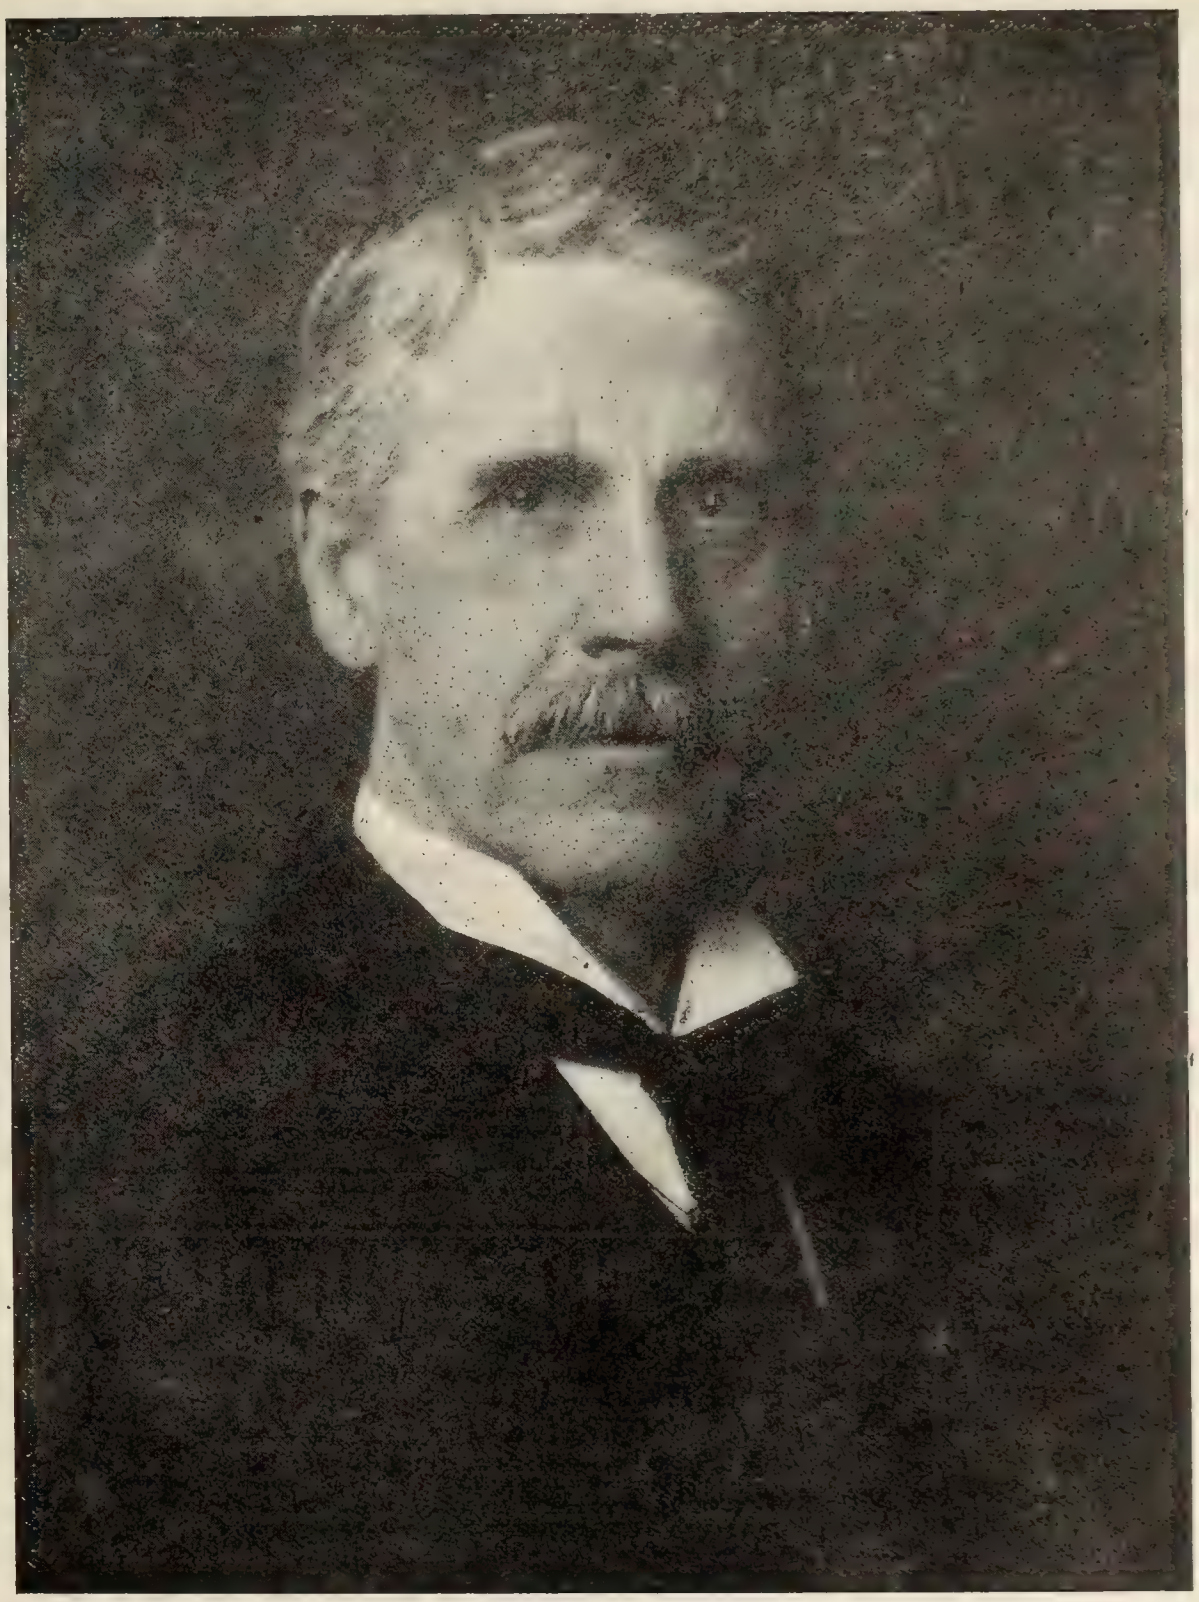
Trial Package Sent Free.

Pimples, blotches, eruptions, etc., simply disappear like magic when you shut off the supply of impurities which cause them.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers go into the blood through the same channel as food. They stimulate and nourish it. They destroy foreign and unnatural bodies found there and remove all impurities very quickly.

In many cases pimples and eruptions disappear from the skin in five days.

These little wafers as so strong that immediately after they go into the blood their beneficial effects make themselves known. The blood is cleansed rapidly and thoroughly, the impure is separated from the pure blood and the waste matter and poisons are carried from the system.



The person who suffers the humiliation of pimples, blotches and eruptions should know and feel that the blood is in bad condition and delay is quite dangerous, and is liable to effect many organs quite seriously.

Purify your blood and you give nature the means to successfully fight all manner of disease. Calcium Sulphide is one of the ingredients from which Stuart's Calcium Wafers are made, and it is the strongest and most powerful blood invigorator known to science. This wonderful purifier is endorsed by the entire medical profession and is generally used in all doctor's prescriptions for the blood and skin.

Stuart's Calcium Wafers peculiarly preserve the strength of Calcium Sulphide better than other methods—thus giving the most rapid cures owing to the purity of the ingredients and their freedom from decay, evaporation and chemical weakness caused by many latter day modes of preparation. Stuart's Calcium Wafers are sold by every druggist. Price 50c, or send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. "XXX CHRISTIANS."

Every one who purchases office supplies is familiar with the use of XX, XXX or XXXX to indicate the weight of the envelope in a given box. Every housewife looks for a like indication of quality on a sack or a barrel of flour. The Centennial Roll Books that are being prepared in all the churches of the Disciples will mark in the same way every member who has weight enough to count at all in the Kingdom of God.

As these Roll Books will be gathered at Pittsburgh next fall to form the chief exhibit of the Centennial Celebration, and then will be perpetually preserved in duplicate both in the Library of Congress at Washington, and in some suitable brotherhood depository, it becomes a matter of interest to every Disciple to get on record right in this year of one hundred years.

The books are being sent out from the Centennial office at the cost of production as follows:

For book with room for 160 names, 10 cents for copy in board covers to be returned to Pittsburgh; 35 cents for copy in cloth covers to be kept in the local church archives: 320 names, 15 cents and 40 cents; 640 names, 20 cents and 45 cents; 960, 25 and 50; 1280, 30 and 55; 1600, 35 and 60; 1920, 40 and 65; 2,400, 50 and 75; 3,040 names, 60 cents and 85 cents.

In addition to the church list pages on which the name of every member and the fact—not the extent—of his participation in the Bible School, in local church support and in the general work to missions, benevolence and education, are recorded, there are special pages for the list of officers, for the names of all ministers who have served the church and for a tabulated report of the Centennial year.

The most important step to take in the preparation for the March offering is to start your Centennial Roll Book and use it as a means to get absolutely every member to make some contribution. If we can only accomplish the complete enlistment of our entire membership in the work of world-wide evangelism, the $400,000 Centennial Aim will be gloriously surpassed.

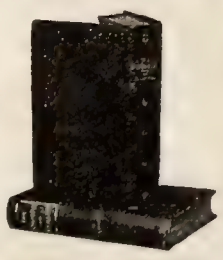
GOOD NEWS FROM CHINA.



"We are in the midst of new and reviving spiritual energies in China. The whole field is in the wave-currents of a real blessing. The evangelists at Chu Cheo have been touched with the fire of a new consecration. At Shanghai we have seen great things. God is giving the native ministry a new vision. We baptized thirteen on Christmas morning. The light of the Morning Star is shining upon us. Somebody is praying somewhere." —W. R. Hunt.

John Johnson reports the baptism of a young man at Nantungchow. He was baptized on Christmas day, in the morning. There was great interest in the service. The chapel was full of interested spectators. Many more are expected soon.

At the morning service on Christmas day at Luchowfu, China, a large crowd was gathered. Two men were baptized, and one little girl fourteen years old, the first child ever baptized here. The chapel was beautifully decorated with bamboo and potted plants, and was crowded with an interested, quiet audience. The Chinese Evangelist preached a short sermon, and the three were buried in baptism. In another part of the city, a man was baptized the same day.

Twelve were baptized at Chu Cheo the last of the month of October, and in the last weeks of December, three were baptized in Nantungchow, and others are very near the Kingdom. Everywhere the spirit of revival is growing, and it is believed that the day long prayed for in China is dawning.

The Enlarging Missionary Motive

With the modern growth of missions has come also a growth in the reasons for missionary endeavor.

The reasons given by Carey and Judson and Morrison were very intense reasons, but very simple.

To them the world was lost without Christ. Possessing Christ, they had the power to save those who possessed him not. They were therefore responsible for the eternal welfare of the benighted millions.

Their conception of missions was in terms of simply preaching the evangel by speech and by book.

With the years this primary missionary motive has suffered no atrophy but has, on the contrary, been greatly enlarged and enriched.

It is true that we do not spur our hearts to missionary service by contemplating the millions going down to eternal hell, as the missionaries of the earlier day did. If a preacher, stopping dramatically in the midst of his sermon and pointing to the clock until every one could hear it ticking thunderously, should say, "Every time that clock ticks so many souls go down to eternal hell," he would excite nothing but pity for his own crude conception both of the gospel and of missions.

Yet the obligation for missionary endeavor is no less urgent because the word "lost," in its application to the unevangelized world, has taken on a more concrete and real interpretation. The more Christian conception of the lost world makes an appeal to motives that were not touched by the earlier notion.

If a century ago there was one good reason for urging missionary consecration today there are four or five good reasons.

We are learning today that missions is an advantage to commerce, and so the self-interest of Christian nations is appealed to at the point of the pocket book.

Our modern business men have formed the habit of thinking their business in large terms. They are not content to accept supply and demand as fixed and given facts. They create demand. They produce supply. A vast territory of the country is arid and unpeopled; they build a railway through it, locating towns where as yet there are none. They send agents through the cities advertising for homeseekers. Like a miracle the land that was once desert blossoms as a rose, and cities and villages spring up everywhere.

Already commerce is at work developing in China and Japan, in Tibet even, and in Africa a taste for the clothes we wear, the houses we live in, and the food we eat. But commerce is beginning to see that the demand for our products, for our railways and our machinery is conditioned upon sharing with us the same social ideals. The African will never use the railroad until he is civilized. Civilize him and you have created demand for the instruments by which civilization is maintained and carried forward.

Now everybody knows that Christianity is the great civilizer. Wherever the gospel has gone material civilization has sprung up. The statesmen of commerce, the captains of industry, men who think in terms of continents are coming to see the vital connection of missions with their material prosperity.

The development of an intense peace conscience among Christian nations reënforces the primary missionary motive.

"Our Christian missions have for their object," says President Roosevelt, "not only the saving of souls, but the imparting of a life that makes possible the Kingdom of God on the earth." Mr. Bryan in an address the other day before the Presbyterian Brotherhood of Chicago earnestly pleaded for the substitution of Bibles for bullets in our dealing with distant inferior nations.

The fact is that modern methods of travel and communication are bringing the Occident and the Orient face to face. Peaceable social commingling will be impossible unless there is identity in at least the fundamental ideals of the two hemispheres.

Bishop Brent is wise when he urges us of the West to implant our ideals in the East "in such fashion as to minimize the chance of a dreadful future clash between two radically different civilizations; if we wait until tomorrow we may find that we have waited too long."

One of the most interesting and significant developments of the missionary motive is its enrichment by its own paradox. The primary motive of missions regards the world as in need of the gospel. This newer motive, just now fascinating the minds of our most thoughtful and earnest men, regards the gospel as in need of the world!

The world needs Christ; but Christ needs the world, in order to shew forth the beauties and glory of his person.

Any national or racial interpretation of Christ is bound to be but a "broken light" of him. There is more in Christ than our American or European Christianity has yet expressed. The folly of our attempts to define him in our creeds or to confine him in our sects is nowhere more apparent than in the light of the fact that among whatever people he goes he is given a fresh interpretation.

The elasticity of the gospel, its adaptability to all types of human life, justifies the Master's title "Son of Man." He is waiting yet for the full revealment of his character. Let not us strenuous, high-pressure, pragmatic Occidentals imagine that we have given to Christ a full and adequate interpretation.

May we not expect that our Christianity, once we carry it to China and India, will come back to us enriched by the vast spiritual treasures of those ancient religious peoples?

After all Christ was theirs before he was ours. He was born among them. He breathed the oriental air. His soul was nourished on the oriental literature. Our Bible is an oriental book. Where shall Christ come to his own if not in the lands which we call heathen?

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

DEFEAT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY BILL A TEMPERANCE VICTORY

The defeat in Committee of the bill to appoint a commission of Congressmen to investigate the liquor traffic was a decisive temperance victory. The Anti-Saloon League has been quietly opposing this bill during the whole session, though it was favored by some temperance people who had not learned that the appointment of such a commission though an apparent concession to temperance sentiment, was to be used as an excuse for delaying inter-state shipment and other temperance legislation until it reported, and that the provision that any member of the commission whose term in Congress expired should be continued at full Congressional pay, afforded an excellent means of taking care of members who had been defeated for re-election or re-nomination to the House for refusing to report the inter-state shipment bills out of the Judiciary Committee.

WAR ON THE RULES AND THE RULERS

The "elder statesmen" are considerably worried over some of the tactics of "Fighting Bob" La Follette of late. He asks some very impertinent questions of these high and mighty. He insists that a great appropriation bill, carrying millions above the hundred, be considered for a day or two in order that other statesmen, besides the Lord's anointed, may have a humble chance to justify their own judgments in voting. The aforesaid anointed tell him that they had considered very maturely and that the time is now so short that he ought not to obstruct legislation by objecting to a vote practically without debate. The little stalwart innocently asks why not have more time then? He is benignly told that these bills have many items in them, and that it takes long to go over all of them carefully, and that the great committees (and committeemen) are kept very busy, and that all wise ones know that the most of such legislation must be done in committees, you know. Still the badger senator insists that he may be from Missouri and wants to know why the aforesaid committees cannot have a little wider representation among senators so a few of the patriots may not have all the work to do. Senator Hale complains, mildly rebukes, and paternally scolds, but the Wisconsin man says there is one thing he can do, even though he cannot be on any important committee and is generally sat upon by those who believe that he is not among the hosts of "divine right," he can object and he can talk for many, many weary hours, and thus he can get the country to hear and when the country hears long enough and rubs its sleepy eyes a while, it will give an order that will humble even the mighty "elder statesmen" and the senate will become more a national than an "inner council" chamber.

GOTT UND UNCLE JOE

The world was convulsed some years ago by the famous "Gott und Mich" recitation of the Kaiser's immanence. It is related that one of the young army officers was defending the Kaiser in the premises and was reminded that the might of the Lord was generally supposed to be rather formidable. He replied "Yes, but the Kaiser is young yet."

The speaker of the house of Representatives is given the right to refer all bills except the messages from the president. This was amply evidenced the other day when someone wanted the bill removing Senator Knox's disabilities as the coming Secretary of State referred to the Judiciary Committee while the speaker desired some other committee to have it. Since it was a constitutional question the member thought it logical to turn it over to the law committee and he made a motion to that effect. After the motion was made the speaker announced it would be referred to the Committee on Election of President and Vice President, and then ruled that the gentleman's motion was out of order. It is his privilege to refer the bill and he had already done so. Thus they "expedite" business. Once a bill is referred to the committee the speaker desires, there is no way to get it up for consideration but by a call of the committees, unanimous consent, or a suspension of the rules. Victor Murdock of Kansas is one of the "young Turks" at Washington. He enlivens things once in a while, when he gets a chance to say something in the House. When he cannot get the chance there he says it anyhow through some public print or in a speech somewhere.

Murdock says to get a bill up under "call of committees" is but a "chance in a lifetime." One does not need much imagination to see how it could be done under either of the other two rules if the speaker does not desire it.

Now here is an instance that illustrates the divinity of your Uncle Joe's powers. Perhaps no mortal man was ever acclaimed by so many people as was Abraham Lincoln last week. The people of this grateful land honored themselves by honoring Lincoln. One hundred thousand have joined in making contribution to the Lincoln Farm Association and the farm on which he was born has been purchased and the corner stone of a memorial, within which the humble log cabin of the great president will be forever preserved, was laid by President Roosevelt on Lincoln's birthday. It is certainly but fit that every citizen of the nation be allowed to have some part in this memorial. A bill is presented in the senate and passed unanimously, appropriating a part of the money that must be provided for the upkeep of this, the people's memorial. Presented to the house, the omnipotent gavel pronounces itself against it, and refers it to one of the minor committees, where it will be "the chance in a lifetime" to get it reported out for action. The house would pass on it with practical unanimity and the nation approve it. But the vox populi, vox Deus, prevails not before the "picturesque" czar of our representatives.

HUMANITY FOR THE BRUTE

Nothing more characterizes these times than the efforts to help the helpless. Almost numberless associations are organized for the common good and for the expert and efficient work of philanthropy. Our time seems, on the surface, to be characterized by a ruthless commercialism. May it not be that this is less real than seeming? At least it may be affirmed that it is no worse than heretofore but that we are much more sensitive to it. This is the social age and nothing so appeals to men as the call to help the "under dog" and give the man that is "down and out" a chance.

One of the most useful of these many philanthropic associations is the American Humane Society. Its offices are at Albany, N. Y., and its president is Dr. William O. Stillman. The subsidiary societies number hundreds but they feel the need of thousands. They last year prosecuted over 32,000 cases and their work included the welfare of 762,000 animals and 166,264 children. They spent a million dollars and felt that they had but touched the problem. Next year they expect to hold a great International Humane Congress in Washington.

Here are some of the things they desire to do. They wish a law that will compel the railroads to push along live-stock freight trains faster. The average is often as low as from four to ten miles per hour for the twenty-eight hours stock may be kept aboard without feed or water. The right of way is given to "dead" freight when it pays better. The poor beasts are exposed to rain and wind, to cold in the winter and to torrid heat in the summer when the close quarters of a crowded car are subjected to a stifling side track for hours perhaps. They wish a minimum speed of at least sixteen hours which will bring the average shipment within the twenty-hour limit. They have aided the Secretary of Agriculture in many cases where the twenty-eight-hour law was broken and there are now some 1,200 cases under prosecution.

They also desire Uncle Sam to put a clause in every lease for grazing lands which will require provision for winter feeding of range cattle. Hundreds of thousands of these beasts are known to perish each winter because it has been thought cheaper to stand the loss than to provide shelter and forage for the stormy periods. They are also interested in the great herds of elk about the Black Hole country, where a year ago forty per cent of the few thousands remaining perished because their natural grazing grounds had been taken by the sheep and cattle ranches.

Another, and a rather startling quest, is to do something to put an end to bull-fighting across the border in Mexico. Startling, because they have found that these fights are made possible by the tourists and others who cross the line to see them. President Diaz is engaged in a crusade against the bull-fight and this will prove a salutary move in his aid.

The Association has devoted much attention to cases of children, especially in the cities, and has done much to get laws and to protect the little ones from cruel and drunken parents. In some cities the society has semi-police powers and receives much help from the authorities. Twelve states have compulsory instruction in the schools relating to humanity toward the dumb world and the crusade is on to get such in every state. More than by prosecution of the guilty can the instruction of the coming generation aid so great and good a cause and one that lies close to the bottom of our civilization.

THE CHRISTIAN NO LONGER AN "INFIDEL"

The Mohammedan has always looked upon the Christian as an infidel. One of the results of the new era in Turkey is the declaration of the Shiek-Ul-Islam, the pope of Mohammedanism, that the Koran nowhere calls them such. He pleads that they be treated as friends.

There are indications already of the inevitable reaction from the jubilant recognition of each other by followers of the crescent and the cross. Some of the reformers are counseling that it would be better if the new Turkey were a Mohammedan power and that, while treating all people with equity only those of "the faith" should have a part in ruling.

The reform party, as ever, has two wings, and just how far the universal desire for retaining the rights gained will prevent them dividing over the how of using them, remains to be seen. One of the ministers has resigned on account of the differences and others may do so. Radicalism all too often retards progress by its determination to hurry the process of the suns.

The Gates of the East

The task of world evangelism is not a mere periodic interest which rises and falls with the changes of the calendar, but is one of perpetual and growing significance. Political events during the past three years have immensely widened the field of opportunity in the far East. Those who have recently traveled in China are of one voice in the declaration that the next few years will definitely determine the course of the empire for a long time to come. Professor Burton, of the University of Chicago, who is now traveling in the Orient as a government commissioner for the inspection of educational institutions, has repeatedly expressed himself upon this question and is most enthusiastic in his reports regarding missionary work in China. He believes that no more wonderful opportunity has been offered to Christianity in all of its history than now confronts it in that land.

The business of missions is far more complicated and far-reaching than the casual observer is led to suppose. It is not simply the proclamation of a faith; it is the creation of a civilization. Perhaps, at the present time, its most effective instruments are education and medical science. Sections of the world which are impervious to immediate and aggressive evangelism are opening their gates and welcoming western and Christian educational methods because they see that such methods are the instruments of success in the building of cities and states. This is Christianity's opportunity. Our civilization is going to the Orient, whether we will or not. The question is, What sort of a civilization shall it be? Commerce, industry, capital, exploitation are all surely and rapidly changing the character of the Orient. Are they the best interpreters of our western life? No one would for a moment contend that they are. It is Christianity alone that can give permanent enlargement and value to the lands thus invaded by western influence.

Medical missions have an equal value. The wonders wrought by the surgeon and the physician are as marvelous to the untrained oriental as the miracles of the apostolic age. They are the signs and wonders of the West and ought to be the tokens of Christian power. Households and communities that close their doors against the preaching of the gospel are willing to admit the doctor and the nurse. If these instruments are the propagandists of Christianity, it means that our holy faith is to be interpreted in terms of human welfare and betterment, and this was its very first interpretation at the hands of the Master.

Missions are, therefore, the dominant interest of the church. To mould the plastic clay of the new East is as fascinating a work as that of the sculptor in his studio, and is far more effective in reaching the life and influencing the future of our age. Every opportunity to have a part in this world-wide enterprise is a privilege which no open-minded Christian can neglect. The March offering for foreign missions is a golden milestone which records the arrival of a moment of immense interest in the annual calendar of every church. To fail then is to fail in an essential of Christian devotion. To meet nobly and generously that opportunity is to uplift the church and its members for an entire twelvemonth.

The Offering is at Hand

The Centennial March Offering for Foreign Missions is taken Sunday, March 7th. The great event is at hand. Stupendous reasons exist for an exceptional advance in the gifts of the churches.

Consider the success of the work. Statistics for 1908 show that we have in the United States 141,000 Protestant ministers, while there are less than 6,000 American missionaries on the foreign field. For 1908 the increase for Protestant church membership at home was 290,000, or 1½ per cent, while abroad American missionaries won 87,000, an increase of 12 per cent. The total number of native church members added in all fields, by all missionaries, was 164,674, or over 450 a day. This is an average of more than eight converts to each missionary, while the average number of additions for each minister in this country last year was only about two; that is, each missionary on the foreign field won four times as many converts as each minister at home, in spite of the great advantage in this country of existing churches, schools, Christian society, good laws, literature, etc.

How the success of our own work thrills all our own hearts! The story of our progress in the Philippine Islands and at Bolenge, Africa, equals that of any missionary history that has ever been written. For the brief time, the small force and the limited equipment, nothing in all the annals of missionary progress surpasses our own marvelous achievements. We do not mention this boastfully, but humbly and with a solemn sense of the responsibility that is involved. Not only the thousands of converts, but the genuineness of faith and rectitude of their lives is another illustration of the power of the simple gospel to transform and uplift the most degraded. The faith and daring and liberality in all these missions puts us all to shame. What a rich heritage of love and loyalty our churches at home have in these stations, which are bright stars in the black night of darkest heathenism! The story is the same, in a different form, in Japan, China and India, and wherever our much loved brethren have gone with the gospel. When we have prayed for success, our prayers have been more than answered. Do we believe our own eyes and ears when we see and hear these miracles of grace? Will we take care of what we have won? Will we provide for our own offspring which God has given us? These and kindred questions will be answered March 7th.

How anxiously tens of thousands of our people have looked forward to this Centennial year! Our plea is enshrined in the hearts of a million people. To thousands it is dearer than life itself. This is a season when we recount the trials and conflicts of the past. We catch the spirit of the fathers who gave time and fortune and life itself that this simple plea might be known to the world. They believed in giving the gospel to the whole creation. This with them was a holy passion. Alexander Campbell said, "The church of Jesus Christ is, in her nature, spirit and position, necessarily and essentially, a missionary institution." No finer uninspired interpretation of the church was ever given. This great statement, true to the entire teaching of the Book, reflects the position of the able group of men who were his co-laborers. If we falter on the 7th of March, we will not be of the same stamp and blood and spirit of the men whom we profess to honor. That is the day for great daring, for mighty effort, for heroic giving. If we do something really great and worthy, it will be remembered and reflected in the lives of our people for the next hundred years. A gift of a half million of dollars by our churches would mightily impress the world and honor our Lord. May we not ask the churches to undertake to raise thousands instead of hundreds? We have many people that should honor themselves by giving $1,000 and more. Many of the smaller churches, in the habit of raising $50 to $100, could more easily raise $500. Let us put God to the test. He will open the windows of Heaven to those of large faith and boundless horizon. How dare we go up to the great Centennial Convention, to celebrate the publication of the "Declaration and Address," if our gifts are only nominal for the world's evangelization. That document in teaching and spirit involved the union of the people of God that the world might be evangelized. To raise $400,000 is not impossible, but easily within our power.

Paragraphic Editorials

The editorial correspondence on the W. A. Sunday revival in Springfield, Ill., which was to have begun in this issue has been delayed because Mr. Sunday's sickness compelled a week's postponement of the meeting. He began February 26, and our series, therefore, will quite likely start next week.

So many requests are coming to our office for back copies of the issues containing Prof. Willett's "Confession of Faith" that we cannot answer each one directly. We are sorry to report that those issues have for some time been exhausted. A number of ministers receiving our recent circular complain that they did not receive the four copies of the paper sent throughout the brotherhood. We are not able to account for this as the mailing list for circulars was made from the same year book as the list for the special issues. We regret to say that files of these issues are likewise exhausted. However, we delight to add, the succeeding numbers of the Christian Century are an improvement over any earlier issues if they are to be trusted who tell us that the paper is "getting better and better."

In connection with the evangelistic campaigns of Chapman in Boston, Gipsy Smith in St. Louis, Sunday in Springfield and Scoville in Des Moines, it is interesting to dig up the statistics of the Moody and Sankey meeting in 1877. If we get the idea that only in modern days enterprising preparations go into evangelistic meetings we are badly mistaken. A writer in the Congregationalist has consulted the files of the Boston newspapers and found that the cost of the meetings exceeded $41,000, the special tabernacle itself costing $32,000. In that campaign the newspapers of Boston were a great help. The railroads also cooperated by bringing excursions from surrounding towns at reduced fares. On the committee of arrangements Phillips Brooks' name appears in the list with many of Boston's most distinguished clergymen and laymen. The Journal reporter's impressions of the two evangelists are interesting:

"In personal appearance neither of the revivalists suggests the pictures of them which are so plenty in the newspapers and on the street corners. Neither would be taken for a man of particular piety, nor does either show in the face any trace of the yearning interest for souls which must animate them. They look like practical men who enjoy life. Mr. Moody is a stout man—very stout—with a round head mounted on a thick neck and almost resting on his shoulders. A full beard is all that prevents his face from being round also. His voice is not musical, nor yet disagreeable, but is on a high pitch when he begins to preach, growing in sharpness as he begins to warm up to his subject. His eye twinkles with much more than a hint of humor when some quaint idea comes to his mind; and all in all he is a man who wins one's good will in a little while. Mr. Sankey is a man of more angular features and slighter build, acute in the expression of his face, almost restless in his manner, with a pleasant voice when talking and a countenance that lights up wonderfully when he speaks or sings."

The extent to which human life is necessarily entrusted to physicians, nurses, and hospitals is well known to us all, and for the most part, we have great reason to find satisfaction in the skill with which disease is treated and the devotion with which those to whom our sick must be committed conduct themselves and the cases entrusted to their charge. But there are occasions which open the eyes and minds of thoughtful people to the grave danger involved in indiscriminate medical and surgical practice and the type of self-interest which is manifest in the conduct of some of the hospitals in a city like Chicago.

A recent experience of some of the Disciples in this city has brought this whole subject freshly to mind with a directness and warning which have had no equal for many years. A prominent member of our group here in Chicago was suddenly attacked by illness while absent from his residence. A physician who happened to be near was summoned and took him at once to a hospital whose reputation is, to say the least, more or less obscure. Here, with very slight preparations and under circumstances that might well call for inquiry, an operation was performed. The subsequent developments of the case gave cause for belief that the operation itself may not have been necessary and that the method of procedure was such as to entail the gravest consequences, culminating in death.

A tragedy of this character cannot but awaken in the minds of thoughtful people many reflections upon the responsibility of medical and surgical practice and at the same time illustrate the possibility of either unskillful or careless medical attendance with the most lamentable result. We owe too much to skillful and competent surgery not to be grateful for its progress and results. At the same time, the very success attained gives opportunity for the gravest abuses on the part of men whose only interest is the profit which may be made out of the business. These men are a disgrace to the profession and the public cannot be made too fully aware of their character.

Strictures are frequently made against the church on the ground that it is careless of its poor and needy. Unfavorable comparison is made between it and the lodge, which has the reputation of caring bountifully for the families of its members who are in trouble. Information has just come to our desk to the effect that the Jackson Boulevard Church of Chicago will make a worthy gift to Mrs. Stockdale as a token of their love for her and her husband, Parker Stockdale, their recent pastor, whose untimely death left a family of four small children with no adequate provision for their support. Certainly such an act as this will bring the blessing of God both upon those who receive and those who give. We wonder if the disparity between lodge and church in caring for those who suffer is not more a matter of system than of fact. The lodge does its work systematically, while the church deals with such particular cases as are called to its attention. Often no doubt, many suffer of whom the church is not informed. But our observation has been that, as a rule, church people are quick and generous to respond to a call for practical service of this sort. We recall off-hand in churches in Chicago such instances of practical helpfulness which demonstrate the alertness of the church to relieve distress. A brother moved to a distant state and embarked in a business venture that failed, leaving him in sore need. His brethren in Chicago heard of it, made up a purse, secured a store in the neighborhood and established him in it. His business is prospering and he is happy. Another brother fell into temptation, was discovered in irregular business dealing and confronted with publicity and shame. His pastor and brethren subscribed funds to satisfy creditors, at cost of much effort secured him a position, supported him by believing in him, until today he is re-established and prosperous and worthy the utmost confidence of his fellows. Again, a young man was discovered living a lie before the community and the church. In shame he was driven by his own soul to break off connections with his church companions and to revive his habits of dissipation. Down and out, the church sought for him, won him back, made for him a place in its love and its work. Today he is standing on his feet. No, churches are not ungrateful, nor pharisaic as a rule. Only God's books can reveal the uncounted, unselfish deeds of love which they inspire.

Mexico as Opportunity

Its Variety of Climate—Its Prospects for the Land Buyer—Its Hopes of Improvement—An Open Door for Christian Work.

BY. J. A. ADAMS

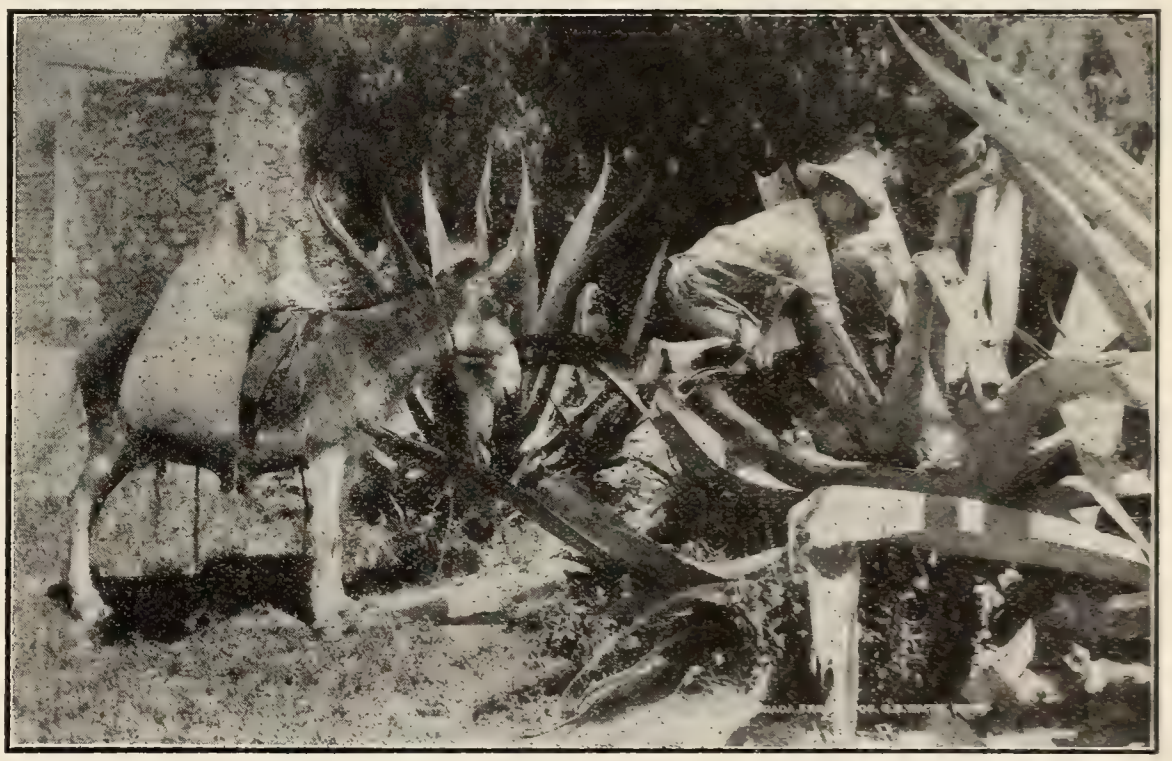
It is the boast of Mexico that its climate is unequaled. In other lands variety comes from extent of latitude. In Mexico it comes from a change of altitude. It is a land bounded on the bottom by the sea and on the top by the sky. In the lowlands there is eternal summer. On the topmost peaks of the mountains it is eternal winter.

I sat down on a roadside by a coffee plantation on a January day and looked away at Mount Orizaba, snow-clad and gleaming in crystal clearness. In the field a boy was picking the purple coffee berries from the long and slender twigs and a man was trimming the hibiscus hedge which surrounded the place, the great red flowers in full bloom, while within were bananas and oranges, and mocking birds and red birds whistling from their shady retreats in the green foliage. Further away were sugar cane fields and corn fields and meadows, with grass as high as a horse's back. In some of the fields the corn was in shock, in others it was in silk and tassel, and in still others it was just coming up.

Mexico has all the climates at the same time. And the people can take their choice. They can go down the Vera Cruz or Isthmus way and raise coffee and sugar and rubber and bananas and oranges, and cattle and horses; or they can go up on the plateaus and raise barley and wheat and the maguey.

Some Drawbacks.

But just here there is need of a word of qualification. Mexico is too much given to plateaus. On the Pacific side is a range of mountains and over on the eastern side is another range; scattered through these ranges are plateaus and between them is a great central plateau which extends nearly the whole distance of the country from north to south and which averages from five thousand to eight thousand feet above the sea. This plateau enjoys the reputation of having ten months of spring, but from a railroad train much of it looks as dreary as desolation. There are endless stretches of sand or cactus and Spanish dagger with no stream for a hundred miles at a time. Here and there is a hacienda, and mining camps may be seen in the distance. Foothills are banked against the horizon and now and then the train whirls through a tunnel. When it comes out a long stone wall may be seen winding over the sides of the hills for miles. But what these walls were built for is something which not even the conductor can tell.



What to Raise.

If I were going to Mexico to buy land I should not stop until I was 200 miles or more south of the capital, and then I should purchase a large tract, divide it into smaller farms and raise the price. That is the best thing that I know of to raise in Mexico. The promoters do this and let the after fellows raise the crops. The advantages of the plan are apparent. When the promoter takes a carload of land seekers to some valley of tangled grass down toward the Isthmus and closes out his deals with them he can get on the next train and come back home and live in "God's country." The purchasers are landed to stay.

The Americans who are making money out of Mexico are not generally living there. It is said that as much as $750,000,000 of American money has been invested in the republic, but no corresponding proportion of our people have settled there. The money has gone into all kinds of "propositions," some of which were largely on paper, but others included valuable mining properties, oil fields, splendid tracts of timber, railroads and factories. A large share of the silver of the western world has come out of Mexico, and there are those who think that the mining industry of the country is still in its infancy. A California company is making enormous profits from an oil field near Tampico, and the Standard Oil Company is also there with its usual methods. A gentleman direct from the great forests west of Durango told me that he knew of no other such timber lands which could be purchased for so low a price.

Very Primitive.

As for factories, Mexico is almost bare ground. It is difficult to believe that so old a country could still be so primitive. It is true that we saw some steam threshing machines in the barley fields, but right along side of them we also saw farmers tramping out their grain with mules. Even at so old and charming a little city as Cordova women go to the neighboring creeks to wash their clothes. They stand in the water up to their knees and rub the clothes on stones; then they hang them on the bushes or wire fence to dry. In the same city also I saw men dipping candles in the old-fashioned way. And yet the hotel had electric lights, and a fountain was playing in the beautiful patio which made the interior of the palatial place. On the train I met a gentleman who told me that he was running a canning factory in Mexico City. Among other things, he was canning peaches which he said were brought a four days' journey on the backs of mules. One of the greatest drawbacks to the business, he added, was the high cost of fuel—he was paying $16 per ton for soft coal. But I should say that a greater difficulty would be to find enough people in Mexico who have money to buy canned goods.

The Maguey Plant, from the Juice of Which Pulche, the Native Drink is Made.

Population a Question.

That a sister republic just across a little river from us should be so backward is one of the things which almost stuns the American visitor. It is said that the population is not as great as it was a hundred years ago; but surprisingly enough, nobody knows what the number of people is, for no census has been taken. Even the population of Mexico City is unknown; estimates run all the way from 350,000 to 500,000. A general census of the country is to be taken in 1910. At present the population is estimated at from 14,000,000 to 15,000,000. Of this number some think that no less than 9,000,000 are of the original Mexican stock, or Indians; but a more careful estimate makes the natives 43 per cent of the population; the mixed bloods, 38 per cent; and the Europeans or foreign element, 19 per cent.

The Indian Still Lives.

Whether entirely correct or not, these figures bring out a significant fact, namely, that Mexico is a country where the Indians have been permitted to live and move and have their being. The country has had revolutions and sorrows and troubles. It has been a battleground of warring factions and a whirlpool of angry passion. But the Indian tribes could and did live.

We have commiserated Mexico and have boasted of our order and progress, but our Indian has been swept from the earth. As a white man I am exceedingly glad that I was born in the greatest republic that the sun looks down upon, etc. The Mexican Indian must be equally glad that he was born on the other side of the Rio Grande. Therefore when we speak of Mexico as opportunity we must recognize this fact, that it has given the original American a chance to live. His life is not as large as that of the pale face, but it is better than enforced retirement to the "pale realms of shade."

Future Prospects.

But what prospect is there that Mexico will now rise to a higher level of civilization? To this question no adequate answer can be given from one short visit to the country, even if I did keep up an exhausting investigation, that is, exhausting to myself. But there are signs of promise which readily appear. In the first place, the Catholic prelates have been put on better behavior. The "Thieves' Market" is still a famous attraction in Mexico City, but indulgences to steal once a week are no longer in order, as was the case fifty years ago. And men and women can now be married by a magistrate if the priest puts his price too high. It is no longer necessary to omit the ceremony because of prohibitive expense. This is good for morals.

Public Schools.

In the next place the children are no longer engulfed in hopeless ignorance. There is a public school system and all the cities and towns have schools. In the federal district attendance is even made compulsory.

The curse of strong drink is still upon the country, and one sees great fields of maguey, from which the national drink is made. But the pulche shops are required by law to close at six o'clock in the evening. Even the women smoke, but a movement is now on in Mexico City to prevent smoking on the street cars and in other public places where women are present. The government is in the lottery business, making a million dollars a year out of it, and there are traveling lottery companies which go from place to place gathering in the money of the people. But there is little gambling in futures and the weather can change without setting a board of "bulls and bears" crazy.

Rubber Tree, 1 Year Old.

Protestant Missions.

I wish I could say more about missionary work than I can. It is here that the American visitor feels that we have not been equal to our opportunity. The Rio Grande is a small river, but we have been slow to carry the gospel across it. Capitalists have taken their hundreds of millions of money into the country and mountains and lowlands have been eagerly explored in search of opportunities to make fortunes, but we have put little money or service into the work of evangelizing this needy people. It would almost seem as if the greater part of American Protestants do not count Mexico when they read the command to "go into all the world." And yet those who have tried to do something claim that they have found a good open door. It was not until 1873 that the Methodists began their work in Mexico, and now, after being compelled to start on bare ground, they have 154 congregations, more than 6,000 members, and more than 4,000 children in their day schools. They also have a million dollars (Mexican money) worth of property, and their native adherents are contributing $100,000 per year for the work. It would be hard to find a more cheerful and optimistic man than Dr. John W. Butler, who is at the head of this work.

The Baptist missionaries are also full of enthusiasm over their work, pronouncing it a gratifying success. The Presbyterians have an American church in Mexico City, with a school for girls attached, and they have extended their missions toward the south. Our Congregational missions are located further north, and hence are not seen on a visit which begins at Laredo. But the only complaint heard from our missionaries is that the churches at home are so slow to enter the doors which they have opened.

Owe Mexico Something Better.

We have exploited the country with free hand and careless conscience, or no conscience at all. We took from Mexico 930,000 square miles of its territory, and left it but 767,000 square miles. Now we are fast taking possession of the most valuable mines and other great sources of wealth, and it makes one shudder to think that a people who were the prey of the Spaniards for 300 years and who struggled through revolutions and bitter calamities up to independence and republican government, are, after all, to have only the husks of the land, while its riches glide through alien hands into the luxurious life of other peoples or are squandered in the great capitals of the world. Must the great mass of the Mexicans forever toil for the benefit of others and forever shiver in the depths of hopeless poverty? To this question the commercial spirit will give no generous answer. It is only the Christian spirit that can look such questions honestly in the face, and give instead of take.

Cheering Prospects

BY F. M. RAINS, Secretary

The outlook for the missionary year is bright. The prospects are indeed cheering. Altogether there have never been more signs of promise.

1. One-third of the missionary year is gone. There has been a gain in the receipts of over $10,000. More churches, Sunday-schools, Endeavor Societies and individuals are giving. The increase in Annuity gifts has been exceptionally large.

2. A. McLean and S. J. Corey, who are conducting missionary Rallies in different parts of the country, give encouraging reports. The attendance is larger and the interest is deeper than in former years. They cannot by any means respond to all the calls for rallies. There is hardly standing room at the night services at some of these great meetings. Their enthusiasm over the results is boundless.

3. Christian Endeavor Day for Foreign Missions in all the Protestant churches in the world, the first Sunday in February, promises to be a record-breaker in our societies. This mighty army of good, rich, red blood, with determined purpose and a steady tread, is moving with momentum and power. Keep you eye on their pennant!

4. The prospects for the March offering were never before so bright. The office of the Foreign Missionary Society has an avalanche of orders for supplies. The signs all point to an increase in the number of churches participating. The vision of our people for the world's evangelization is being cleared as they study the Scriptures in the light of the present day opportunities. The doors of all the world swing wide open and bid us enter. This is a great time. The world never before witnessed anything like it. What mighty changes for good during the past year!

5. We are impressed, as we scan our increased volume of mail, with the determined purpose of the churches to do better than in former years. "We expect to make the largest offering in the history of this church," or some other such assurance of increased interest, occurs more frequently than in any former campaign. The churches are coming to see that missions is their chief work. We believe that we can confidently hope for a larger average offering than in any former year. A number of churches are putting their apportionments at a higher mark.

6. It was felt that last year the Foreign Society had reached its limit in the field of Living-links. This was a mistake. The signs now point to more new Living-links than last year, and indeed more than in any former year. Almost daily we hear from churches that aspire to this rank. Churches of which we had never dreamed are preparing to enter it. A long list gives assurance of this worthy advance and the campaign is just fairly opening. The older churches in this column will stand firm, with frequent advances in gifts, while the fresh, new recruits augment their number. The Living-link service promises great things this year.

In a word, the prospects are as bright as the promises of God. Our people are growing in all graciousness and helpfulness. Holy living is becoming an increasing experience with them and this is the real hope of the March offering.

If you have ordered March offering supplies, we will be pardoned for urging that the best possible use be made of them. The preparation should be made with painstaking care. A great offering is no accident. It is the result of much labor and prayerful thought.

If you have not ordered supplies, please attend to it today.

Our First Enterprise

The first call of our National Christian Bible-school Asociation is for the Bible-schools to make March 28, a great day for the Adult Departments. On that day, it is hoped by our great Bible-school leaders and superintendents, to have every adult member of our churches present and enrolled in a class. It is also hoped that every class organized by that date may have the International Certificate of Recognition from the Adult Department of the International Bible-school Association.

The pains with which we set ourselves to this great rally, March 28, will mean more than can be expressed for the Bible-school interests of our Brotherhood. It will be a worthy preparation for the great program we are preparing for the Bible-school work at Pittsburg Convention. Let all of our schools lay hold of this day to help on our great interests.

National Supt. Bible-schools.

Three Distinguished Visitors

The Spiritual Life of Denver touched by the Messages of a Catholic Bishop, a Missionary Hero and a Y. M. C. A. Leader

BY B. B. TYLER

Denver has recently been visited by three variously distinguished men, to wit: James J. Keane, Roman Catholic Bishop of Wyoming, Dr. W. T. Grenfell, of Labrador, and Mr. Geo. S. Phelps, member of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, Kyoto, Japan.

Bishop Keane came to Denver to deliver six discourses in the interest of his great church, under the auspices of a fraternal organization known as the Knights of Columbus. The lectures were delivered in the Auditorium, the building in which the National Convention of the Democratic party was held last Summer, and the following subjects were discussed by the prelate: (1) "The Reasonableness of Belief in God"; (2) "What Manner of Creed Can Satisfy Man's Religious Wants"; (3) "Jesus Christ: His Origin and Mission"; (4) "Christianity and the Pope"; (5) "Christianity and the Bible"; (6) "Why I am a Catholic."

Besides discussing these topics the Bishop considered a large number of questions concerning the faith, practice, and history of the Roman Catholic Church. He was intensely interesting. The time spent in hearing him was well occupied. I speak for myself. Bishop Keane impressed me as being an unusually sincere man. His manner is dignified, grave, courteous. His mental grasp of the position of his church is remarkably clear and strong. There is no confusion of thought in his mind. His language is select. His words are chosen with great care. His sentences are crisp, clear, brief. The spirit of Bishop Keane is worthy of highest commendation. He is a diplomatic master. He studiously and successfully avoided giving offense. This was a "Mission" to Protestants. The purpose of those who arranged the lectures, and of the "Missioner" was three-fold. (1) The removal of prejudice; (2) The creation of sympathy; (3) The giving of instruction—the impartation of information.

Confounding Things that Differ.

Bishop Keane confounds things that differ. He, for instance, confounds Roman Catholicism with Catholicism. Catholocism is one thing; Roman Catholicism is quite a different thing. Catholicism is absolutely free from sectarianism. Roman Catholicism is intensely sectarian.

The Bishop confounded Christianity and Roman Catholicism. Usually, when he pronounced the word Christianity, he meant the Roman Catholic conception of Christianity. His discourses entitled, "Christianity and the Pope," and "Christianity and the Bible," were really addresses on, "Roman Catholicism and the Pope," and "Roman Catholicism and the Bible."

The address entitled, "Christianity and the Bible" was an interesting lecture on, "Roman Catholicism and the New Testament." But the Bishop of Wyoming is not the only man who assumes that the articles of belief, and the usages of his party are the faith and practice taught, and enjoined, by the Christ and his elect ambassadors.

It is estimated that 49,000 persons heard Bishop Keane during his visit to Denver. The smallest single audience was 6,000 persons. This was at a time when the temperature was down to zero and the wind was moving at the speed of about fifty miles an hour. On two occasions as many as 10,000 men and women assembled to hear the distinguished "Missioner."

Why do not those who believe in the Christianity of the church as it is represented in the New Testament arrange for lectures. on this comprehensive scale, on the "brotherhood" not be ashamed to take a hint from "The Knights of Columbus." In almost any community arrangements could be made for such a course of lectures. The purpose of the lectures would be educational. Their character would be unsectarian, i. e., in the true sense of the word, catholic.

Grenfell of Labrador.

Our second distinguished visitor was Dr. W. C. Grenfell. Dr. Grenfell is a university man, a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, London, a master mariner, an English magistrate, or justice of the peace, a practicing physician, a Christian missionary among the deep sea fishermen off the coast of Labrador, agent for Lloyd's underwriters, and general business manager for 6,000 inhabitants of Labrador. For twenty years this high-toned, cultured, Christian gentleman has given his life freely, even joyfully, to the poor, the ignorant, the uncared for, and the grievously wronged, fisher folk of the Labrador coast. Wilfred C. Grenfell is a Christly man, in the spirit of his mind, in the purpose of his life, in the character of his work. I heard one of his "talks." The modesty of this great man is evident. Before an audience he seems to be timid. He is awkward in his manner. He believes in Christ. Of this there can be no reasonable doubt. He is willing to lay down his life for him. This is, in part, what he is doing. His supreme ambition is to be, and to live, as nearly as possible like "The Man of Gallilee." The address that I heard was unique. His manner and speech were quaint. He was most impressive. The topic was not formally stated, but it was "The Fisher Folk of Labrador—Their needs and How to Supply them."

Great changes, and all for the better, have been produced among, and for, these simple minded people during the last two decades by Wilfred C. Grenfell.

Among other striking things that he said was this: "I am not greatly interested in the mistakes attributed to Jesus Christ in the New Testament; but, I am immensely interested in the present day wonders of moral and spiritual transformation wrought by him. These miracles are undoubted, unquestioned, and invaluable."

Such men as Dr. Grenfell help us to understand the mission and meaning of Jesus Christ.

The contrast between Bishop Keane and Dr. Grenfell, as they spoke to us, was most marked in this: The former was mediaeval—the latter was modern. The Bishop was especially interested in ecclesiastical machinery—the Doctor was supremely interested in the spirit of the Christ and its beneficent influence on the characters of men.

Mr. George S. Phelps, Y. M. C. A. Man.

Fourteen years ago George S. Phelps and his mother, were baptized in the South Broadway Christian Church, by William Bayard Craig. Since that date Mr. Phelps has become distinguished as an international Y. M. C. A. worker. He is a member of the International Committee, and for a number of years has resided at Kyoto, Japan. Six years have been spent in the Sunrise Kingdom. Mr. Phelps is spending some time in great and universally acknowledged fundamentals and essentnals of the Christian religion? It seems to me that such a course of lectures would be worth more to any community than is the average "revival" meeting.

Here is an opportunity for "The Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ." Let this the United States. In the South Broadway Church, his home church, on a recent Sunday evening, Brother Phelps spoke entertainingly, and instructively, on "the White Peril in the Far East." Brother Phelps will, if possible, attend our Centennial convention, in Pittsburg, next October. The address of which I speak is as good as the best that will be delivered on that memorable occasion.

He spoke to us, by way of introduction, of certain features of Japanese life and character by which he was most impressed, in the early period of his residence among these Oriental Yankees. He then spoke of the great success attending the work inaugurated by Francis Xavier, in the sixteenth century, and the reaction, with reasons for the same. He explained lucidly how it came to pass that the Christian religion was suppressed. Those who ought to have stood together were divided!

This brought him, in thought, to consider the present achievements and position of Christianity and "The White Peril in the Far East."

He mentioned three perils. The first is intemperance. The second is the greed for gold. The third is the social vice—sexual immorality.

Imitating American Vices.

Too many white men in Japan use intoxicants as beverages—too often to excess. The admiration of the Japanese for white men—especially Americans—leads them to imitate their conduct, even when their course of life is unworthy. The Japanese are becoming a nation of drunkards. There is, however, a temperance movement, and a rapidly growing sentiment against intoxication. The time was when a Japanese gentleman thought it beneath his dignity to even handle money! This base service was relegated to slaves, and often inferior persons! But the Japanese, in attempting to account for the greatness of the American people, and the tremendous power and prestige of the United States, have decided that the secret of these things is our abounding wealth. The immediate result is a well nigh universal greed for gold. The Japanese are rapidly becoming a covetous people.

The example of some white men encourages the social vice—sexual sin. They are, some of them, notoriously lax in their associations with the opposite sex. Whatever the American white man does is supposed to be right. Good form, therefore, the little yellow man feels, requires, certainly permits, him to associate illegitimately with women.

Count Ito was quoted as having said, recently, in the presence of 1,500 men, at the dedication of a Y. M. C. A. building, that the only hope of Japan is in the gospel of Christ. In it is found the permanent and satisfactory solution of Japanese perplexing problems. Valuable testimony this.

DEPARTMENT OF CHRISTIAN UNION

By Dr. Errett Gates

Unity in Truth and Life

I heard an Episcopal clergyman say at a union meeting a short time ago that he thought it fortunate that we had so many denominations. Each emphasized a phase of truth and so helped to "make up the whole round of truth."

It struck me at once as a most happy characterization of denominationalism. Denominations are built on truths; Christianity is built on life. Denominations come and go like the truths on which they are built. As long as truth or truths are made the basis of union among Christians there will be division; for truth is changing from generation to generation, and with it is changing the basis of union. Changing truth goes into the foundations of divisions; only the unchanging life and spirit can serve as the foundation of unity.

Division in Truth.

For nineteen hundred years the church has been trying to lay its basis of union in the truth, and during all this time there has been constant controversy, heart-ache, and division. Arion and Athanasian, Greek and Roman, Augustinian and Pelagian, Monophysite and Monothelite, Scotist and Thomist, Catholic and Protestant, Arminian and Calvinist, Baptist and Pedobaptist, have all alike been seeking the truth, and have all alike found division. The differences and divisions among them were not due to differences of ideal or object. One was just as sincere as the other in his quest for truth; and each thought the other equally insincere and dishonest.

That is the way it always happens. The man who does not find my truth or "our position," in his quest for truth, must be in league with darkness, for it is all as plain as day to us; or in league with evil, for all other ways must lead to evil, since ours led us to good. This is the natural history of religious bigotry. The bigot starts out by saying: Truth is one; I have found the truth; therefore all else in error. He is correct in his first promise, but incorrect in his second; hence his conclusion is wrong. He would have been nearer right if he had said: I have found truth, some truth, but not all the truth. Only God has all the truth.

Truth and Duty.

The moment we propose to a company of men to get together on the truth, we start a controversy. We always propose a search for truth when we want to escape duty. We have learned that that noble occupation—the quest for truth—which any man can profess whether good or bad, consecrated or unconsecrated, disarms reproach, and postpones decision. How convenient it was for Pilate when Jesus stood before him to propose a discussion of the truth. It was a question of duty which confronted Pilate, but he wanted to turn it into a quest for truth. The entire day could have been pleasantly spent talking about the truth of Plato and Zeno, if Jesus had yielded to the desire of Pilate. Pilate tried every subterfuge to get rid of the duty of that trying hour. But the Jews would not wait (their minds were made up) and Jesus would not argue.

Jesus' Truth was Life.

Jesus' truth was not the same kind of truth that Pilate wanted to discuss. His truth was to be organized into a reign of the truth—truth not merely to be talked about but obeyed. Jesus' truth was synonymous with life and duty. "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven." If Jesus had meant by his "kingdom of the truth" what the Greeks meant, and what we mean by the truth, he would have said: "Except your truth shall differ from the truth," etc. But with Jesus truth was righteousness, and doctrine was duty. All of Jesus' doctrines were descriptions of a life to be lived.

Unity in Life.

If during the next nineteen hundred years the church shall try to lay its basis of union in life, at the end of that period there will be unity instead of division. During the last nineteen hundred years there has been no difference of opinion among Christians as to what constituted heavenly love and charity. If these had been made the basis of union and the tests of fellowship instead of doctrines about the nature and person of Christ, the freedom of the will, and the form of baptism, all the controversies and wars of religion would have been avoided. And just these—brotherly love and charity—were the ultimate tests of discipleship, the basis of union among his followers, which Jesus laid down. He said: "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples if ye have love one for another." John declared: "God is love; and every one that loveth is begotten of God and knoweth God." "We know that we have passed from death to life, because we love the brethren."

The church has been saying, in flat contradiction of Jesus, that his disciples must be distinguished by other marks besides that of love. It has made other things more important than love; and instead of asking the convert: Do you love? Are you willing to lay down your life for the brethren? (This is what it means to believe in Christ) the church has been asking: Do you believe in the doctrine of the trinity, the doctrine of election and predestination, the doctrine of verbal inspiration, and other like doctrines? Of course there have been controversy, and hatred, and division. Christianity has been made to consist in something else besides brotherly love and charity. Christians have thought they could be Christians, and at the same time hate one another. Athanasians thought they could be Christians and exile Arians; Catholics thought they could be Christians and burn John Huss and Jerome of Prague; Protestants thought they could be Christians and whip Quakers at the tail of ox-carts; Calvinists thought they could be Christians and separate theselves from Arminians. All these various forms of hatred were entertained in the name of Jesus who said: "I say unto you, that every one who is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council; and whosoever shall say, thou fool, shall be in danger of the hell of fire."

Whoever maliciously hurts a human being ceases to be a Christian until he repents of the wrong. Jesus came to save, not destroy life; to help, not to hurt men. He went about doing good. He came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many. He, only, is a Christian who is like Christ in spirit and conduct. Jesus never gave any man the right to call himself a Christian, and, in his name, hurt another man for difference of opinion.

True Christianity.

Men think they can keep Christianity and give up unity, love, and kindness. Can we keep the daylight and give up the sun? Can we keep the spring and give up the water? Can we keep the music and give up the harmony? No more can we keep Christianity and give up brotherly love and kindness. It consists in these very things.

The line of separation between the sheep and the goats, in the last day, will be drawn between those who have practiced brotherly love and charity, and those who have not. Of all the men whom Jesus met or described, the one ideal man after his own heart—the saved man—was the Good Samaritan. He was Jesus' conception of a true Christian. And the conclusion that Jesus wants us to draw is, that he is the best Christian who is the best neighbor. No other question will be asked, and no other test will be applied in the last day.

Why can't the church begin today to lay the emphasis where Jesus laid it, not upon doctrines, forms, governments, and ceremonies, about which Christians always have and always will be divided; but upon the spirit, the life, the duty, on which Christians always have been united. The editor of the Biblical World, after discussing the hopelessness of Christian union upon the doctrinal or formal side of Christianity says: "Now Christianity is professedly the religion which Jesus founded, and to him therefore we naturally look for such elements in it as may be called essential and characteristic. From this standpoint it would seem that the unifying element must be sought ultimately in the realm of the Christian life—in personal lives lived in loyalty to the religious ideals of Jesus and in spiritual fellowship with the Father whom he revealed. In this, and perhaps in this only, lies the possibility of a unified Christendom."

A Revival in Nankin

A union meeting has recently been held in the Union Christian College (Disciple and Presbyterian) and the girls' school. The meetings were only a week in duration and it was necessary because of the distance to have the meetings divided and held in two different parts of the city at the same time. Mr. Frank Garrett and the writer preached part of the time, as did some of the Presbyterian brethren. The meetings commenced with confession of sin on the part of many of the Christian students. This was followed by those that have not confessed Christ making the good confession until over forty in the three schools have stood out before their fellows and made the good confession. We count that this is only the beginning of greater things.

The news comes from Gwang Wei that eighteen said in their recent meeting that they wanted to quit sin and follow Christ.

Twelve were baptized in Shanghai on Christmas day.

Three were baptized in Lu Chow Fu on Christmas day.

Twelve were baptized at Chu Cheo the end of October.

Toward the end of the year three were baptized at Nan Tung Chow and others are very near the kingdom.

Everywhere the spirit of revival is growing and we believe that the day long prayed for in China is dawning.

OUR CHURCH MEN

By John R. Ewers

Youngstown, Ohio

"Finding Our Brother"

Recently we agreed that if men are to be won to the church and kept there, some big job must be given them. In the next few weeks we want to consider some of these challenging tasks. Today let us think of the big appeal that comes to men in the work of leading other men into Jesus' Way. I prefer that term to the expression, "to join the church." To induce men to enter Jesus' Way means that they shall walk in His steps, and do His works. They shall love, sacrifice and, if the need arise, die, as he did. That is big enough to challenge anyone.

Grenfell the Hero of Labrador.

I had the great profit last evening of listening to Dr. Grenfell, the hero of the Labrador, the man whom the King delighted to honor. He took the choice of going to work among the low-lived fishermen of that coast, when he was in line for the highest honors as surgeon in England. For twenty years he has given his life, as Jesus would, to those people. He said his faith was that God needed men to work for Him, and that if he were willing, God would use him. Well, if you heard his story you would not doubt but that God has used him. What has he done? He has built a chain of hospitals down the coast, started a line of forty cooperative stores, put hundreds of saloons out of business, introduced reindeer for milk and food, established schools, churches and bible classes. He has brought sight to the blind, made the lame to walk and raised those who were as good as dead. He has linked faith with heroic work. He has united prayer with a genius to do the thing that needed to be done on the spot. Finding an old lady, dying in a pitiful cabin, with only a small boy to care for her, he knocked down the partition, made a box, put the old woman in it, took her to a good friend's house, provided food and care and nursed her back to life. Another man might have read a chapter and gone away. Grenfell did what Jesus would have done. It is a big job for a surgeon in a big city, surrounded by every appliance and with other helpers to cure the sick. But if a Christian doctor wants a big task, let him go to a new country, let him have no one with whom to advise, let him with his own meager resources meet the needs of simple folks.

I heard Dr. Grenfell tell the thrilling tale, which you have doubtless read, of how he was swept out to sea on an ice pack. How he made a pole by splicing together the legs of his dead dogs and, tying to the top his shirt, went to sleep with his live dogs packed about him, and of his rescue by five daring fishermen who found him next day.

Do We Want a Big Task?

Let no man talk about wanting a big task in the modern church after learning of Grenfell. I tell you we are not looking for hard tasks but rather for easy snaps and soft berths. It is easy to talk, but how many of us in our quest for a big work are willing to give up the house for the hut, the handsome income for the mere price of existence? Walking home from this lecture I was accompanied by the Boy's Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., who has recently entered the fellowship of my church, and he said, "The one idea which sticks with me is, 'I know the joy of doing some good without being paid for it.' " He also said, "The greatest hindrance to Christianity is conventional religion."

As for me I came home feeling mighty small. I had looked upon a hero. I had seen a man who had dared risk all for his Master's sake. I had seen a man who had done a dozen men's work, who is actually remaking the Labrador.

Now if we are in quest of challenging jobs we shall surely find one of these in a man's work for his fellow. Ever since Andrew found Peter and led him to the Saviour, men have found this work most thrilling and inviting. This is precisely what Jesus did with his groups of twelve and seventy. He made them fishers of men. He sent them out after their brothers. Study the historic groups of the Benedictines, Franciscans, Jesuits and others of similar organization, and what else was their master-motive? The Episcopalians have had for years their "Brotherhood of St. Andrew," which has gone on winning men while clubs galore, in other communions, have come and gone. I say this is full of deep significance. Certainly it is one great task. It is big enough to challenge and to hold.

Winning Men to Jesus' Way.

A man said to me recently, "The life of the ordinary Men's Club is three years. The first year you start the thing, the second it flourishes and the third it vanishes away." This is true of the "Aimless Club" as organized in many of our churches. I rise to propose the organization in many of our communities of a brotherhood having the one clear-cut, definite aim of winning men to Jesus' Way. Mind you, I do not say a club to get men into the church, as though that were an end. That is not an end. Men must be induced to live a certain new kind of life, that life is one of social service, the kind that Jesus most certainly did live. This Brotherhood of "Brotherhood-Finders" will lead the men in their mills, offices, stores and neighborhoods into a social group which lives together as brothers because recognizing themselves as God's sons, and who live to serve.

A prominent Baptist minister said the other day that recently in a great city, he had heard the ministers of a certain denomination discuss for two hours how they might get the men into their churches, but, he said, not once was it suggested how the church might be taken out to men. It would be easy to find fault with this statement, saying that the church must exist as a center, and that, therefore, the church must have members, which is all very true, but the church need not be selfish, the church need not want merely for the sake of having them, as an Indian grabs scalps, the church needs men for some other reason than that of raising the minister's salary. The ambition of the church should be to send out sons to help the world, not to possess a lot of men to adorn the pews. It means nothing to get a man unless we make him over into a Christ. There is truth in the cry that many a modern church has no more religion in essence than any fashionable club. Let us win men, but let us win them to Jesus' Way. Anything else means nothing.

Dr. Grenfell turned his back upon Government preferments, a fat salary, a social position, a soft place, and went out to the ice-bound coast of the Labrador to serve the fishermen. That was a motive large enough to appeal to one of earth's noblest sons. (It is worth saying, in a parenthesis, that he had no use for religion until he heard Moody preach, which is one fact for men who oppose evangelists to consider.)

The Men's Club Jesus Organized.

Jesus organized His Men's Club along the lines of winning other men and of doing the job that needed to be done on the spot. Remember that the great orders of the Middle Ages were built about this idea fully as much as that of seeking seclusion. Consider that the men's organization which has held longest together in these days is the "Brotherhood of St. Andrew." Weigh these facts well when you are trying to ascertain what the big motive for our men's work shall be. I do not say that this is the only thing. I say it is one great idea. I say it has been tried and has made good.

Such a club may be organized in connection with a Men's Bible class, or it may be built up for this one definite task. It will not, at first, appeal to a large number of men. It will demand pure, honest lives of its workers. Such a group will grow and will abide. The early disciples constituted a social group built around the person of Jesus. Stop and think of what Jesus told those men to do. To tell the gospel story? Yes. To cast out devils? Yes. To heal the sick? Yes. To teach what he had taught them? Yes. It was a program which would bring regeneration, or, if you do not like that term, new life, to any community. Thank God, this is the motive that wins, and we have doctors who heal and bless without thought of pay, we have attorneys who advise and guide and lead in reforms without caring for the plaudits of men, we have preachers who love and give their lives as living sacrifices with no thought of earthly reward, we have teachers who mix Jesus with their Latin, mathematics and literature, and who do a thousand unknown deeds of mercy, we have thousands of good common folks whose hearts overflow with essential Christianity. I believe in the great goodness of the plain people. The heart of the world is good. But there are a lot of vociferous fellows, whose god is lazy-ease, and whose ambition is the praise of men, who are finding fault with the church because it does not afford large tasks. God bless their simple souls, they have never touched the fringe of Jesus' garment. To all such I commend the life of Dr. Grenfell, who lost his life to find it. And as one practical method I commend the formation of groups in our churches which find their brothers and bring them to Jesus.

There is a wonderful revival taking place at Nankin, China. There have recently been forty confessions. A. E. Cory believes his is only the beginning of greater things. News comes also from Gwangwei that eighteen expressed a desire to turn away from their sins and follow Christ. Twelve were baptized at Shanghai on Christmas day.

There will be a note of triumph lacking at Pittsburg if the missionary offerings are not far in excess of any previous year. The first Sunday in March should be made memorable by such an outpouring of liberal gifts as we have never seen. Every church and every member of every church should have a worthy part in the offering for Foreign Missions.

CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RELIGIOUS LIFE

By George A. Campbell

It came upon me in my dream that, moved by the Spirit of God as He spoke to the Disciples through the Holy men of old, the vast numbers there gathered were being made anew for the service of the King. Their hearts had already been Christianized into one. Partizanship had given place to purity and peace; contentiousness to contentment; and cliques to Christ. The Spirit of love brooded over the great gathering.

I wondered if with the new unity there would come a new power of conquest. Surely, I thought, our unity will be used for great manifestations of our Savior's power. The world will believe when it witnesses the agreement and sweet fellowship of the church.

A Supreme Day in One Hundred Years.

It was a joy, almost ecstatic to feel that after a hundred years of pioneering with such marked success we had come to a greater day, indeed a supreme day. To feel that one was a part of a body so blessed brought a divine thrill; a thrill, not of false pride, but of universal love. I then knew that our brotherhood did not exist for itself, but for the world God loved.

The convention was still in session and God, we all knew, was still watching over his own. Our expectancy was great, though we were religiously calm. Those interested in evangelism, foreign and home work, waited reverently for Heaven's message.

Dreams often bring quick changes. All at once there appeared before me a vast city. Its people seemed such as no man could number. It was not the New Jerusalem; for it was filled with motly millions. There were laughter and gaiety, sobbing and despairing. There were magnificent palaces and wretched hovels. The richly attired passed the shivering poor without a look. Thousands were crammed in tenements not fit for animals. Some looked up with hope and prayer; but many were begrimed with sin. The churches appeared as mills grinding out white paper, or cleansing that which was stained; while no sooner than the white took form before me but the saloons did bespatter it with a vile liquid. "These are God's people," I said. Surely he will send our brotherhood to these, his million souls living without an opportunity to love and believe.

Flocking to the Great City.

I looked beyond the limits of the city; and lo! I beheld on its every side crowds of people coming towards it. Most came on trains, trains innumerable; a few walked. The travelers were mostly young. Who are these coming to this vast city already overcrowded? These are they who are leaving the farms, the little towns, etc., to come to the metropolis to seek their fortunes and to make their homes. These, too, are they who have gone west to the ocean and returned to the only pioneer region left, the city.

With this picture in my eye and mind, surely, thought I, God will lay it upon our hearts to turn our consecrated men to these seething troubled millions.

Again the convention hall was before me. A man like unto our Centennial Secretary was standing on the platform before the penitent audience. His official year was soon to close. Waiting for him to begin, doubtless, some wondered what he would now set his hand to. I so wondered. We did not wonder lonf. This man with the spirit of Shaftesbury soon told us of his decision. He had dedicated, without guarantee of support, his life to the city of the motly millions. All at once the auditors seemed to feel that this to them was the call of their God. They realized their terrible neglect.

Brotherhood Houses.

For moments mist was in my eyes. When I could look again I saw in the center of one of the densest populations a splendid building upon which was inscribed these words: "The Brotherhood House of the Disciples of Christ." God had spoken. Our people had come to have a conscience on the city. Those who love had given for those who need; and as a result the former had discovered their need, and the latter their love. These Brotherhood Houses became multiplied in all the great centers of our land; and became transforming churches of power. "The Brotherhood of Disciples of Christ" gave them its chief attention. They ministered to the whole life of man. They also brought thousands of laboring men, so long estranged, into vital relationship with Christianity. The day of missions in stores had come to an end with us. Christ was accorded the dignity and opportunity which are rightfully His.

Again my dream changed character quickly. I saw several spirit-souls walking slowly towards the platform. They were not the iron covenanters, but they were like them in that they were just men made perfect. They were delegates to our convention from "The Upper Gardens of God." They had forms like unto Livingstone Moffett, Carey, Judson, Morrison, Martyn, Chalmers, etc. They were the heroes of the cross now passed to their reward. Then, I thought, men in the spirit world are missionaries of light and love. The world mourned their death because it had need of them. We see them still as workers. How know we what worlds have need of saintly men! I now understood that we were in a session of the Foreign Society. How fitting that the heroic heralds of the cross, long dead, should look in upon us. I felt as never before that we were no ephemeral institution. We were bound to the church of the past with all its glory of sacrifice and martyrdom. I saw that we were compassed about by great clouds of witnesses. Death does not end interest in this world of conflicts. It was borne home to me that the universe of God is one.

The Great Missionaries and Our Secretaries.

The spirit-souls of the great missionaries of the cross sat upon the platform. We were to hear from them. Then they dissolved into our secretaries and several of our missionary pastors. I was not disappointed; for these I knew were now baptized with the eternal. "Their faces were smote with the glory of God" when one by one they spoke to us. They talked not of money. They did not noisily exhort. The serenity and certainty of divine trust possessed them. Several of them happily related how they had decided to give up their large pastorates and go to the foreign field. Then mist filled my eyes.

When I could again see, I beheld ships sailing in all parts of the world bearing many of our choicest and greatest preachers and laymen, to bear the transforming story of the cross as Livingstone and Chalmers and all between had borne it in days of yore. I saw again an uprising of the people in all our churches to fill to overflowing the missionary coffers. I saw an uprising of mothers to dedicate their sons and daughters to the Christ of their emancipation.

The day of labored coaxing had passed; the day of Pentecostal enthusiasm had come.

Evangelists of Yesterday and of Today.

Again my dream made a quick and weird change. I saw a company of spirit-souls walk to the platform and take their seats thereon. They had the faces of Wesley, Whitfield, Taylor, Law, Edwards, Scott, Stone, etc. These had been, while on earth, efficient evangelists of the cross. Fitting it was that they should come to visit the convention of a great evangelistic people. They were now purged from all dross. The effect of their visit could not help but be an exceedingly kindly benediction. They seemed by their countenances to express pride over our evangelistic fervor. I felt that we were in the true apostolic succession with regard to evangelism. We had gone everywhere preaching the Gospel. Our evangelists had met with great success.

I turned to look at the spirit-souls on the platform, when lo! they were gone, and there sat many of our evangelists in their places. They seemed to me to be deeply spiritual men. They had the glow of saints upon their faces. I knew they were en rapport with the Divine. In the evangelistic sessions, as they talked to us we were all uplifted to great spiritual heights. Their prayers were subdued, calm, mighty. The unfaith of effort was not theirs. They were easy, confident, masterful. The strength of each was the strength of ten because he was purified in heart and soul. Ambition was absent. There was no effort to excell. No one tried to make an impression. Words were discounted as the Spirit did His work. The session was far from a talk-fest. All of us felt a great revival proceeding in our hearts.

Widespread Uplift of the Churches.

The mist had again filled my eyes. When I could see I noticed throughout our great brotherhood the churches full, the attendants coming on time. I noticed all the work of the churches progressing with delightful pleasure. The poor and the widow were cared for. The homes of all our members were homes of delight and of love. Home altars were everywhere restored. The world took notice of the change and because of this thousands acknowledged the faith. The day of talked-up-meetings had passed. The day of God's outpouring and man's receiving had come.

The Hymns that Abide.

Again the characters changed. There sat the spirit-souls of Watts, Newman, Matheson, Charles Wesley, etc.

These I know as hymn writers of the church. They were there to help us praise their King and ours aright. We had done them honor. We had sung.

"Lead Kindly Light. Lead Thou Me On";

and then

"O Love that Wilt Not Let Me Go"

and again

"Jesus Lover of My Soul."

but still they looked somewhat sad. I wondered why. Then I asked myself: Have we produced hymns, even one, worthy of these? I could think of none. But I felt sure that with their benediction upon us some of our musicians would be inspired to sing to God an abiding hymn. It was even so. Mist filled my eyes for a time. When I could again look the assembly was singing a never-to-be-forgotten hymn, composed by one of our own members. I thought I had never heard such a hymn. It breathed the deepest reverence. The touch of the holy dead was upon it. Yet it throbbed with sympathetic life. It was a mightly call to the service of man. It strengthened me anew for the battle. I said, "It is worth a hundred years' history to produce such a hymn of praise.

Thus I dreamed. The glory and strength of a purified past had come to hearten us on our way. Amid the changes of the present we knew that the reality of our religion changes not. Anew I felt obligated to the workers that had gone before. In my dream I repeated these lines:

"O the way sometimes is low,
And the waters dark and deep,
And I stumble as I go.

But I have a tryst to keep;
It was plighted long ago
With some who lie asleep.

And though days go dragging slow,
And the sad hours gravewards creep;
And the world is hushed in woe,

I neither wail nor weep,
For he would not have it so,
And I have a tryst to keep."

DEPARTMENT OF BIBLICAL PROBLEMS

By Professor Willett

Dear Brother Willett: Rev. 7:4-8, contains a puzzle to me. "A hundred and forty-four thousand sealed out of every tribe of the children of Israel."

Then in the list of tribes you will note the tribe of Dan is omitted and the tribe of Manasseh is substituted. This gives the tribe of Joseph 18,000.

Can you throw any light on it in your department? Yours truly,

F. M. McHale.

Richland Center, Wis.

The list of the twelve tribes was somewhat flexible in the tnought of the biblical writers. The sons of Jacob included Joseph and Levi. But the tribes which actually held territories did not include either of these names, but divided Joseph into two tribes after the names of his sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, excluding Levi, which held only certain local possessions in various parts of the land. In the list of Num. 13 Joseph represents Manasseh and Levi is omitted. In that of Deut. 33 Joseph stands for both Ephraim and Manasseh, and Simeon is omitted altogether. In 1 Chron. 12 Ephraim Manasseh and Levi are all named, making thirteen tribes in all. The same is true of Ezek 48. In these instances Joseph is evidently thought of as counting but one, though actually representing the two tribes of Ehpraim and Manasseh. It seems likely that the tribal names were held rather loosely in mind, and since there were actually thirteen tribes, and yet the number twelve was the one felt to be more appropriate in the national register, the smaller tribes, which as a matter of fact early lost their places and were absorbed in the rest of the nation, tended to be omitted from the lists as they took form in later times. Among such tribes were Simeon and Dan. It must be remembered that after Solomon's redistricting of the land, the tribal boundaries were largely obliterated, and tribal separateness in large measure ceased. It was only as an ideal that the tribes were still thought of in their twelve-fold completeness. There seems to be no other reason for the omission of Dan in the text referred to.

I have been reading about the temptations of Jesus Christ, and after consulting Drs. Whedon and Barnes, I am not satisfied with either explanation

Dr. Whedon in his commentary on Matthew, page 59, says, "Arriving like a thought at his destination, Satan lays no hand upon him; all is done as we may suppose, by the power and the quickness of a volition. And as the Saviour's bodily eye took in the limits of the prospect, his perceptive faculty, outreaching its material organ, acquiring the sweep of Satan's own vision, beheld all the kingdoms of the earth and around the globe thereof, in an instant of time."

Dr. Whedon leaves one to suppose the literal reading of King James' translation is correct, and Dr. Barnes in his "notes," gives one to think that the Devil went with Jesus up into the mountain, and to the pinnacle of the temple. Many questions arise in one's mind when he makes literal the going of Jesus, or the taking of Jesus up into the mountain. R. L. V.

Toulon, Ill.

Clear distinction must be made between the temptation of Jesus and the form in which that temptation is pictured in the Gospels. No doubt the form is figurative, but the temptation itself was a most deep and searching reality. As the questioner says, there are many inquiries which press for explanation if the literal character of the narrative is held. Was the Satan present in bodily and visible form, or was the temptation subjective, the result of facing the great alternatives presented to our Lord? Did Jesus come back to Jerusalem and ascend to the pinnacle of the temple during the time of his stay in the wilderness, or was this one of the possibilities suggested in the testing of his soul? Did Jesus really go to some mountain where a wide vision could be gained, and if so, what mountain could be thought of from which even a very few of "all the kingdoms of the world" could be seen? Do not these very questions suggest their own answers by the difficulties which a literal interpretation of the narrative would involve?

In fact are we not in danger, while insisting upon the form of the temptation, of missing its meaning for Jesus and ourselves? Surely we need have no controversy with anyone who still thinks the literal treatment of the account the most natural and valuable. The very difficulties in such a use of the figurative view of the event would at least suggest the fact that it is the substance and not the form of the narrative which has chief value.

That substance lies in the fact that Jesus was really tempted. His experience was no mere tableau to attempt to relate his life to ours. It was a most searching and crucial trial of soul through which he passed. At the very beginning of his career he stood at the parting of the ways. One led to the realization of the nation's Messianic hopes of political deliverance. The other led to the possible failure of all those hopes through unswerving fidelity to the higher interests of the kingdom of God. On his choice everything depended. It was not a choice between good and evil, but between two different interpretations of what the highest good really was.

We can easily say that Jesus would not be tempted as we are to mere physical satisfaction in the making of bread from the stone. But would not the temptation to test his power as the Son of God be even more searching than our own desire for bread? Perhaps he shared but little our love for display that would make attractive an unharmed leap from the temple turrets to the astonishment and admiration of the crowd below. But might not his desire to prove to the people that he was the divinely commissioned Messiah with power, and at the same time to test the Father's providential love for him, have been alluring enough to make him weigh the alternatives with travail of spirit? It may be true that Jesus would hardly feel the same kind of political ambition which seizes upon smaller men. But may not the thought of having that very world which he had come to save given over to his leadership and love have seemed worthy of his supreme desire and effort?

In this path lies the clew to the temptation of our Lord. It was no pageant. It was a most real and terrible experience. The older contention that Jesus was incapable of being tempted would remove him forever from any actual significance as an example and leader. The former dictum "non peccare posse" has given way to the more satisfying truth of "posse non peccare." We do not longer teach that Jesus was unable to sin, but that he was able not to sin. In this fact lies the uniqueness and yet exemplary nature of his life.

Viewed from the position of our human experiences, how representative are the temptations of the Lord. There was the appeal to physical appetite, to pride and egotism and to ambition. These are not evils in themselves, but they are the foundations of all the evils that curse the race. Or once more, we may say that the three temptations are the allurements of the advancing periods of life. The first is the temptation of youth to self-gratification by indulgence in the desires of the appetite and flesh. The second is the enticement of young manhood, the love of display and self-flattery. The third is the temptation of mature life, the love of power, the gratification of life's ambitions.

But beyond all these meanings for our own lives there lies the deeper fact of the agonizing days spent by Jesus in which every appeal to temporary success, popular applause, the realization of the most pleasing hopes of his people and the leadership of the world battled in his soul with the purpose to carry out the Father's will upon the highest level of righteousness and self-denial. For such a scene no canvas could ever be adequate, no colors sufficiently striking, no word pictures or figures of speech bold enough. But when he came back from the wilderness the first great victory had been won. The temptation to accept the lesser good had been put under foot. He was ready for his work, and he went forward, unhasting and unresting, to its divine consummation.

A man of some prominence in one of our churches said, "I would give money to build railroads in China, but not a cent for missions. The missionary enterprise is all a mistake." He is not alone in that feeling. If it is a mistake, it is Christ's mistake and not ours. He contemplated nothing less than the conquest of the whole world. He expects that. He cannot see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied till all nations have accepted the gospel.

CHAPTER V.

Miss Barrington Comes Home.

The long train was slackening speed and two whistles rang shrilly through the roar of wheels when Miss Barrington laid down the book with which she had beguiled her journey of fifteen hundred miles, and rose from her seat in a corner of the big first-class car. The car was sumptuously upholstered, and its decorations tastleful as well as lavish, but just then it held no other passenger, and Misss Barrington smiled curiously as she stood, swaying a little, in front of the mirror at one end of it, wrapping her furs about her. There was, however, a faint suggestion of regret in the smile, and the girl's eyes grew grave again, for the soft cushions, dainty curtains, gleaming gold and nickel, and equable temperature formed a part of the sheltered life she was about to leave behind her, and there would, she knew, be a difference in the future. Still, she laughed again, as, drawing the little fur cap well down upon her broad white forehead, she nodded at her own reflection.

"One cannot have everything, and you might have stayed there and reveled in civilization if you had liked," she said.

Crossing to the door of the portico she stood a moment with fingers on its handle, and once more looked about her. The car was very cosy, and Maud Barrington had all the average young woman's appreciation of the smoother side of life, although she had also the capacity, which is by no means so common, for extracting the most it had to give from the opposite one. Still, it was with a faint regret she prepared to complete what had been a deed of renunciation. Montreal, with its gayeties and luxuries, had not seemed so very far away, while she was carried west amid all the comforts artisans who were also artists could provide for the traveler, but once that door closed behind her she would be cut adrift from it all, and left face to face with the simple, strenuous life of the prairie.

Maud Barrington had, however, made her mind up some weeks ago, and when the lock closed with a little crack that seemed to emphasize the fact that the door was shut, she had shaken the memories from her, and was quietly prepared to look forward instead of back. It also needed some little courage, for, as she stood with the furs fluttering about her on the lurching platform, the cold went through her like a knife, and the roofs of a little prairie town rose up above the willows the train was now crawling through. The odors that greeted her nostrils were the reverse of pleasant, and glancing down with the faintest shiver of disgust, her eyes rested on the litter of empty cans, discarded garments, and other even more unsightly things which are usually dumped in the handiest bluff by the citizens of a springing Western town. They have, for the most part, but little appreciation of the picturesque, and it would take a good deal to affect their health.

Then the dwarfed trees opened out, and flanked by two huge wheat elevators and a great water tank, the prairie city stood revealed. It was crude and repellant, devoid of anything that could please the most lenient eye, for the bare frame houses rose, with their rough boarding weathered and cracked by frost and sun, hideous almost in their simplicity, from the white prairie. Paint was apparently an unknown luxury, and pavement there was none, though a rude plank platform straggled some distance above the ground down either side of the street, so that the citizens might not sink knee deep in the mire of the spring thawing. Here and there a dilapidated wagon was drawn up in front of a store. With a clanging of the big bell the locomotive rolled into the little station, and Maud Barrington looked down upon a group of silent men who had sauntered there to enjoy the one relaxation the desolate place afforded them.

There was very little in their appearance to attract the attention of a young woman of Miss Barrington's upbringing. They had grave bronze faces, and wore, for the most part, old fur coats stained here and there with soil, and their mittens and mocassins were not in good repair; but there was a curious steadiness in their gaze which vaguely suggested the slow stubborn courage that upheld them through the strenuous effort and grim self-denial of their toilsome lives. They were small wheat-growers who had driven in to purchase provisions or inquire the price of grain, and here and there a mittened hand was raised to a well-worn cap, for most of them recognized Miss Barrington of Silverdale Grange. She returned their greetings graciously, and then swung herself from the platform, with a smile in her eyes, as a man comes hastily, and yet as it were, with a certain deliberation in her direction.

He was elderly, but held himself erect, while his furs, which were good, fitted him in a fashion which suggested a uniform. He also wore boots which reached half-way to the knee, and were presumably lined to resist the prairie cold, which few men at that season would do, and scarcely a speck of dust marred their lustrous exterior, while as much of his face as was visible beneath the great fur cap was lean and commanding. Its salient features were the keen and somewhat imperious gray eyes and long straight nose, while something in the squareness of the man's shoulders and his pose set him apart from the prairie farmers, and suggested the cavalry officer. He was in fact Colonel Barrington, founder and autocratic ruler of the English community of Silverdale, and he had been awaiting his niece somewhat impatiently. Colonel Barrington was invariably punctual, and resented the fact that the train had come in an hour later than it should have done.

"So you have come back to us. We have been longing for you, my dear," he said. "I don't know what we should have done had they kept you in Montreal altogether."

Maud Barrington smiled, though there was a brightness in her eyes and a faint warmth in her cheek, for the sincerity of her uncle's welcome was evident.

"Yes," she said, "I have come back. It was very pleasant in the city, and they were all kind to me, but I think, henceforward, I would sooner stay with you on the prairie."

Colonel Barrington patted the hand he drew through his arm, and there was a very kindly smile in his eyes as they left the station and crossed the track towards a little, and by no means very comfortable, wooden hotel. He stopped outside it.

"I want to see the horses put in and get our mail," he said. "Mrs. Jasper expects you and will have tea ready."

He disappeared behind the wooden building, and his niece standing a moment on the veranda watched the log train roll away down the faint blur of track that ran west to the farthest verge of the great white wilderness. Then with a little impatient gesture she went into the hotel.

"That is another leaf turned down, and there is no use looking back, but I wonder what is written on the rest," she said.

Twenty minutes later she watched Colonel Barrington cross the street with a bundle of letters in his hand. She fancied that his step was slower than it had been, and that he seemed a trifle preoccupied and embarrassed, but he spoke with quiet kindliness when he handed her into the waiting sleigh, and the girl's spirits rose as they swung smoothly northwards behind two fast horses across th prairie. It stretched away before her, ridged here and there with a dusky birch bluff or willow grove under a vault of crystalline blue. The sun that had no heat in it struck a silvery glitter from the snow, and the trail swept back to the horizon a sinuous blue-gray smear, while the keen, dry cold and sense of swift motion set the girl's blood stirring. After all, it seemed to her, there were worse lives than those the Western farmers led on the great levels under the frost and sun.

Colonel Barrington watched her with a little gleam of approval in his eyes. "You are not sorry to come back to this and Silverdale?" he said, sweeping his mittened hand vaguely round the horizon.

"No," said the girl, with a little laugh. "At least I shall not be sorry to return to Silverdale. It has a charm of its own, for while one is occasionally glad to get away from it, one is even more pleased to come home again. It is a somewhat purposeless life our friends are leading yonder in the cities. I, of course, mean the women."

Barrington nodded. "And some of the men! Well, we have room here for the many who are going to the devil in the old country for the lack of something worth while to do, though I am afraid there is considerably less prospect than I once fancied there would be of their making money."

His niece noticed the gravity in his face, and sat thoughtfully silent for several minutes while with the snow hissing beneath it the sleigh dipped into and swung out of a hollow.

Colonel Barrington had founded the Silverdale settlement ten years earlier and gathered about him other men with a grievance who had once served their nation, and the younger sons of English gentlemen who had no inclination for commerce, and found that lack of brains and capital debarred them from either a politcal or military career. He had settled them on the land, and taught them to farm, while, for the community had prospered at first when Western wheat was dear, it had taken ten years to bring home to him the fact that men who dined ceremoniously each evening and spent at least a third of their time in games and sport, could not well compete with the grim bushmen from Ontario, or the lean Dakota plowmen who ate their meals in ten minutes and toiled at least twelve hours every day.

Colonel Barrington was slow to believe that the race he sprang from could be equaled and much less beaten at anything, while his respect for and scrupulous observance of insular traditions had cost him a good deal, and left him a poorer man than he had been when he founded Silverdale. Maud Barrington had been his ward, and he still directed the farming of a good many acres of wheat which she now held in her own right. The soil was excellent, and would in all probability have provided one of the Ontario men with a very desirable revenue, but Colonel Barrinton had no taste for small economies.

"I want to hear all the news," said the girl. "You can begin at the beginning—the price of wheat. I fancied, when I saw you, it had been declining."

Barrington sighed a little. "Hard wheat is five cents down, and I am sorry I persuaded you to hold your crop. I am very much afraid we shall see the balance the wrong side again next half-year."

Maud Barrington smiled curiously. There was no great cause for merriment in the information given her, but it emphasized the contrast between the present and the careless life she had lately led when her one thought had been how to extract the greatest pleasure from the day. One had frequently to grapple with the problems arising from scanty finances at Silverdale.

"It will go up again," she said. "Is there anything else?"

Barrington's face grew a trifle grim as he nodded. "There is, and while I have not much expectation of an advance in prices, I have been worrying over another affair lately."

His niece regarded him steadily. "You mean Lance Courthorne?"

"Yes," said Barrington, who flicked the near horse somewhat viciously with the whip. "He is also sufficient to cause any man with my responsibilities considerable anxiety."

Maud Barrington looked thoughtful. "You fancy he will come to Silverdale?"

Barrington appeared to be repressing an inclination towards vigorous speech with some difficulty, and a little glint crept into his eyes. "If I could by any means prevent it, the answer would be, No. As it is, you know that, while I founded it, Silverdale was one of Geoffrey Courthorne's imperialistic schemes, and a good deal of the land was recorded in his name. That being so, he had every right to leave the best farm on it to the man he had disinherited, especially as Lance will not get a penny of the English property. Still, I do not know why he did so, because he never spoke of him without bitterness."

"Yes," said the girl, while a little flush crept into her face. "I was sorry for the old man. It was a painful story."

Colonel Barrington nodded. "It is one that is best forgotten—and you do not know it all. Still, the fact that the man may settle among us is not the worst. As you know, there was every reason to believe that Geoffrey intended all his property at Silverdale for you."

"I have much less right to it than his son, and the colonial cure is not infrequently efficacious," said Miss Barrington. "Lance may, after all, quiet down, and he must have some good qualities."

The Colonel's smile was very grim. "It is fifteen years since I saw him at Westham, and they were not much in evidence then. I can remember two little episodes, in which he figured, with painful distinctness, and one was the hanging of a terrier which had in some way displeased him. The beast was past assistance when I arrived on the scene, but the devilish pleasure in the lad's face sent a chill through me. In the other, the gardener's lad flung a stone at a blackbird on the wall above the vinery, and Master Lance, who I fancy did not like the gardener's lad, flung one through the glass. Geoffrey, who was angry, had not seen what I saw, haled the boy before him, and Lance looked him in the face and lied with the assurance of an ambassador. The end was that the gardener who was admonished, cuffed the innocent lad. These, my dear, are somewhat instructive memories."

I wonder," said Maud Barrington, glancing out across the prairie which was growing dusky now, "why you took the trouble to call them up for me?"

The Colonel smiled dryly. "I never saw a Courthorne who could not catch a woman's eye or had any undue diffidence about making the most of the fact, and that is partly why they have brought so much trouble on everybody connected with them. Further, it is unfortunate that women are not infrequently more inclined to be gracious to the sinner who repents, when it is worth his while, than they are to the honest man who has done no wrong. Nor do I know that it is only pity which influences them. Some of you take an exasperating delight in picturesque rascality."

Miss Barrington laughed, and fearlessly met her uncle's glance. "Then you don't believe in penitence?"

"Well," said the Colonel dryly, "I am, I hope, a Christian man, but it would be difficult to convince me that the gambler, cattle-thief, and whisky-runner who ruined every man who trusted him will be admitted to the same place as clean-lived English gentlemen. There are, my dear, plenty of them still."

Barrington spoke almost fiercely, and then flushed through his tan, when the girl looking into his eyes smiled a little. "Yes," she said, "I can believe it, because I owe a good deal to one of them."

The ring in the girl's voice belied the smile, and the speech was warranted, for, dogmatic, domineering, and vindictive as he was apt to be occasionally, the words he had used applied most fitly to Colonel Barrington. His word at least had never been broken, and had he not adhered steadfastly to his own rigid code, he would have been a good deal richer man than he was then. Nor did his little shortcomings which were burlesqued virtues, and ludicrous now and then, greatly detract from the stamp of dignity which, for speech was his worst point, sat well upon him. He was innately conservative to the backbone, though since an ungrateful Government had slighted him, he had become an ardent Canadian, and in all political questions aggressively democratic.

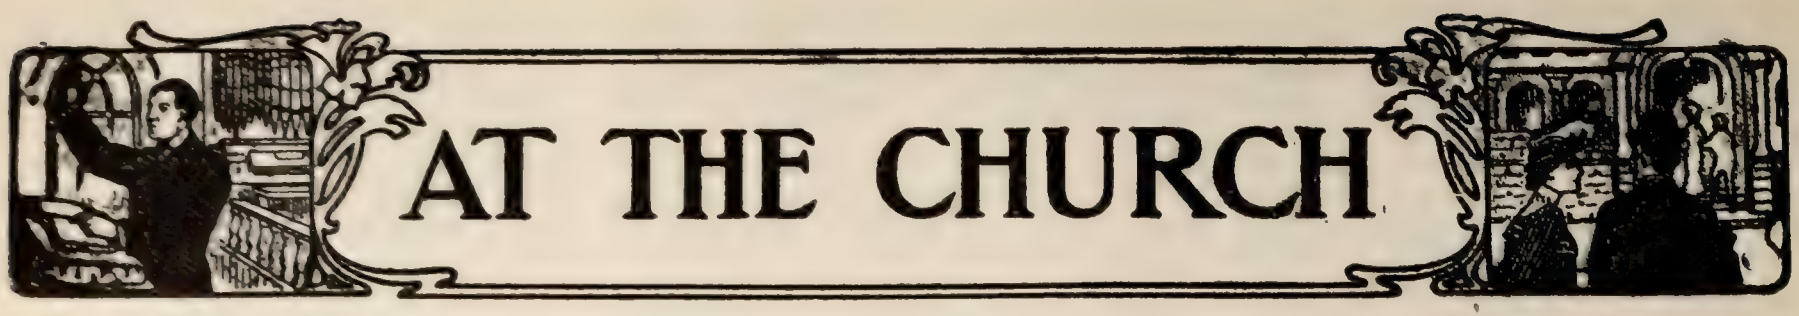
"My dear, I sometimes fancy I am a hypercritical old fogy!" he said, and sighed a little, while once more the anxious look crept into his face. "Just now I wish devoutly I was a better business man."

Nothing more was said for a little, and Miss Barrington watched the crimson sunset burn out low down on the prairie's western rim. Then the pale stars blinked out through the creeping dusk, and a great silence and an utter cold settled down upon the waste. The muffled thud of hoofs, and the crunching beneath the sliding steel seemed to intensify it, and there was a suggestion of frozen brilliancy in the sparkle flung back by the snow. Then a coyote howled dolefully on a distant bluff, and the girl shivered as she shrank down further amidst the furs.

"Forty degrees of frost," said the Colonel. "Perhaps more. This is very different from the cold of Montreal. Still, you'll see the lights of Silverdale from the crest of the next rise."

It was, however, almost an hour before they reached them, and Miss Barrington was almost frozen when the first square loghouse rose out of the prairie. It and others that followed it flitted by, and then, flanked by a great birch bluff, with outlying barns, granaries, and stables, looming black about it against a crystalline sky. Silverdale Grange grew into shape across their way. Its rows of ruddy windows cast out streaks of flickering orange down the trail, the baying of dogs changed into a joyous clamor, when the Colonel reined in his team, half-seen men in furs waved a greeting, and one who risked frostbite with his cap at his knee handed Miss Barrington from the sleigh and up the veranda stairway.

She had need of the assistance, for her limbs were stiff and almost powerless, and she gasped a little when she passed into the drowsy warmth and brightness of the great log-walled hall. The chilled blood surged back tingling to her skin, and swaying with a creeping faintness she found refuge in the arms of a gray-haired lady who stooped and kissed her gently. Then the door swung to, and she was home again in the wooden grange of Silverdale, which stood far remote from any civilization but its own on the frozen levels of the great white plain.



The Cry of Bethany

Bethany cries from the grave of Alexander Campbell. The founding of Bethany College was in the estimation of Mr. Campbell his most hopeful work; and yet, up to date, it has been struggling for an existence, instead of receiving the hearty support of the brotherhood who are indebted to the college mainly for whatever they are today. Must this shame continue? Will it crown our Centennial celebration with a wreath of fading flowers? We hope not; we dare not believe that such a thing could be true. Nevertheless, it will be true unless the Disciples everywhere wake up to the crisis in which this Centennial plea is at present. We have sent earnest appeals to many of the churches, and to all the preachers, and up to date the response has been very unsatisfactory. True, some noble souls have responded liberally; but for the most part no attention at all has been paid to the appeals made. We are now in the Centennial year, and soon it will be too late; for if this enterprise fails at this time, Bethany is doomed, so far as an adequate permanent endowment is concerned. What is done must be done quickly. Do not wait for the preachers, do not wait for the churches to act as a whole. Our appeal is now to individuals. Send your contributions to the St. Louis Union Trust Company, St. Louis, Mo., or to the Mercantile Trust Company, Pittsburg, Pa., and do it without delay. If we raise the first block of $100,000 the enterprise will not fail entirely, but even this will not be done unless the Disciples will generally respond liberally to this call. We believe that they will do this. So far we cannot help thinking that the matter has just been put off from time to time, and now that the call is imperative the response will be prompt and liberal. If you have not the money to spare, give a negotiable note, the form of which I will send to any one who makes application to me. A negotiable note bearing interest from date will be as good as the cash, and this may be paid at the convenience of the donor. Please act in some way, and if you cannot do anything else, send me word by post card or letter, that you do not wish any part in this Centennial offering to endow the college which more than any other college has contributed to what our religious movement is. Do something and do not keep the Alumni Committee in suspense. We would rather know the worst than to hope on against hope that something worthy will be done.

Peter at Lydda and Joppa*

The members of the Jerusalem church were thrust forth by the violent hand of persecution, like the Puritans from England and the Huguenots from France, and compelled to find homes elsewhere. They went out as refugees, but their first concern wherever they went was to preach the new faith. Meanwhile, the apostles remained in Jerusalem. Some of their helpers went into adjacent regions. Philip, as we have seen, went first into Samaria and then to the southwest toward Gaza, following the coast line thence northward until he reached Caesarea. Peter was the first of the apostles to undertake evangelistic work. In the wider sweep of this apostolic ministry of evangelism no doubt Peter was primarily concerned to visit those communities in which the gospel had already taken root. The many causes which had led to the establishment of churches in the towns of Palestine are left to conjecture, but the presence of people from all parts of the land at the great feasts in Jerusalem must have given abundant opportunity for Christianity to be carried back by these pilgrims to their own homes. Thus little groups of believers sprang up in cities and villages to which the apostles had never gone.

The Plain of Sharon.

Among those Christian communities which had sprung up at some distance from Jerusalem were the two of Lydda and Joppa on the plain of Sharon. From the vicinity of Jerusalem one looks down to the west upon that fertile land, bordering the sea, which in ancient times was known as the plain of Sharon. It is today one of the most fertile parts of Palestine, receiving the constant washings from the hills. Many villages dotted its surface, and in that time it must have been a very populous region.

In our times Joppa, or Jaffa, to use its modern name, is the principal entrance to Southern Palestine. It has no harbor, and landing is often a very unpleasant experience, as one must be conveyed in small boats from the ships lying some distance out, to the port. It has been since the days of Solomon the chief place of entrance into Palestine. Here many of the crusaders first set their feet upon holy soil, and here practically all the pilgrims, coming from the West, especially from the southern Mediterranean, are sure to land. The town is situated on a hill and commands a fine view both of the plain, lying back of it, and of the sea in front.

Lydda.

A few miles to the southwest, on the railroad which connects Jaffa with Jerusalem, lies the town of Lydda or Lud, which still preserves the traditions connecting it with this New Testament narrative. It also has the local celebrity of the tomb of St. George, who was the traditional dragon-slayer, and later became the patron saint of Richard of England. The stories regarding St. George, however, are far from reliable; as a matter of fact, his alleged tomb is shown in more than one spot in Palestine. More famous than Lydda, however, so far as crusading history is concerned, is the neighboring town of Ramlah, which still bears traces, architecturally, of stirring events of crusader times. The remains of a tall tower form the solitary monument of a once extensive crusader establishment, and a quite modern church recalls, without authentication, the story of Joseph of Aramathea.

The Healing of Aeneas.

To the town of Lydda Peter had come on his tour of inspection. Here he found a company of believers of whom presumably one was the Aeneas whose cure is the point of the incident. This man had been afflicted with paralysis for eight years. Peter applied to him the same healing power as that used by the Master in the days of his public ministry. It was once more the name of Jesus that accomplished the cure. Calling upon the man to arise and arrange his bed as a well man might do, Peter brought him once more to complete health. This example was in striking contrast with the forms of magic by which the sourcerers of that age professed to work miracles of healing, and its influence was felt at once in the community. Throughout the town itself and in the vicinity a report of the healing speedily passed, and the result was that the attention of many was attracted to the truth which the disciples preached; and thus additions were gained for the company of believers.

Tabitha of Joppa.

Not far away, as we have seen, and lying on the sea coast was the town of Joppa. Here, also, there was a circle of believers in Jesus. The gospel had spread throughout the entire region. One of these disciples was a certain godly woman, bearing the Aramaic name of Tabitha (Gazelle), but also known by the Greek equivalent, Dorcas. She seems to have been a person af charitable and kindly nature, given to acts of mercy to the poor and busying herself constantly with such activities as could benefit that circle of dependents which is always certain to attach itself to a new and promising faith. This woman fell sick and died at about the time Peter was visiting in the vicinity. The usual custom would have hurried the body to the grave on the same day. This was the usual practice of the Jews, owing to their superstitious fear of the presence of the dead.

Peter Called.

But because the Apostle Peter was in the vicinity at Lydda it seemed appropriate that he should be sent for, since perhaps this was the first death that had fallen on the little band of believers. The implication of the text is that they would hardly have sent as far as Jerusalem for him, and it is clear that they had no thought of his restoring the dead to life, but only wished the comfort of his presence in their bereavement. Like the mother of Jesus at the wedding feast in Cana, they presented to him their trouble without anticipating the remarkable power which was to be invoked in their behalf. Two men accordingly made the journey to Lydda, and, finding Peter, told him of the event and begged him to come with them.

The Raising of Tabitha.

When he arrived at the house where the dead woman was laid, he met all that accustomed ostentatious mourning which is characteristic of the age. The scene at the household of Jairus (Mark 5:40) comes vividly to mind as one reads this narrative. All the demonstrations of grief practiced by Orientals were in progress. All this was highly repugnant to the quiet spirit of confidence which Peter brought to the scene. Like his Master on the former occasion he put them all forth. We do not know that Peter expected to raise Dorcas to life. We only know that he sought the privacy of prayer and that at the close of his petition, summoned back to life the woman who was dead. Perhaps the answer to his prayer was beyond his own expectation or perhaps he had come with the full confidence of just such a result. At any rate, he lifted her to her feet and perceived in the fact of her arousal a complete vindication of that wonder-working power of the name of Jesus; to the disciples and the friends who had gathered for her interment, he presented her alive and well.

Place of Miracle.

Such were the proofs of the new faith to all in the communities of believers in those days when the gospel was going forth throughout the region where the Lord had lived and wrought. The result, as might be expected, was impressive. Many believed not merely in the miracles that were performed, but what was of greater moment they believed in the Master in whose Name they were wrought. The miracles had value in attracting attention, but it was the teaching of Jesus, his character and his purposes for the world which really brought men to the new life, and such will ever be the case. Christianity has wrought marvels in all its history, marvels of supremacy over nature, and especially human nature, but its true appeal must ever be made to mind and conscience, the uplifting of the soul to new regions of consecration and holiness, the transformation of humanity from selfishness to service. In this fact lies evermore the great appeal of our holy faith.

LOVE ENTHRONED.

By Arthur William Amass.

When we banish hate and malice
And the evil thoughts combined,
When we drink the holy chalice
With a man of different mind,
Ceasing now to point the finger
At the one by fetters bound;
Then we beckon love to linger
Where his rightful home is found.

When we purge these hearts of sinning,
Selfishness and meanness, too,
When we quench the first beginning
Of the passion born anew,
When we sigh to think how many
Of the lost we once disowned,
If we'll aid the least of any,
Then, ah, then, is love enthroned.

PRAYER MEETING

Silas Jones

JESUS THE GREAT SATISFIER.

Topic, March 10, John 3:13, 14; 6:47-69.

"If you were going to commit your body to some one, who might do good or harm to it, would you not carefully consider and ask the opinion of your friends and kindred, and deliberate many days as to whether you should give him the care of your body? But when the soul is in question, which you hold to be of far more value than the body, and upon the good or evil of which depends the well-being of your all—about this you never consulted either with your father or with your brother or with any one of us who are your companions But no sooner does this foreigner appear, than you instantly commit your soul to his keeping! If Socrates had reason to be anxious about the kind of food his young friends sought for their souls, is there less reason why we should be earnest and careful in our quest for the truth that satisfies mind and heart? Peter and his companions found in Christ the bread of life. No other was able to meet their needs. There were many disturbing questions connected with discipleship to Christ, but the plain fact was that apart from him they could not be satisfied. Like sensible men, they choose to follow Christ and accept the consequences instead of turning from hope in order to avoid painful thought and labor.

Hunger for Righteousness.

Our Lord pronounces those blessed who hunger and thirst after righteousness. May we not believe that in every heart there is a desire for righteousness? We may be far from righteousness, but we pay our tribute to it when we honor the moral heroes of the race. We build no monuments to scoundrels if we know them to be such. The affection with which Abraham Lincoln is remembered is explained by the belief of the people, that he loved righteousness and hated iniquity. He said: "I am not bound to win, but I am bound to be true. I am not bound to succeed, but I am bound to live up to what light I have. I must stand with anybody that stands right; stand with him while he is right and part with him when he goes wrong." Jesus arouses us to our need of righteousness and he makes us righteous. We cannot love him and try to walk with him without coming to hate what is wrong and to delight in what is right. His disciples expect to grow into his likeness. They will not accept a sinful state as final for themselves or for the world. The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and then evil will be banished from them. Can any man be satisfied with a hope that includes less than this?

Hunger for Companionship.

"So persecuted they the prophets that were before you." This is given as a reason for rejoicing in persecution. The men who endure hardships for the sake of the gospel have fellowship with the great and good. Who does not crave such fellowship? Who is willing to be classed with the cowards and loafers? We are prepared to pay a high price for the privilege of being numbered among the benefactors of mankind. The self-seeker, whether he is clothed in rags or in gorgeous apparel, whether he have the artistic temperment or the manners of a boor, belongs with Judas and Nero. He may not attain unto the fame of these worthies, but he is at one with them in spirit. Jesus takes us away from that crew. He gives us the stimulus of the noblest companionship. We can read the story of Paul and feel that we have a humble part in the teaching of the truth which Paul gave to the world as a great sacrifice. The benefactors of all ages and of all places are co-workers. We can go further and say with Paul, "We are God's fellow-workers." We have something to do in the carrying out of the purposes of God. It is our privilege as Christians to know something of that purpose and to be conscious of our fellowship with God in the work of his kingdom. Having God as the companion in all that we do, we are on the way to complete satisfaction. Now we understand but imperfectly the relation in which we stand to God. Faith in Christ leads to fuller knowledge. "Seeing it is God, that said, Light shall shine out of darkness, who shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." The Christian should have unbounded delight in his work, for by it he enters into the blessedness of communion with God and builds his home of the spirit. No hardship is to be dreaded if it deepens the sense of the divine presence and approval.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY SCHOOL PEDAGOGY

I. PLACE OF MISSIONS IN THE SCHOOL. Hhe cause of missions is identical with that of Christianity and must have a place in the Sunday-school adequate to its importance. Within the last decade much advance has been made in this direction. Missions are now a regular part of the course of study of every school that is living in the twentieth century. Their importance has been recognized officially by the International Association in arranging for two optional missionary lessons in the regular course. The ideal, however, should be not merely to sandwich in an occasional lesson or program, but to permeate the school with the spirit of missions that all its activities may be in the highest sense missionary.

II. MISSIONARY COMMITTEE. Every school should have a Missionary Committee for the purpose of supervising the entire missionary interest of the school. This committee should be composed of active, zealous Christians who are at once well instructed in the facts of modern missions and on fire with enthutiasm in the cause. Their special work is to plan for the cultivation of the missionary spirit of the school. To this end they should be thoroughly familiar with the latest literature of missions and missionary pedagogy, and should know how to apply the methods successful elsewhere to their own situation. They should recommend to the Library Committee each year a select number of the best missionary books, choosing them with reference to the varying ages of the pupils (see next paragraph) and should suggest to the teachers and officers the best of these for their individual use. They should see that special missionary days are inserted in the calendar of the school, and should prepare carefully in advance for all missionary programs, addresses, concerts, etc. The regular missionary course of study should only be chosen after consultation with this committee.

III. MISSIONARY LIBRARY. If there is a library in the school already, a Missionary Department should be added to it, containing the latest and best books on the history and progress of missions. The Denominational Boards of the various churches will supply these at reasonable prices. The literature in this field is so abundant that the great task of the Library Committee will be that of selection. In this department there should also be a certain number of books for the use of the teachers, dealing with the best methods of missionary instruction, which should form part of the reading course of the Teacher Training Class.

IV. EQUIPMENT. In furnishing a school some missionary equipment ought to be rewarded as essential.

(1) It is hard to get along without a good MISSIONARY MAP OF THE WORLD, showing the distribution of the population according to religion, and fixing the great missionary centers. In addition to this every school should have a map of its own DENOMINATIONAL MISSIONS. Smaller maps of a like kind are useful for class-room work.

(2) CHARTS of various kinds, emphasizing special phases of missionary appeal, are as useful as they are cheap.

(3) A series of Home and Foreign Missionary PROGRAMS in booklet form with full directions for leader and other accessories. These are furnished by the Young People's Missionary Movement, 156 Fifth avenue, New York City.

(4) Missionary CURIOS, illustrating native life, are invaluable for class-room work in the earlier grades and for programs and platform talks.

(5) PICTURES are a great help in the illustration of the missionary lessons and are especially valuable for note-book work. Where a STEREOSCOPE is in use in the school, a set of missionary pictures should always be added to the list. For special programs there is nothing that interests the children more than a STEREOPTICON lecture, for which the necessary slides can be easily obtained either by purchase or rent.

V. CONSECUTIVE STUDY. The weakest point in most of our missionary work in the Sunday-school is its "occasional" character. Missionary studies should not be confined to special occasions, whether frequent or seldom, but should be as regular and systematic as the study of the Bible itself. The Bible is still one of the best missionary textbooks and there are few lessons that cannot have the missionary point given to them. The Sunday-school Times furnishes in every issue some missionary illustrations for the weekly lesson of the International Course. In some schools five minutes are given at the close of each lesson to its missionary application. In addition to this, however, there should be special instruction in the history and ideals of modern missions. This can only be secured by mapping out beforehand a regular course of study with adequate text-books which should form part, at least, of the supplemental work of each class.

VI. SUGGESTED COURSE OF STUDY. The following course of study is offered in the hope that it may suggest something similar to be applied to other situations:

(1) KINDERGARTEN. Simple stories from the Mission fields profusely illustrated by pictures and curios.

(2) PRIMARY DEPARTMENT. Stories from such books as "Topsy Turvey Land," "Africa for Juniors," "Coming Americans," "Child Life in Mission Lands," "On the Indian Trail," etc., illustrated as before with pictures and object lessons.

(3) JUNIOR. Stories from such books as "All About Japan," "Uganda's White Man of Work," "Heroes of the South Sea," "Alaska for Juniors," etc., illustrated with missionary and sand map.

(4) INTERMEDIATE. Regular lessons in Trull's "Undenominational Studies for the Sunday-school," using one of these textbooks for each grade in the Department. A drill may be given in this department on Denominational Missions, illustrated by map.

(5) SENIOR DEPARTMENT. Trull's "Undenominational Studies for the Senior Grades," with more drills on denominational missions. In this grade the pupils should be especially encouraged to read missionary books from the library.

(6) ADULT. The higher aspect and philosophy of modern missions should here be taught and a special reading course offered to every class. Mission Study Classes (see below) have their proper place in this department.

(7) THE MISSIONARY HABIT. The practical side of Christian missions should be taught no less than the theoretical. A fixed part of the regular offering of the school should go to this cause. In addition to this a special offering should be taken for missions at least once a year. In most schools Children's Day and Rally Day offer the great opportunities for this. In order to give definiteness and personal interest to the offering it is well that each department of the school should have a special object to which its contribution goes. Thus in one school the Kindergarten and Primary departments together have their own native evangelist in India; the Juniors have a share in a Home Mission Station; the Intermediates a share or shares in some Foreign Station; the Seniors contribute to some special fund in connection with the work of the "living-link" missionary object. The balance over and above what is necessary for the special causes is handed over to the Denominational Board of the church. A Christmas box is also sent from the Sunday-school to the "living-links" of the church, not forgetting their wives and families. If this plan be adopted, pictures of the missionaries and stations supported by each department should be hung in its assembly room, and letters and reports of the work be read from time to time as part of the closing exercises.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

By Richard W. Gentry

WHAT ARE OUR LIQUOR LAWS AND HOW ARE THEY ENFORCED:
DEUT. 4:1-9.

Topic for March 21.

Suggestive thoughts:

"Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink." Hab. 2:15.

"Far from me be the gift of Bacchus, pernicious inflaming wine that weakens both body and mind." Homer.

"O thou visible spirit of wine, what shall we name thee if not devil." Shakespeare.

"The evils wrought by the liquor traffic are greater than the combined evil effects of war, pestilence, and famine." Gladstone.

Space does not permit herein any adequate treatment of our liquor laws and the method of their enforcement. But a brief sketch of a general nature may be helpful to the student. To those of us who intend to put our hands to the lever of uplift in the next ten years acquaintance with the framework of our liquor legislation is of great moment. For, following upon the glad fact that the whole country is slowly but surely going dry, there remains for the citizens of the immediate future to see that it is kept dry. A large part of the United States is under prohibition. Another large part is under local option, while social groups, federations of labor, trades unionists, and insurance companies, are taking a stand.

The liquor laws of our country might be informally classed as national and subnational, i.e., state and local.

National.

The U. S. government collects a tax from every person (irrespective of the state laws) who manufactures or deals by wholesale or retail in intoxicating liquors. This federal law is very strictly enforced. We are all familiar with what is known as the illicit still. Much of our most popular fiction weaves itself about the mountain dwellers and their attempts to manufacture liquor without tax in the hiding of the hills.

State and Local Laws.

Beyond the federal tax above described, the states are given great freedom through what is known as the principle of "the police power of the state." The complete extent of the right inherent in each state to regulate or prohibit the liquor traffic within its own borders is now well established. Moreover, the right to sell intoxicating liquors is not one of those privileges and immunities of citizens of the U. S. which by the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal constitution the states were prohibited to abridge. In the states, then, we have the following legislation:

A. License or High License. Licenses are granted either by the municipal authority or by a judicial body, the money going to local needs, and in some cases, portions to the state. B. Prohibition. Which does not treat of the individual, but of men in their social relationships, demanding that liquor shall not be sold by one to another. C. Local Option. The power to close all liquor shops within a given area by a vote of the inhabitants.

Enforcement.

As to the enforcement of these various laws, it may be briefly said that their enforcement, outside of taxation and license, depends almost wholly upon public opinion. In Maine in the Seventies an English investigator found prohibition almost null. In Missouri and Illinois many counties probably well went wet, else the sadder spectacle of outraged law would have been presented. The great need of our present time is a powerful and active public opinion to back up our liquor legislation already enacted. Where this exists no sort of liquor dealer dare violate the law. For if the public mind so wills it the law will be enforced.

Leslie Wolfe reports forty-three conversions at Los Banos, forty miles from Manila. W ehave no church at that place. An effort will be made to establish a well-organized church. The preaching was done by a native evangelist.

TO J. W. M'GARVEY.

My Dear Brother: Seeing your note in the Christian Century in which you deny my charges, I have concluded to make a few remarks by way of explanation for fear some of the brethren think me too hasty in my charges. I have, for years, had the most profound respect for you and have not lost it all yet. Twenty-five years of hard study have compelled me to change my ideas on a great many things. I have been compelled to change some of what I thought to be my best sermons. In fact, I have preached some things that I am ashamed of today. And I believe that the man who has been preaching for twenty or twenty-five years and has never preached anything that he is ashamed of ought to be ashamed of himself and quit the field, because he has made no progress. But with all these changes I have tried to cultivate charity for all those who may find it in their hearts to differ with me on these questions. My motto has been "pity for all below me, reverence for all above me, and justice for all." And now, passing by the many good things I see in you, I wish to state some of my objections to your conduct toward your brethren.

In the first place, you have put in too much time in playing the part of a bush-whacker. I do not think that guerrilla warfare is very honorable. If any of the brethren, in your judgment, step aside, state your objection and then give the opportunity to explain. For you to make a charge against one of your brethren and then expect your scholarship and your prestige to put him down and out is, to me, very unfair. Remember, if a thing is worth mentioning at all, it is certainly worth hearing both sides. And if one of the brethren should step aside on some minor proposition and you see proper to mention it at all, have the goodness to say that the thing is not of vital importance and you will not put him in an improper light before the brotherhood. For, be it understood that there are some good, scholarly, Christian men in our midst who do not believe the old doctrine that God will damn a man on a technicality or curse the race to save a syllogism.

And coming a little closer to the point I wish to say, in the second place, that you, if correctly reported to me, have done great injustice to your own students or at least some of them, because they changed their views on some things after they left the college where you had instructed them. In this connection I wish to give one case that came to my notice in the Northland. I do not want to be understood as boasting when I say to you that I have always tried to help young ministers. When I was a helpless orphan boy I resolved in my mind that if I should live to be a man that I would treat boys better than men treated me. And when I entered the ministry I said in my heart, "If I live to any age in the ministry, I am going to treat young preachers better than the older preachers treated me." And before God I have tried to fulfil that resolve. But to the point.

It was in Illinois that a young man came to me for help. He had a place and was about to lose it. He was very nervous and discouraged. And I made special inquiry and here is substantially what he told me: "I was under Brother McGarvey at Lexington for (four or five years, I cannot now say which) and when I left the school I soon found a place to preach, but it was only a few months till I was informed that my services were no longer in demand by that congregation. I left there and began work for another congregation and it was only a few months till the same thing happened to me again. I started out in search of another work and soon found it and now I am informed that my services will not be in demand any longer. And I urged upon those who informed me to tell me the reason for such a move and I finally found the reason in the fact that J. W. McGarvey was working against me."

And I said to the young man, "Is it upon the ground of any immorality that Brother McGarvey is opposing you? And he said "No; it is because I have changed my mind on some things that he taught me."

And I said to him, "What are the things? In regard to inspiration, the chronological order of the books of the Bible and the relation of Father, Son and Holy Spirit?"

Said he, "My conception of these things are different to what they were when I left school and Professor McGarvey having heard of it, is doing what he can to throw me out and to keep me out of employment."

And I want to say to you, Brother McGarvey, that, if this be true, you, through your zeal committeed a great wrong.

I shall not now give the brother's name without his consent. I do not know where he is now, but if he sees this article and will give me the privilege I shall at some future time give the name. These, sir, are some of the reasons for the charges set forth in my article. And I held a meeting for a young man who has been a student at Lexington, and preached a sermon on inspiration in which I tried to show that the inspiration was in the wri er and not in the book, and that, strictly speaking, neither the Bible nor any other book could be inspired. He liked the line of thought and said he believed it, but if he should adopt such views and Brother McGarvey should find it out he would be after him. Brother McGarvey, were I in your place, I would ha'e to have my boys afraid of me. During my work I have put no less than fourteen boys into the ministry. And there is not one of them afraid of me. God bless them, they are very near to me! And I should like sometimes to have a reunion with them.

CHICAGO

A VISIT TO A CHRISTIAN SCIENCE TESTIMONY MEETING. A GROUP OF ORTHODOX MINISTERS PARTICIPATE IN A SERVICE OF WORSHIP ACCORDING TO MRS. EDDY'S MANNER. O. F. JORDAN REPORTS HIS OBSERVATIONS.

Last Wednesday evening a company of our ministers got excused from their own prayer meeting service to attend the "experience and testimonial" meeting of the Christian Scientists. We went out to the Third Church on the West Side to have our first initiation into the mysteries of that religious dogma which is said to be too obscure for any but the initiated to understand.

We arrived at the church at an early hour and had time to talk with the people who assembled in the capacious vestibule where they were enjoying the good fellowship which all religionists have with one another. The building was larger than our imagination had been able to picture it. It was built on the Grecian style of architecture with no tower but with a dome and pillars after the style of architecture which is becoming so familiar in this country. Surely such a building would cost more than a hundred thousand dollars. The large auditorium was seated with opera chairs and had sittings for 1,512 people, we were told. This local church was nine years old and had 750 members.

Present Strength in Chicago.

We were anxious to learn the history and present strength of the movement in Chicago. We found a surprising variety of opinions on this subject. This difference was explained to us on the ground that the Christian Scientists did not believe in numbering the church and all statistics were in the nature of guesses. We met one man, however, who claimed to know accurately the membership of the three largest churches. These have 2,500 members. He estimated that the total strength in Chicago was eight thousand but on the basis of the figures for the three larger churches, this seems too high. We estimated that more probably the movement had six thousand actual members in the city besides the adherents outside the church. The movement in Chicago is fifteen years old, we were told, and now has nine churches, seven of them with their own buildings. This is in Chicago proper and does not count outlying suburbs. It is probable that in Chicago proper they have twice as many members as the Disciples and they have been gathered in in one-fourth of the time the Disciples have required. How explain this growth? Is success in numbers and in buildings an indication of theological correctness? This has sometimes been alleged by members of our brotherhood. The "Science" movement ought to silence that argument.

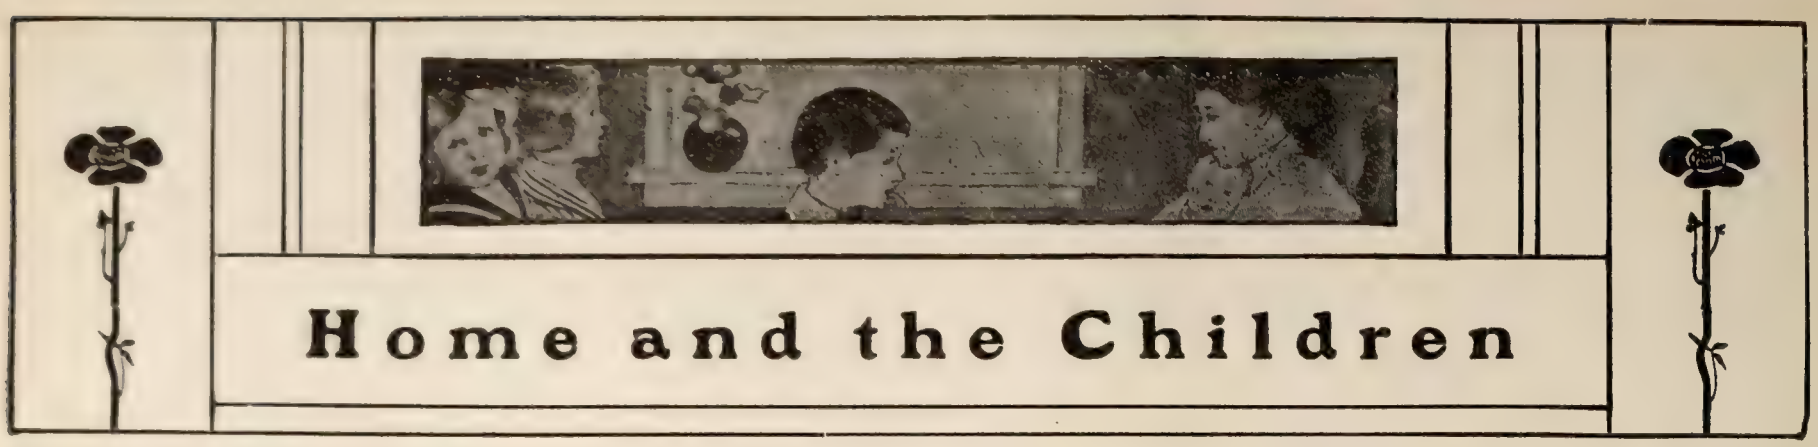
A Congregation of Ghosts.

As the audience gathered, we were interested in the class of people who came. They were from the middle class with no handworkers, though perhaps with some persons of wealth intermingled. There were enough anaemics in the crowd to make it look like a congregation of ghosts, though there were a few rosy cheeks. A physician would have called seventy-five per cent. of them sick, though it would be a part of their religious duty to deny the allegation and declare themselves perfectly well. Of the numerous young men present, we saw not a one sufficiently vigorous to be a good tennis player, much less foot-ball player. The queer faces and peculiar contour of head disclosed abnormality on every hand, though often coupled with more than ordinary intelligence. They were recruited from the class of hysterical Americans who have been worn out in city excitement or have fallen behind by reason of hereditary peculiarities. "Science" was giving them the thing they most needed, absorption in a great religious ideal and a restful life, both in the church and out. They were gathered at the meeting for purposes of worship and the first peal of the great pipe organ brought everything to the most perfect order, though there had been but little confusion before.

Mrs. Eddy's Words and the Bible.

The reader and a soloist appeared alone in the pulpit which had the words of Mrs. Eddy in the center and those of the Bible on either side. A collection of scripture texts on prayer were read and then the corresponding passages in "Science and Health" followed. Two songs were sung. A period of silent prayer was a part of the worship followed by the Lord's prayer by the congregation. It was explained by the passages from the text-book that audible prayer often misleads the spirit and the prayer of inner desire is much safer. Jesus' words on closet prayer were a part of the reading. This was both primitive and apostolic. At the close the meeting ended with a hymn and no benediction. This is also apostolic, as the supper in the upper room ended in just this way. We are not the only ones in the work of restoring the apostolic worship.

No Institutional Departments.



The announcements were full of significance. The people were informed of the services in all the other Christian Science churches in the city. This indicated the close ecclesiastical unity of the movement. Even the Catholic church is not more effectively organized. A Lincoln service was announced and the people were told to go to the journal, the Christian Science Sentinel, to find the sermon that would be read that day. No preacher is trusted with the precious heritage of the truth. He can do naught else than read what is given him, asking no questions for conscience' sake. The announcements were also notable for their brevity. There were no auxiliary organizations. No societies to do missionary work or to relieve the poor. No institutional enterprise in that great building that might be the home of every good thing in the neighborhood. Simply two services on Sunday, one on Wednesday, and the reading room, made up the sum total of the social gatherings of the group. This explained why they had six hundred out to prayer meeting and why they can have such good audiences on Sunday. The people are not worn in the least by social service nor distracted by varied interests. The church and the general meeting is the all in all.

The introductory service took about twenty-five minutes. Thirty-five minutes of testimony from the general audience then followed and though the meeting had come up to the most interesting point at this time, the reader promptly closed the meeting at nine o'clock and when the people had exchanged greetings in the vestibule below, they went home.

Runaway Preachers Caught!

We had been congratulating ourselves that we were learning a great deal without it being known into what strange pastures we had wandered. A lady came up at once and spoke to our Austin pastor and now everybody knows he went. In that audience there were several former Disciples from different churches of the city and a former minister of the Disciples. These came to us and told of their help gotten in this new religion. Probably very few in that audience were never members of any other church. Christian Science grows like the ivy and the moss on the side of the old oak tree, and on the shady side at that. It has not yet developed the genius of winning the hard-headed business men of the world from their unbelief. It only takes ordinary Christians who have been trained by the older theology to a certain sympathy with the allegorical method of interpreting the scripture and shows them the full possibilities of this method. Those very Disciples who were in the Christian Science church had been prepared for their theological point of view perhaps by the old time sermon that showed the tabernacle to be a type of the church and made every fringe and tassel to mean something.

Our most interesting experiences remain yet to be told. We took the speeches of the prayer meeting hour in short-hand and these records will form the basis of a study next week. We shall discuss the subject, "What Christian Science has done for its adherents."

ROSAMOND'S BIRTHDAY.

By Eva M. Turner.

The summer sunshine was flooding the room with golden light when Rosamond awoke. For a moment she lay very still and wondered if she had been dreaming, or if she had really heard a whistle. Then she remembered. This was her birthday, her seventh birthday, and she was going to Wildwood to spend the day. She slipped out of bed and ran to the window, as again a shrill whistle caught her ear. Sure enough, early as it was, there was Cousin Carol and the little black ponies.

She rapped on the window to let Carol know that she had heard and ran to find mamma.

It was not long before she was ready to start, as she did not even wait for her breakfast, since Carol said that Aunt Margaret would have breakfast waiting for them.

Wildwood was Uncle Harry's country-place. It was far from the roar of the great city, but only a mile from the quiet little gray rectory that stood close to the big ivy-covered church, in which Rosamond's papa preached.

As the happy little girl rode along, enjoying the dewy sweetness of the early morning she remembered how, when she had spent other birthdays at Wildwood, she had been surprised with some pretty gift. Would there be anything for her today? She could not help wishing that there would be.

When at last they arrived at the farm, she was joyously greeted by the merry troop of cousins and jolly Uncle Harry kissed her seven times and "one more to grow on" and led her to the wide vine-clad porch, where Aunt Margaret was putting the finishing touches to the pretty breakfast table. There was no gift beside Rosamond's plate, but in the glad excitement she did not notice it and enjoyed the muffins and the great dish of strawberries from the garden.

After breakfast, litle Myles hastened to show his cousin his queer pet, which was a little chicken that seemed to be cross-eyed. It knew the little fellow's voice and would come at his call and would follow him about. Then Victor must harness up old White Tom, his tame gander, and show Rosamond how the old fellow would draw a tiny cart. Of course, they must feed the white rabbit and visit the guinea-pigs and feed old Speckle and her flock of downy yellow chicks. When Rosamond asked about the ponies in the big lot back of the barn, the children looked at each other and seemed to be overcome by laughter. Ford gave a loud whoop and rolled on the grass, laughing and shouting. Rosamond was a very sweet-tempered little girl, but just for a moment she felt as if she were being treated badly for she didn't see anything to laugh at. Soon, Mary Louise ran away toward the big swing in the woods and they all followed and in the glad romp that they had on reaching the woods, Rosamond forgot all about her moment of discomfort.

It did not seem long to the children before Aunt Margaret and Uncle Harry came and with them Rosamond's papa and mama and Baby Harold.

They brought a great basket and soon a snowy cloth was spread on the grass, 'neath a great tree. A dinner, such as only Aunt Margaret could prepare, was spread, with the birthday cake with its seven candles, in the center. It was a merry feast and but for just a tiny little unpleasant feeling. Rosamond was supremely happy. The cousins seemed to have a secret. There were many knowing glances exchanged and many little outbursts of laughter that Rosamond could not understand.

After dinner there were games and the time passed quickly. It was nearly five when the children heard voices calling them. Down they all ran to find Rosamond's papa and mama and little Harold in the pony cart with Uncle Harry, ready to start home. At a look from Aunt Margaret the cousins disappeared in the direction of the barn, and Rosamond, left alone, ran for her hat. When she came out, there seemed to be no place for her in the cart and she felt a queer little lump in her throat. Just then Ford, followed by little Myles, sturdy Victor, shouting Carol and beaming Mary Louise, came around the corner leading a white, glossy little pony with a red bridle and a little red saddle. Around the pony's neck was a broad ribbon, the bows of which held a card.

Ford put the rein in Rosamond's hand and told her to read the card. With Aunt Margaret's help, Rosamond read these words:

"My name is Snowball. Will you take me home with you, for I am your birthday present?"

Rosamond put her arms around the pony's neck and gave a little sob of joy. She had never dreamed that one of the pretty ponies would ever be hers. Uncle Harry started his ponies toward the city and Snowball cantered along beside them carrying homeward his new mistress, who, until she could no longer see them, turned to wave farewell to the group at the gate of Wildwood.

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER.

BALLS AND BOYS.

One day a snowball, which had been thrown at Johnny Brown by Tommy Green with such poor aim that it bounced wildly along the sidewalk, ran up into a fence corner and leaned itself against a post to rest.

There it happened to meet a mudball that had been thrown off from the fet- was also stopping to draw a breath af- came together, whom else should they see but a leather ball, which had gone into winter quarters in a snow bank beside the fence.

No sooner had they met than the mudball and snowball began a heated argument as to which was the best. The mudball boasted of his dark brown coat of furs, while the snowball bragged of his beautiful cloak of polar bear skin. But the leather ball, having only a modest grey coat on, simply took another hitch in his shoe strings and said not a word.

As they made their way across the street, the debate still going on, a great red automobile bore suddenly down upon them. The mudball was flattened out and his handsome coat all turned to slush. The snowball was scattered and his beautiful cloak all torn to shreds. But the leather ball was only soiled a little, and brushing the mud off his dark grey coat, he jumped to his feet as good as before.

Some boys are like mudballs. When anything hard strikes them they just flatten out and are no good at all. Others are like snowballs, and when struck, scatter in every direction, or run off in a corner. But some boys are leather-ball boys. Like "men folks" they face the things that are hard, and when the wood has been carried in and the arithmetic gotten, they brush a little dust off their shoulders and a little ink off their fingers and cry, "Why, it didn't hurt me at all!"

The missionaries are already taking steps towards securing land at Vigan, Philippine Islands, for the purpose of building a Bible school. All the money for this enterprise is not in sight yet. It will involve an expenditure of about $25,000.

In the March offering, ask the people to support a missionary for one day by giving $1.65, or a week by giving $11.54, or a month by giving $50.00.

WITH THE WORKERS

The Bible schools of Greencastle and Brazil, Ind., are in a spirited contest.

Fred A. Thomas has just begun work as pastor of the church at Hamilton, Ind.

A. B. Cunningham, of Highlands, Kans., has become pastor of the church at Texarkana, Texas.

Mrs. L. J. Joyner, of La Grange, N. C., is to build a parsonage and present it to the church at that place.

O. M. Eaton has begun his work as pastor of the church at Muncie, Ind. He is working hard, especially for the Sunday-school of the church.

H. S. Davenport, one of our North Carolina preachers, has thirteen different preaching appointments, and says this leaves him little time. It would seem so.

Evangelist C. L. Organ is in a meeting with his old home church, a few miles out from Vincennes, Ind., and the community is thoroughly aroused by his work.

Austin J. Hollinsworth, who expects to begin a course of study in medicine, preparatory to becoming a medical missionary, will preach for the church at Ulysses, Neb., during the summer.

The church at La Harpe, Ill., has just held a meeting in which there were seventy-eight additions to the church. They had as their assistants Evangelist H. G. Bennett, of Kansas City, and, as song leader, P. P. Bilhon, of Chicago.

The church at Colorado City, Colo., has decided to combine the Sunday-school service and the Sunday morning worship, in a service which will begin at 10:15 and close at 11:45. There will be 35 minutes for the study of the Sunday-school lesson, and 20 minutes for the sermon.

Allen Wilson, evangelist, of Indianapolis, Ind., has just closed a meeting with the church at Colorado City, Colo., which lasted twenty-one days and brought ninety-four additions into the church. The pastor, Clark Bower, writes enthusiastically of the work of the evangelist, as well as that of Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Tuckerman, leaders of song.

For several years a debt of three thousand dollars has stood in the way of advancement in the work at Greenville, Texas. The energetic pastor, W. T. Hilton, took the matter in hand and made a personal canvass of the entire membership, and the church is happy in being able to now pay the entire indebtedness which was owed the Church Extension Society.

By an unexpected circumstance Herbert Yeuell found it impossible to go to Rensselaer, Ind., for a meeting during the latter part of January. There were ninety-eight confessions in the meeting, and the pastor, George H. Clarke, speaks in the highest terms of the meeting. The singing was led by William Speer of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, and Mrs. Yeuell added much to the meeting by the effectiveness of her personal work.

The Sunday-school of the First Christian Church, Bonham, Texas, is an important factor in the life of the town. Its average attendance for the month of January was 274, the average offering $12.15; the number of males in the school exceed the number of females by five. One-half of the school consists of grown men and women. A number of whole families are members of the school. The church membership is 307. C. M. Schoonover is the pastor.

H. A. Denton, of Cincinnati, Ohio, supplied the pulpit at the Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, last Sunday.

V. W. Blair, pastor at Greenfield, Ind., has bees ill with typhoid fever for several weeks, and is said to be still very sick.

The church at Columbia, N. C., is without a pastor, but is working on as best it can until arrangements can be made for filling the pulpit.

T. A. Lindermeyer has resigned the pastorate at Tuscola, Okla., and will close his work there March 21. The local paper speaks very highly of the influence of Mr. and Mrs. Lindermeyer in the community.

M. M. Nelson has been called to remain with the church at Monte Vista, Colo., another year. During the last year there were forty-six additions to the church, and the finances are in splendid shape.

J. C. Coggins did the preaching in a recent meeting, held by the church at Orphans Heights, N. Carolina. The pastor, John W. Tyndale, speaks in the highest appreciation of the work of Mr. Coggins, who is pastor at Black Mountain, N. C.

Walter Mansell enters enthusiastically upon the work at Crawfordsville, Ind.

The East Broadway work, Sedalia, Mo., opens encouragingly for the new pastor, E. H. Williamson.

Geo. L. Snively is to hold a meeting at Cameron, W. Va., during the month of March.

The Brooks Brothers are holding a meeting at Moundsville, W. Va. This is their first meeting in the state.

The church at Eureka Springs, Ark., has extended a call to N. M. Ragland, of the First Church, Springfield, Mo. We have no word as to whether he has accepted.

Walter M. Jordan preached for two weeks in the recent meeting at Billings, Mont., in which there were twenty additions to the church. The latter part of the meeting was held by Robert Dungan, who will remain with the Billings Church until it can secure a pastor. Mr. Jordan, the former pastor at Billings, has accepted a call to the church at Butte. Lucile May Park, assistant state evangelist, led the singing in the Billings meeting.

More Than Soda Crackers

When you eat Uneeda Biscuit you taste something delightfully different from common soda crackers.

The difference begins with better baking of best materials, in the greatest, cleanest bakeries in the world, built expressly to bake Uneeda Biscuit.

The difference is protected and preserved for you by the only package in the world that effectively retains freshness and excludes all dust and moisture.

Measure of The Work

Let us try to get some correct measure of the foreign work our people are doing. It is of larger proportions than many suppose. Last year the average monthly payments of the Foreign Society amounted to more than $25,000. Its missionary staff, including native helpers, numbers 761. Did you ever think of it? If all these stand with tips of fingers touching, they would make a row nearly one mile long. Again, 761 workers is the equal of one working for 277,765 days, or 761 years, or about three-fourths of a millenium. These teach the gospel in season, out of season, day in and day out. The sun never goes down on their work.

In China alone there are about thirty buildings. The insurance on this property amounts to $300 per year. These buildings are power houses of gospel influence. The total value of all the property in all the fields is about $500,000. Much of this property is now worth far more than the Foreign Society paid for it. Values increase as the gospel spreads throughout the world.

The ordinary work of the missionaries is along three lines:

1. Evangelistic. Preaching the gospel is the chief work. Everything else must be secondary. To this end languages must be learned, literature mastered, and religions carefully studied and well understood. The missionary sows beside all waters. He speaks to thousands. The message is proclaimed in humble street chapels, in crowded bazaars, in secluded zenanas, on long country tours. Sometimes an evangelistic trip requires several weeks. The missionary uses all sorts of conveyance: horses, mules, donkeys, canoes, launches, house-boats, wheel-barrows, jinrikishas, bicycles, railroad trains, and often he travels on foot.

2. Medical. Christ himself set the example by administering to the sick. Twenty-four of his thirty-six recorded miracles were of physical healing. Non-Christian lands are lands of pain and great suffering. But mighty changes are being wrought. More than 1,100 hospitals are being supported on the foreign fields and 2,500,000 patients are treated annually. No other agency has done more to soften hearts and open doors, no other has been more fruitful of spiritual results. The Foreign Society supports eighteen hospitals and last year 127,800 patients were treated. Think of the vast labor, the great patience and care involved in the treatment of so large a number. All manner of diseases are treated. If 127,800 patients were lying on cots six feet apart, they would make a row more than fourteen miles long. That is the work of the Foreign Society for one year. It is being more than repeated this year, and so on. Medical work is an essential part of our Christian service in heathen lands. David Livingstone won his way through Africa with his medicine chest. Peter Parker opened China to the gospel at the point of the lancet. Now hospitals are springing up by the liberality of the Chinese themselves. Soon the land will be full of them at their own expense. Their own countrymen are being trained to conduct them.

3. Educational. The Foreign Society has a vast school plant. It supports sixty-two schools and colleges, and last year the whole number in attendance was nearly 4,000. In numbers and far reaching influence the schools of our brotherhood on foreign soil will compare more favorably with our educational work in America, where we have been at it so long and where we have such great wealth and numbers. If these 4,000 were marching in a column six feet apart, they would make a procession about four miles long. The tread of this army of young blood helps to sound the death knell of heathendom. Who can measure the influence of such schools? If he be a benefactor of the race who makes two blades of grass grow where one grew before, what should be said of the missionary who takes a half-naked urchin from the squalor of a mud hut, where both sexes and ages herd like pigs, teach him to bathe himself, to respect woman, to tell the truth, to earn an honest living, and to serve God? The mission schools are uncompromisingly Christian. The Bible is the chief text book. Jesus is the great teacher. Prayer is the atmosphere. The hope of the future of these lands is largely wrapped up in these schools. They undermine stubborn, inherited prejudices. They lead the way to a true Christian life. The missionary forces of the world appreciate this, hence they are supporting 29,000 mission schools with an attendance of about 1,300,000 pupils. The marvelous awakening in Japan is due largely to the influence of the mission schools which helped lead to the present splendid school system. And these schools are effecting a quiet revolution in China, the like of which has never before been known in the history of the race.

The work of the Foreign Society is of great proportions, indeed. It is world-embracing. Let these facts and many others like them be borne in mind as we take the offering for Foreign Missions March 7.

Please send your March offering to F. M. Rains, Sec'y., Box 884, Cincinnati, O. Be careful to give local name of the church when different from the postoffice.

Notes of the Foreign Society

A. F. Hensey left Bolenge, Africa, January 6 for Europe. He will reach America about June 1 on his first vacation.

It seems that the March Offering has already begun. Mexico, Mo., has already raised over $600. Fayetteville, Ark., has also raised over $600. Evanston, Ohio, has raised over $500. And so the campaign has opened.

E. R. Moon, who went out to Africa early in December, last, reached Matadi, near the mouth of the Congo, January 5. He was just starting up the river to Bolenge. G. H. Watters of California supports Mr. Moon and the church at Covina, Calif., supports Mrs. Moon.

The receipts for Foreign Missions for the first seventeen days of February amounted to $3,842, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $2,041. The total receipts for four months and seventeen days on the current missionary year amount to $25,379, a gain of $12,478, or about 97 per cent.

The First Church, Youngstown, O., John Ray Ewers, minister, enters the Living-link rank in the Foreign Society, and will provide the salary of a missionary. This is good news. The minister says: "The people did it because we have caught the spirit of Christ. This is a moment of supreme joy in the First Church." When our churches see the world with Christ's eyes, and feel for the world with Christ's heart, the number of Living-links will be multiplied many times.

Dr. L. F. Jaggard reports fifty-two baptisms at Bolenge, Africa, Sunday, January 3. He reports, also, ninety in the Sunday-school at the new station, Longa.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty-four days of February amount to $4,341, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $2,352. The gain on the missionary year, up to February 24 amounts to $12,789.

In every church ample preparation should be made for the missionary offering. The youngest convert should be made to know that the Lord needs and expects his help. Every member should be reached with the missionary appeal.

Last week the Foreign Society received two gifts on the Annuity Plan; one of $100 from a friend in Kentucky and one of $500 from a friend in Pennsylvania. There is a very considerable increase in the number and amount of Annuity gifts to the Foreign Society this year.

One of our preachers said, "If I am not in sympathy with the missionary enterprise, what right have I to preach the gospel?" A non-missionary preacher of the gospel is a solecism in creation. Such a man has no place in the pulpit in any congregation of believers.

The Foreign Society is asking for $400,000 this year, including $50,000 for buildings in heathen lands. For a people as numerous and as prosperous this is a modest sum to ask and to confidently expect. There are single men among us any one of whom could give the entire amount.

The church at Fayetteville, Ark., has raised $600 for foreign mission. A young lady of that congregation has also volunteered to become a missionary. Look out for glorious reports later from many churches.

R. A. McCorkle, missionary of the Foreign Society to Japan, returns from his vacation on the S. S. Korea, March 9.

NEW IDEA
Helped Wis. Couple.

It doesn't pay to stick too closely to old notions of things. New ideas often lead to better health, success and happiness.

A Wis. couple examined an idea new to them and stepped up several rounds on the health ladder. The husband writes:

"Several years ago we suffered from coffee drinking, were sleepless, nervous, sallow, weak, and irritable. My wife and I both loved coffee and thought it was a bracer." (delusion).

"Finally, after years of suffering, we read of Postum, and the harmfulness of coffee, and believing that to grow we should give some attention to new ideas, we decided to test Postum.

"When we made it right we liked it and were relieved of ills caused by coffee. Our friends noticed the change—fresher skin, sturdier nerves, better temper, etc.

"These changes were not sudden, but relief increased as we continud to drink and enjoy Postum, and we lost the desire for coffee.

"Many of our friends did not like Postum at first, because they did not make it right. But when they boiled Postum according to directions on pkg., until it was dark and rich, they liked it better than coffee and were benefited by the change." "There's a Reason."

WITH THE WORKERS

The work at Pontiac, Ill., is progressing most satisfactorily under the leadership of Allen T. Shaw.

G. D. King has greatly revived the church in Eagleville, Cal., during the few months of his present ministry there.

Mrs. Nancy C. Henderson has left the money to the church at Jacksonville, Ill., for building a parsonage which will be done this spring.

Mr. and Mrs. F. B. Sapp, representing the C. W. B. M. in North Dakota, are grief-stricken in the death of their infant child February 16.

The Metropolitan Church, Chicago, A. T. Campbell, pastor, LeRoy Brown, of Bellefontaine, Ohio, evangelist, will hold a meeting beginning about the middle of March.

Dr. J. P. Selinger, of the University of Chicago, gave a lecture on "The Social Cost of Tuberculosis" at the Douglas Park Church, last Saturday evening, under the direction of the Men's Club of the church.

Joel Brown, assisted by J. H. Davis of Des Moines, Iowa, as leader of song, is in a meeting at Unionville, Mo. The meeting is progressing most encouragingly, in spite of stormy weather. There have been fifteen additions to the church.

Prof. J. Y. B. Wood, gospel singer, cartoonist and entertainer, can be had during March in revival meetings or to give his entertainment to assist churches to raise money. His terms are very reasonable. Address him 2403 Thrush avenue, Walnut Park, St. Louis, Mo.

J. C. Todd, pastor at Bloomington, Ind., is making a fine success of his Men's League Bible Class. The organization enrolls about eighty men who divide the church into districts—150 to the district—and do the work of a pastor's assistant. The plan sets many members to work.

W. B. Zimmerman who came to the Effingham, Ill., Church from the Drake University, three months ago is doing good work. The Bible-school has reached four times its original attendance, C. E. societies have been completely organized with several times original membership, and all auxiliaries of the church have been built up. More than fifty have been added to the church.

The Ninth Street Christian Church, Logansport, Ind., raised last year for all purposes $8,700.40. Of this amount $577.82 was for missions and benevolences. Additions to the church during the year, 144. During the five years ministry of J. H. Craig the membership of this church has more than doubled, and a new church property erected worth $45,000. The Sunday-school is one of the best in the city with an enrollment of 600. The prospects for the Centennial year are excellent. All departments of the church are alive and active.

Marionville, Mo.—The Blunt Brothers' meeting closed on Monday night. R. W. Blunt of Monett doing the preaching. There were seventy-two additions. The congregation gave the evangelist a seventeen-jeweled, gold watch, to show their appreciation of the good work he did in the meeting. The congregation gave the new members an American revised Bible or Testament, the most of them took Bibles, which cost the church about $30. The church is harmonious, well organized and out of debt. The church is planning to make many improvements in its building in the near future.

TELEGRAMS

Pittsburg, Pa., March 1.—Free blank pledges half days income monthly facilitate general offerings. Telegraph Orders.
Centennial Committee.

Des Moines, Ia., February 28.—Seventy-eight additions today. Total in seven days, 385. Wonderful men's meeting this afternoon and great auditorium packed to doors this evening. Brother Scoville masterful in appeal for union of God's people. The entire evangelistic party endearing themselves to us and our joy is beyond words.
C. S. Medbury.

Somerset, Pa., February 28.—Two other Somerset churches attempted revivals this winter, but had no additions. Evangelist George L. Snively here fifteen days. Packed houses constantly; fifty-four valuable additions; greatest ingathering in any church here for twenty-five years. Church enthusiastic and hopeful.
J. D. Garrison, Minister.

Louisville, Ky., February 28.—One hundred and seventy-five today in Central Church, New Albany, Ind. This truly great church goes forward to still greater work under the princely leadership of B. F. Caton. Close Tuesday night. Begin at El Reno, Okla., Sunday, March 7.
Sellers and St. John, Evangelists.

"The City Man and the Church" was the subject of O. F. Jordan's sermon, at the Evanston Church, on a recent Sunday morning.

The pastor of the Christian Church at Fitzgerald, Ga., E. E. Hollingsworth, made the Lincoln Centennary address at Fitzgerald.

F. M. McHale has closed his work at Richland Center, Wis., and enters at once into pastoral relation with the church at Beloit, Wisconsin.

O. F. Jordan, pastor of the church at Evanston, Ill., has organized a "Pastor's Class in Christian Doctrine," which will meet during the week.

The church at Bedford, Ohio, is in a meeting, with E. P. Wise, of East Liverpool, as evangelist. C. A. Freer is the beloved pastor of the church.

Addison W. Crab and wife have just closed a meeting at Shelburn, Ind., which lasted thrity-four days, and in which there were 106 additions to the church.

A. W. Taylor will begin preaching at Irving Park about the first of March. He will move his family to the city a month or two later. He will be most cordially welcomed into the fellowship of the Chicago churches.

The home of S. Elwood Fisher, pastor of the church at Paxton, Ill., was invaded by the members of his church on a recent evening. But the intrusion was heartily forgiven for they brought with them the evening's refreshments and a purse containing thirty dollars in gold.

Chicago churches ought not to lack in missionary inspiration this winter. Three returned missionaries of the Disciples are wintering with us, Dr. Layton of China, H. P. Shaw of China, and Roscoe Hill of Matanzas, Cuba. In addition we have Guy Sarvis, who was in Y. M. C. A. work in Calcutta, and who crossed the continent of Africa with a newspaper correspondent. These men all have great messages and should be heard in every church of our brotherhood in the city if their time permits.

H. Jas. Crocket will close his work with the church at Bartlesville, Okla., March 15. He has not yet decided upon his future location, and might be secured for a meeting or pastoral work. During the fifteen months of Mr. Crocket's work at Bartlesville there have been fifty additions to the church. The Sunday-school has doubled in attendance. The congregation has raised for all missionary enterprises about $300. Have work of pastor's assistant. The plan sets raised in cash and pledges for building, $1,300. raised in cash and pledges for building $1,300. Cash for current expenses, $2,200. The basement of the new building has been completed and is now occupied by the congregation.

A WORD FROM CANADA.

St. Thomas, Ont., Can.

Having received a unanimous call from the church here I resigned my work at Cherokee, Okla., and began work here January 1, last. St. Thomas is a city of 20,000 people, midway between Detroit and Buffalo on the Canadian side, located on the northern shore of lake Erie.

I find religious conditions here some different from the conditions in the States. The Disciples are not very numerous, neither very wealthy in Canada, but loyal and of the "true blue" type.

In St. Thomas we have a new church edifice costing $20,000, and a membership of 493, very well organized for good work, and we have reasons to expect good things for the Lord. We have a mission in East St. Thomas that is doing good work and is full of promise.

Our only college in all Canada is located here, but is much neglected and not supported by our Canadian brotherhood as it should be. It is to our shame and permanent injury that we cannot have at least one good educational institution in this great Dominion. Brethren and churches in Canada will soon awaken to our grave educational needs.

NEARLY RESIGNED
But Held Position on Grape-Nuts.

An Oklahoma woman was saved from loss of health and position by change to right food. She says:

"The Spring of 1904 found me almost a nervous wreck from the use of improper food. I could not sleep nor eat anything but what it seemed that my stomach was on fire.

"I had the best medical advice I could get, but medicine did not reach my trouble. I was growing worse all the time until I was about to resign my position, a thing I could not afford to do.

"A friend brought me a pkg. of that wonderful food, Grape-Nuts, and asked if I had ever tried it. I told her no. I had no faith in it, but to please her I promised to use the package before I decided what it would do for me.

"I ate nothing but Grape-Nuts and cream three times a day and that awful burning in my stomach disappeared. I was able to continue at my work and gained 26 lbs. in three months. So I owe my health and position to Grape-Nuts."

Centennial Bulletin

Centennial Revivals.

If there ever was a time to refrain from preaching the gospel, it is not now. Anticipating or following the call of the National Committee on Evangelism, about a dozen of the churches in the Pittsburgh District have held revivals recently, mostly with home force. Through their special efforts and the regular services more than a thousand souls have been brought into these churches within the last ninety days. Our other congregations are wise enough to discern the signs of the times and are planning earnestly for evangelistic campaigns within the Centennial year. Correspondence and reports in the papers both indicate that the conditions are the same all over the country. Strike while the iron is hot, and the reports made at Pittsburgh will show a net gain of one hundred thousand.

Asking for the Old Paths.

Everywhere there is a keen interest in everything that relates to the beginnings of the Restoration Movement. People are hungry for stories of the pioneers. They want to see the books they read. They want to sing the songs that were used fifty, seventy-five and a hundred years ago. The camp fires conducted by the C. W. B. M. have struck such a responsive chord that they should not only be taken up by every one of the 2,500 auxiliaries, but similar services should be held by all other churches, great and small. The preacher or teacher who is wise will give out any particular information when there is an appetite for it. In this Centennial year everybody is hungry for the facts of the mighty movement which God inaugurated a hundred years ago to unite his people and save the world.

Outgrown Houses.

Just a little while we have been working and praying to increase the attendance and quicken the interest in our Bible-schools. Our prayers are being gloriously answered, and our labors marvelously rewarded. Let the paragraphers of the daily press, and the pessimists of Pliocine pulpits take notice that half-filled churches are now out of date. The twentieth century order is, to tear down the meeting house and build greater. Here are three examples from the Centennial County. The First Washington Church has a splendid building, but basement, gallery, auditorium and choir loft as well as all the class rooms are packed to suffocation week after week for the study of the Bible. Monongahela bought the residence next door to take care of its growing Bible-school, but that will no longer hold the overflow. Just a few years ago Charleroi built a handsome house that was expected to meet the requirements of at least twenty-five years. Now the study of God's word brings together such a host of young and old week after week that the architect and church officers are laboring over the problem of enlargement. Of course, Cole, Beckler and Boblitt are capable, devoted and energetic leaders, but there was a time when even such labor failed to yield such returns. Not only in Washington and Pennsylvania, but in all the world, now is the accepted time. The Word of God has the right-of-way.

The Harvest Beyond the Seas.

God's cause is one in all the world. It was so a hundred years ago when Barton W. Stone of Kentucky, Thomas Campbell of Pennsylvania and Alexander Campbell of Scotland, and many others in divers places were thinking and saying the same things, no one of them knowing that his sublime vision of a united church, a victorious Lord and a redeemed world was seen by any other than his own prophetic eye. It is true now when not only the Congo and Philippines match the growth of our most favored home fields, but when every mission station reports vanishing opposition, deepening interests and multiplying membership. Thus the Centennial year brings to every church a double reason for a doubled offering. Our own people are now ready as never before to do worthy things. Their faith is stronger, their hope is brighter and their love is warmer. It matters little that a few of them have less money than heretofore, for generally our offerings are shortened not by our poverty, but by our indifference. The marvels of apostolic missions are being repeated in the splendid successes of our own brethren in foreign lands. We are not the people to fail of doubling our investments where we see the returns multiplying.

On Record.

Whether we will or no we are going on record this Centennial year before the whole world and all time to come. Not only will our whole movement be judged by our contributions to the fundamental work of Christian missions, but every particular congregation and every individual preacher will be weighed in the new century by the missionary records of the Centennial year. A noble pride should stir every heart to do the utmost possible. This is a crisis when sacrifice is not only justified but demanded. This is a turning point when the ordinary rules of temporal prudence must be thrown to the winds. This is a judgment day when to sow to the flesh what would yield thirty, sixty or a hundred-fold in the spirit is to reap condemnation for eternity. Get right with God March 7.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

R. Ray Eldred and Dr. Jaggard have started a new station at Longa, Africa. They have built a three-room mud house, a carpenter shop, a store, and a sheep shed, besides clearing about five acres of land. The station was a typical African jungle, but they hope to make it a beautiful and pleasant home. The church at this new station now numbers fifty-two.

HOW TO SEND THE MARCH OFFERING.

1. Please send the offering Monday morning, March 8. If all pledges are not paid, send on what you have and send again later.
2. Care should be taken to give the local name of the church, at Mt. Pleasant, Corinth, Sixth St., etc., when different from the post-office.
3. Friends are requested also to state definitely whether the money is from a church, a Sunday-school, an Endeavor Society, or an individual. A separate account is kept with each of these. A little care in this matter will avoid misunderstanding and save needless correspondence.
4. The offerings should be sent to F. M. Rains, Secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, who will at once return a proper receipt. Money should be sent by bank draft, post-office order, express order, or registered letter.
5. And in all, let us heed the apostolic injunction, "Not slothful in business; fervent in spirit; serving the Lord."

Certain Proof Will Be Made That Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets Cure Stomach Trouble.

THIS EXPERIMENT FREE.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are made to give to the system, through the digestive tract and the stomach, the necessary chemicals not only to digest food, but to enrich the fluids of the body so that it may no longer suffer from dyspepsia or other stomach trouble.

We will send you a quantity of these tablets free, so that their power to cure may be proven to you.

Thousands upon thousands of people are using these tablets for the aid and cure of every known stomach disease. Know what you put into your stomach, and use discretion in doing so.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets contain fruit and vegetable essences, the pure concentrated tincture of Hydrastis (Golden Seal), which tone up and strengthen the mucous lining of the stomach, and increase the flow of gastric and other digestive juices; Lactose (extracted from milk); Nux, to strengthen the nerves controlling the action of the stomach and to cure nervous dyspepsia; pure Aseptic Pepsin of the highest digestive power and approved by the United States Pharmacopoeia.

One of the ablest professors of the University of Michigan recently stated that this Pepsin was the only aseptic pepsin he had found that was absolutely pure.—free from all animal impurities; Bismuth, to absorb gases and prevent fermentation. They are deliciously flavored with concentrated Jamaica Ginger—in itself a well known stomach tonic.

Liquid chemicals lose their strength the longer they are kept, through evaporation, fermentation and chemical changes, hence Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are recognized as the only true and logical manner of preserving the ingredients given above in their fullest strength.

If you really doubt the power of these tablets, take this advertisement to a druggist and ask his opinion of the formula.

It is due your stomach to give it the ingredients necessary to stop its trouble. It costs nothing to try. You know what you are taking, and the fame of these tablets prove their value. All druggists sell them. Price 50 cents. Send us your name and address and we will send you a trial package by mail free. Address F. A. Stuart Co., 150 Stuart Building, Marshall, Mich.

MAKING THINGS RUN SMOOTHLY.

If there is one thing above all else that makes household labors run smoothly, it's oil. Not the oil that is poured on troubled waters, but the oil that's put on bearings to prevent friction; to make wheels turn easily; to prevent rust; to stop that screeching, grinding, creaking; to save wear and tear.

There are plenty of oils on the market. Some are heavy, some are light. Some are good for one thing, some are good for another. But the ideal oil is one that answers all practical household purposes. "Household Lubricant" not only fills the bill in this particular, but it comes ready to use—in a handy can with a removable spout. Just as you buy it in the store you use it. No chasing around to hunt a feather or a straw to apply the oil as in days of old. The Household Lubricant can with its reversible spout, which permits closing the can to prevent spilling and leaking if upset, and the carefully compounded oil which it contains answers every condition demanded for the perfect household lubricant.

There is nothing that ordinarily gives more dissatisfaction in the handling than an oil can with its shallow bottom and mussy, dripping spout. The Household Lubricant can eliminates all this. The can itself is of such a shape and size—even in the larger, 8 ounce size, that it is very easly handled and "stays put" when you put it down. So universally recognized are the merits of this oil that it is found on sale in every little hamlet and village in the land.

NOTES FROM THE FOREIGN SOCIETY.

Last week the Foreign Society received $4,000 from a friend in California on the Annuity Plan. The same friend will add $1,000 to this amount in a few weeks. The total amount received by the Society on the Annuity Plan to March 2, amounted to $11,410, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $9,659. For those who are fifty years of age or older, this is an admirable plan by which to help on the Lord's work.

Last week the Foreign Society received two direct gifts of $500 each. An effort is being made to secure 100 gifts this year of $500 or more each. Already nearly twenty-five such gifts have been received or promised. It is believed that the 100 can be secured. The increase in individual gifts is most gratifying this year. There has been a gain of 115 such gifts, and also a gain in the total amount from this source of nearly $5,000. Every friend of the work who can not contribute through the church, should send a direct gift.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of February amounted to $5,447.15, a gain over February, 1908, of $2,652. There was also a gain in the number of contributing churches, Sunday-schools, individual offerings, etc. There was, however, a small loss in the number of C. E. Societies.

James Ware of Shanghai, China, has just reached America, and has visited his family at Columbia, Mo., where his children are being educated. Sunday, March 7, he spent with the church at Danville, Ky., which supports him.

Walter R. Cady, Waldron, Mich., says: "Raised our full apportionment for Foreign Missions last Sunday in ten minutes. Never saw a happier lot of people."

The Seventh Church, Indianapolis, Ind., expects to double, if not treble the offering of last year for Foreign Missions.

Leslie Wolfe, Philippine Island, reports seventy-two baptisms during the first twenty days of January, in the district about that city. He is greatly encouraged over the outlook. A new church has recently been started and a new chapel has recently been dedicated. He calls earnestly for reinforcements.

The church at Ashland, Oregon, raises between $650 and $700 for the steamship "Oregon" for our Congo Mission at Bolenge, Africa.

The Christian Century

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., MARCH 13, 1909. NO. 11

The Sabbath and the Lord's Day

During the meeting of the Federal Council of Churches, held in Philadelphia in December, a strong presentation of the duty of Christians to secure as complete an observance of Sunday as possible was presented by F. D. Power, the chairman of the Committee on Sunday Observance.

A resolution presented made no reference to the question of Saturday as a substitute for the Lord's Day in the religious practices of some bodies of Christians. But in the progress of the discussion a member of the Council introduced a resolution to the effect, "That it is not our intention that anything shall be done to interfere with the convictions of those brethren represented with us in this Council who observe the seventh day instead of the first day of the week as the day of rest and worship." This resolution was presented with the desire to express a sympathetic interest in the work of such bodies as the Seventh Day Baptists, with whose opinions, on the question of the Lord's Day, however, few Christians agree. The resolution was not adopted, it being felt that any reference whatever to the subject could not fail to be misunderstood and to work harm.

It is now apparent that those bodies, like the Seventh Day Baptists and the Seventh Day Adventists, whose foremost tenet was thus brought up for consideration, have fixed upon the discussion as an admirable point of departure for a fresh propaganda of their views. Their literature has been sent widely to different members of the Council since the meeting in December, and all the arguments in favor of the Jewish Sabbath have been restated.

This is not a question of very vital importance to the Disciples of Christ. Those religious bodies which accept the authority of the Old Testament as equal with that of the New have, of course, always extreme difficulty in evading the Fourth Commandment with its explicit insistence upon the observance of the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath of the Jewish religion. But the Disciples have never been troubled with the question of Sabbatarianism. There is a clear distinction between the law of Hebrew rites and the gospel of Christ.

The Fourth Commandment referred exclusively to the seventh day and enforced the law of rest with the two-fold reference to the Sabbath rest of creation and the social and industrial value of the Sabbath as a time of rest for the toiler. It is the contention of Sabbatarians that this Sabbath law was never abrogated by divine authority, but that Constantine and other rulers, who united the functions of church and state, abolished the Sabbath day and substituted for it the first day of the week.

A more signal misreading of the facts of Christian history could hardly be imagined. Those facts are very simple. The earliest Christians were all Jews, and as such they observed the Sabbath day as did the Master himself. It was their legal, national day of rest. But they could not be oblivious to the fact that the first day of the week was a time of signal importance in the life of Jesus and the early church. On that day he rose from the dead; on that day, apparently, he ascended to the Father; on that day beyond all question the Spirit came in pentecostal blessing; on that day the early Christians were accustomed to assemble because it was made sacred to them by these events in the life of the Lord. By the time Paul was well engaged in his missionary work the custom was so formally established as to be the chief item of the weekly calendar, so that when the disciples at Troas met on the first day of the week to break bread, the apostle Paul remained with them and spoke.

Thus among Jewish Christians the two days were observed side by side, the one as a Jewish day of rest, the other as a Christian day of worship and commemoration of the chief events in Jesus' life. When Christianity went out into communities where Judaism was unknown, the Jewish Sabbath had no significance, and this becoming increasingly the fact. By the time of Constantine, three centuries after the founding of the church, the observance of the Lord's day was an all but universal practice among Christians. The edict of Constantine fixing the observance of Sunday as a legal and imperial rest day was not to distinguish Sunday from the Jewish Sabbath, or Saturday, but from those various days which were sacred in the heathen worship. Constantine's act was only the ratification of what had become an accepted fact of Christian history. He made legal and binding the practice which was everywhere recognized as apostolic and fitting.

To one who discriminates between the temporary and obsolete authority of the Old Testament and the vitality and permanence of the New, the Jewish Sabbath has no significance whatever. It is perceived to be an outgrown institution, valuable at one time, but destined to pass away with the other rites of Judaism. The principle of the day of rest was accepted and enforced in the Jewish Sabbath. The principle of the day of rest is recognized and vindicated in the Lord's day. The Jewish Sabbath rests upon the legal enactment of the Hebrew law. The Lord's day rests upon the loving remembrance of Christian people. It requires no scriptural commandment; apostolic precedent and the fitness of the event are sufficient.

In this very fact lies the strength of the appeal which may be made for the Lord's day as the recognized time of rest for all the citizens of Christian lands. If such an appeal were based upon the scriptural commandment, the non-Christian would have a perfect right to protest against the suppression of freedom of conscience. He might insist that Christian legislators have no right to enforce upon him the requirements of a religion to which he does not assent. But Christianity does not make this claim. It bases its observance of the Lord's day upon no biblical enactment. It accepts the principle of one needed day of rest in seven and asks that since the great majority in Christian lands recognize the first day of the week as the chosen day of worship, it be sanctioned for purposes of rest by all citizens who have the welfare of the state at heart. There is in this no enforcement of religious tenets. If any one has conscientious convictions which lead him to the observance of any other day, such as Saturday, which is the rest day of Jews and Sabbatarian Christians, or Friday, which is the sacred day of the Mohammedans, the rights of such are not interfered with in the least. They are at perfect liberty to observe what day they will, only they are enjoined from interfering with the observance of the Lord's day on the part of their Christian neighbors and the public at large.

We are glad that the question of the Sabbath and the Lord's day is raised from time to time, not because it is one of great importance, but because the advocates of Sabbatarianism are forever obscuring the actual issue and attempting to reinvest the Jewish Sabbath with the values which only the Lord's day possesses.

The Trend of Events

THE NOISELESS GUN

Hiram Maxim has invented a noiseless gun. It is another of those inventions that are calculated to make war more deadly and thus more nearly impossible. He has not only invented it, but has demonstrated it before army and navy officials and scientific committees. It is very simple, being a small steel tube 1½ inches in diameter and from four to six inches long, according to the caliber of the rifle to which it is to be fitted. It is attached by simply slipping it onto the end of the gun barrel and giving it a quarter twist. It will not be expensive. The principle involved is practically that of a turbine reversed. The interior of the tube is filled with a series of spiral vanes or disks which catch the gases from the exploded powder and hold them in leash or slow down the outward rush of them and thus prevent the explosion which they usually make upon striking the air at the muzzle of the rifle. The uninitiated would suppose this would tremendously increase the "kick" of the gun, but it in fact decreases it.

This, with the use of smokeless powder, leaves but one means of discovering where the enemy is lying. If the bullets that hit all come from one direction the enemy may be known to be in that direction, but without smoke to tell where he is or sound to help locate the distance or direction, terrible havoc could be wrought before a fire could be returned. War thus becomes more and more a battle of strategy for the best position to cruelly murder the unwitting enemy. It wrings out those heroic parts once so celebrated when men met face to face and makes of it more of just what it is—murder without malice and according to certain accepted rules.

THE REDUCTIO AD ABSURDUM OF THE JURY SYSTEM

The trial of an accused man by a jury of his peers is firmly established in our criminal jurisprudence and it is enforced by the most precious of our dearly bought principles of liberty. It is one of the theoretical fundamentals of our democracy. But while involving one of the most fundamental of the principles it is yet only an instrument for the enforcement of those principles in the execution of law. Law, in turn, is but the expressed will of society, and neither law nor instrument are inspired or infallible.

Last year at Yale, Mr. Taft made some strictures on our jury system. Some cried out, but it is always worth while considering before shouting that our liberties are threatened. It sometimes happens that the means devised to insure the application of a principle become corrupted by that very use and need revision. Methods of procedure may obscure the law together with the justice and mercy which it was ordained to establish.

An illustration of the dangers of the jury system is afforded in the trial of Senator Carmack's assassin at Nashville. If one were an enemy of democracy and its trial by a jury of one's peers, he could well find in this case an argument of reductio ad absurdum. In order that there might be no prejudice or opinion formed before hearing the evidence, no man who had read accounts of the tragedy could be accepted. Yet all must come from the county where the court holds jurisdiction. Thus several of the jury cannot read and others boasted that they had not looked at a paper in ten years. Of course such men are liable to be governed by prejudice and are sure to be unable to grasp acute problems involved. If they are able to agree quickly their verdict may be good, for they are liable, if they be as conscientious as they are ignorant, to look at the simple facts and be ruled by them instead of the quibbles of the lawyers and the technical points so often invoked to defeat justice.

Another notable instance that requires thoughtful consideration is that of the Sunday Closing cases in Chicago. There, jury after jury could not agree even when the accused did not deny the fact of Sunday sales of liquor.
